MATTHEW XXV. 25, 26.

“And I was afraid, and went, and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine. His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed.”

It would afford us pleasure to be able to explain all difficult passages on which we are called upon to give our views, if we were in possession of the requisite knowledge and aptness to teach, and if we were confident that what we write would be for the edification of the saints, and the glory of God. We have often had occasion to acknowledge that we feel more embarrassment in writing our views on the parables and metaphors used, than on other portions of the Scriptures, not because we have no views, but principally because the same metaphor or the same parable may illustrate more than one subject, and therefore brethren may apply them differently, and it is hard sometimes to determine which, if either of us, has the primary design of them.

This parable of the talents has been variously understood and interpreted by different commentators, and that, too, in some cases where there is unison of sentiment in the doctrine of the Bible, generally. To our mind there appears to be a connection, or continuation of the subject embraced in the twenty-fourth chapter, extended through the twenty-fifth.

The discourse of our Lord to his disciples, of which the parable under consideration is a part, took place in the vicinity of the temple at Jerusalem, immediately after the disciples had been showing him the buildings of the temple, and Jesus had predicted the final overthrow and utter ruin of all these splendid buildings, whereupon they asked him to tell them, “When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming? and of the end of the world?" In connection with his answers to these three questions, our Lord gave some most solemn and impressive admonitions to the disciples, which he enforced by the use of a number of parables, all of which were calculated to show the propriety and necessity of their faithful attention to the charge which he had given them, and vigilant watchfulness in regard to the signs which were to indicate his coming. Their Lord was soon to go away for a season and then return again, and it was needful for them that he should go away, for he was going to his Father and to their Father; and when he should thus personally be absent, they would be exposed to strong temptations, both from enemies without, and fears arising from their own carnal and unrenewed natures. "Take heed," said he, "that no man deceive you; for many shall come in my name saying, I am christ, and shall deceive many." They would also be tempted to say within themselves, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and to begin to smite their fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken. To warn them against these deceptions of the enemy, and corruptions of their flesh, he made use of the parables. "Two shall be in the field, the one shall be taken, the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken and the other left. Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." From all these parables, it is clearly seen, that the disciples were admonished to watch for the coming of the Son of Man; that is, the coming of which they had inquired, and which is more clearly indicated by the parables of the virgins, the talents, and of the sheep and goats, in the following chapter; when he should come as the bridegroom long expected, to receive the bride and consummate the marriage; as the Lord to reckon with his servants; and as the crowned king to divide the nations of the earth as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins." Then, at that time, when the Son of Man, as a Bridegroom, should thus suddenly be announced, then those faithful servants or disciples, like the wise virgins, should be manifestly distinguished from the foolish virgins. And why? The reason is thus given in the following parable: "For the kingdom of heaven is as a man traveling into a far country, who called his own servants." As Christ was now about to go away, he had called his own servants, or disciples, and taught them privately on this subject. "And delivered unto them his goods. And to one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey." Here, if we rightly understand the application of the parable, is described the manner in which God has set the members in the mystical body of Christ, even as it hath pleased him, and bestowed a measure of the Spirit to qualify each member for usefulness in the body, and all the gifts for the benefit of all the members, to profit with all, or for the profit of all "He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry." "But to every one is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ." These gifts in the church are not bestowed to suit the ambitious feelings or desires of the servants, but they are distributed according to the wisdom of the Lord, and according to the several ability of the disciples. In all this arrangement the Lord, and not the servant is magnified. It is the province of our Lord Jesus Christ to call, qualify and command the service of all his servants, and to furnish each servant with the exact amount of gift or talent that he pleases. And Timothy has not the right to say, Because I am not endowed with apostolic gifts and authority, my Lord is austere and unjust, or that he claims the right to reap where he has not sown, for the Lord does not require of Timothy a harvest of apostolic labors. Each disciple is required to be diligent in the exercise of such gifts as the Lord has bestowed on him.

Although Timothy cannot sit on one of the twelve thrones to judge the twelve tribes of Israel, still he can be equally useful, according to the measure of the gift of Christ, in holding fast to the form of sound words, in committing the same that he had heard of the apostle, to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also, and in warring a good warfare. And so even in the present day, though some of us, as ministers of Jesus, may not have as great gifts as some others, or as our proud natures would desire, we are under the same obligation to improve such as we have, as though we were apostles or prophets. The same may be said of all the children of God, whether called to labor in the public administration of the word, to speak in exhortation, in prayer, in attending to the discipline and order of the church, or in whatever way God has graciously qualified us to be useful in the house of God. And still further we will say, that the child of God, though but a very child, weak and trembling, has no just cause to say, Because my Lord has not given me the amount of assurance that I think others possess, because he has not enabled me to triumph over all my fears and doubts, in regard to my hope in Christ, he is therefore an austere Master if he requires me to own his name in the ordinance of baptism, in taking a seat with his people in the church of God, and I shall be excused if I wrap up carefully in a napkin what little hope I have, and bury it in the earth. For every one who is born of God, in whose heart God has shed abroad his love, has a measure of the gift of Christ, and a capacity to be, to some extent, useful in the body. The hand cannot say to the foot, I have no need of thee, nor can the foot say,

Because I am not the hand, therefore I am not of the body. The language of the slothful servant, it is to be feared is found in too many mouths at the present day. Preachers excuse themselves from devoting their time to their calling, on the plea that their gifts are so small when compared with the gifts of others, saying, We will hardly be missed if we apply ourselves to our farms, our shops or our worldly business, and thus hide what gift we have, in the earth; if God designed us for usefulness in the ministry, he would give us greater gifts, and not reap where he has not sown. To carry this short, simple, plain but emphatic message, "Yet forty days and Nineveh should be destroyed," seemed quite unpleasant to the fretful prophet. But it was, nevertheless, a message from God, and quite as important that he should bear it, as any message that was ever sent to Israel by Isaiah or Jeremiah.

"I was afraid," said the slothful servant. Afraid of what? Had not his Lord said, Occupy till I come? But he lacked confidence in his Lord; feared that he would require a greater amount of harvest than in proportion to what he had sown. And being afraid, he went and hid the talent in the earth. Will this be the language of any of us? Will the tardy convert say in extenuation of his disobedience to the commands of Christ, I was afraid thy grace would not be equal to my day, and so I declined to own thee in thy ordinances? Will the reluctant minister say, I was afraid that I should fail to make a creditable appearance, and my pride would be mortified, so I buried my gift in the earth? May the Lord deliver his dear children from such slothfulness, and constrain them all to obey him.

"His Lord answered and said, Thou wicked and slothful servant!" The excuse is insulting to the Master or Lord who supplied the talent. "Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury.” Thus in the use of money, if it be not invested as capital for business, it may be so applied as at least to gain ordinary usury. But in regard to the gifts bestowed on the saints, we cannot let them out on usury; but still the figure is well calculated to admonish the slothful servants of Christ, that they are amenable to their divine Lord for their disobedience to his commands, and for their neglect of such gifts as he has bestowed on them.

The order given to take from him the one talent, and give it to him that has the ten, shows that the church of God must be supplied with edifying gifts; and if some, through sloth and disobedience, wickedly withhold their share of the service, those who are more faithful, shall supply the lack, and in doing so they shall learn That the willing and the obedient shall eat the good of the land, while the slothful and disobedient shall be cast into outer darkness, where many a disobedient child of God has been, and where they have found weeping and gnashing of teeth. This is strong language, but we believe it to be applicable to God’s children, who are delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. # MATTHEW 25:30

Brother Beebe: Please give your views on Matthew 25:30: "And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

J. Armstrong.

The parabolic instructions and admonitions of our Lord, recorded in the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of Matthew, were addressed especially and exclusively to his disciples. A careful examination of these two chapters will show that all which they contain transpired at a private interview which the disciples of Christ sought for and were favored with on the mount of Olives. "And as he sat upon the mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world? And Jesus answered and said unto them, [namely, to his disciples] Take heed that no man deceive you," etc. Then follows the answers which he privately gave to their inquiries, extending to the twenty-sixth chapter and second verse, inclusive. All his admonitions contained in his reply to their inquiries were solemnly enforced by appropriate parables, which the disciples undoubtedly perfectly understood to apply to themselves, especially and primarily in regard to their exposure to temptations, deceptions, and their liability to be deceived by others, or involved in disobedience and tribulation by their own want of vigilance, and inattention to the solemn warnings he had given them in regard to the dreadful trial and sore temptations they should endure while waiting for and at the time of the fulfillment of what he told them in regard to the destruction of Jerusalem. The fact that Jerusalem should be destroyed, and not one stone left on the top of another of all the splendid buildings of the temple, and that all these things should be fulfilled before that generation should pass away, was no less certain, for, “Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.” But certain and irrevocable as was the decree that all this destruction should take place in their day and generation, yet the day and the hour was not a matter of revelation; it was known unto the Father only. God had purposely concealed the precise time, the day and hour, of the accomplishment of this terrible judgment from all men, his saints not excepted, and with a special design to try the faith of his children. For if the good man of the house had known in what hour of the night the thief would come, he would have watched, and not suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore, said he, be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh; that is, he cometh to execute these judgments upon Jerusalem. And he adds, Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? Blessed is that servant whom his lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. Verily I say unto you, That he shall make him ruler over all his goods. But if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and to drink with the drunken, the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

In what we have called attention to, as contained in the twenty-fourth chapter, we have presented the admonitions, to more fully and solemnly enforce which the three parables in this twenty-fifth chapter are given. “Then at that very time, when the faithfulness of the good and unfaithfulness of the evil servant shall be proved shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins,” etc. “For the kingdom of heaven is as a man traveling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one," etc. Two of the servants in this parable sustained the character of good and faithful servants, and were applauded by their lord on the day of reckoning, but the third was found wicked and slothful, and was condemned and punished. Of his sentence and punishment brother Armstrong inquires. We have deemed the foregoing review of the whole subject necessary in opening the way to a clear understanding of this and to every other part of the whole.

We will now devote a few remarks to that part contained in the verse proposed, in which the sentence of the wicked servant is given. The parable of the talents represents the faithful servants who in the absence of their lord were diligent in the occupancy of their trust, approved, promoted and generously rewarded for their fidelity in the day of special trial, and the faithless and slothful servant cast out and consigned to darkness, weeping and gnashing of teeth. Such being the bearing of the parable, we are to look for its application to the disciples of our Lord, who are recognized as his servants, and by his will as the servants of his church. In the divinely authorized interpretation and application of the parable, the man, or lord of the servants, represents the kingdom of heaven. The servants in the parable are those invested with gifts to rule the Lord's household and give to those of his household their meat in due season. The good and faithful servants represent the faithful servants in the church, in the ministry, who shall be found of their Lord giving meat to those of the household of God in due season, and who in the faithful discharge of their duty "have purchased to themselves a good degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus (I Timothy 3:13)." The slothful servant represents the servant of the church, who is intrusted with a gift for feeding the flock, who buries that gift in the earth, and with the people and things of the earth becomes intoxicated and infatuated, smites the menservants and the maidservants of his Lord's household when they disturb his sluggishness by application for their meat in due season, leaving the care of the flock of Christ for the vanities of the world, associating with the drunken fanatics of the world, to the annoyance, discomfort and distress of the saints; they shall in the day of reckoning receive of the temporal plagues and judgments which are held in store for the ungodly. These three invested according to their lord's judgment with gifts or talents according to their several ability, were all equally his servants, his property, for a servant, in a scriptural sense, is one who is not his own, but is bought with a price, who therefore owes obedience and fidelity to his owner, or lord. Such were the servants in Abraham's household, born in his house, or bought with his money, according to God's law upon that subject (Leviticus 25:44-46). Thus the term "servant" is always used in reference to the servants of God and of the church, always signifying the Master's right of property in them. The reason given by the apostle why "ye are not your own," is that "ye are bought with a price," consequently the property of him who has bought you, owing to him all your powers to serve. Upon no other principle could the slothful servant have been held accountable to his lord for neglecting to improve his talent, for if his lord had no right of property in him he could no more have demanded obedience from the servant than could the servant from his lord. It must be remembered, however, that all of God's servants whom Christ has bought with a price are also children of God, and it is as children, not as servants, they are heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ. As sons, their inheritance of immortality is secure, being incorruptible, undefiled, and fading not away, but as servants, if they know their Master's will and do it not, they shall be beaten with many stripes. The gifts or talents bestowed on the ministers or other servants of Christ and his church are committed to them as servants and stewards. So the apostle has settled the matter, for, says he, “We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus’ sake.” And this treasure, talent or gift, we have in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power thereof may be of God, and not of us.

The peculiar labor obligatory upon the servants of the kingdom of Christ is set forth in connection with this cluster of parables to be, first, to take the oversight of the flock; they are made rulers over the Lord’s household, to give them meat in due season. But as rulers they are not lords over God’s heritage, nor are they to make rules for the household, nor smite or abuse either the menservants or maidservants, but simply to administer the rule which Christ himself has laid down for the government of both pastor and people. The obligation of the church or household to recognize these servants whom he has commissioned to take the oversight of them is found in Hebrews 13:7,8: “Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation: Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and today, and for ever.” The word of God which they have spoken to you is the rule, and the only rule which they have or are allowed to have over the household of God, and if they do not speak the word of God unto the church they are not invested with any legitimate power to rule, nor are the saints or churches at liberty to follow their faith unless the end of their conversation be Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and today, and forever. If they show such credentials as are here indicated, on their peril let not the churches or the saints despise them. “Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves;” that is, to the rule, to the word of God which they have spoken unto you, for that is the rule, “For they watch for your souls, as they that must give account; that they may do it with joy, and not with grief.” As watchmen, they are still servants, and must give account to their Lord and Master. Now, in administering the law of Christ, the word of God, as the rule, the servants of Christ and of his kingdom are also required to "feed the church of God, which he bath purchased with his own blood (Acts 20:28)." In feeding the church of God they are to give to those who are of the household of faith, both menservants and maidservants, babes and fathers, sheep and lambs, their meat in due season. There are regular and stated times for meals in all well regulated households; if the family does not receive their meals regularly they may suffer from hunger and become disorderly. Paul indeed charged Timothy to "be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all longsuffering and doctrine (II Timothy 4:2)." As the children of the household may become hungry between meals, the servants in charge are to attend instantly to their necessities. "For," the apostle adds, "the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables." In all such cases the servants of the Lord will be required to be seasonable with their reproofs, rebukes, exhortations, longsuffering and doctrine. They must not wait until the wolf has entered the fold and begun to devour the flock before they give warning, nor delay serving the wholesome food of the good word of the Lord until they see the children fainting, but they are required, as good stewards, to deal out such food from the word, whether reproof, rebuke, exhortation or encouragement, comfort and consolation, in due season; that is, just as the peculiar circumstances of the family require it. "Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing."

"But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken," how striking the contrast! The servant whom Christ approves is watchful, faithful and diligent in the most darksome and trying times, but the other, like an eye-servant, assures himself that his lord delayeth his coming, chooseth for himself a course of self-gratification and ease, at the expense of the household over which he has been called to watch. In the trying hour, when the conflict becomes intense and violent between the church and the world, or anti-christ, in regard to the promise of his coming, in the execution of long predicted and impending judgments, the slothful servant, recreant to his trust, disloyal to his master and treacherous to his fellow-servants, falls to beating them and unites with their enemies, eats and drinks with the drunken. But the scene will soon change, the coming of the day of the Lord will not be delayed; he that is to come will come, and he will not tarry, and at his coming judgment shall prevail. The faithful servants of our Lord will be approved, but the wicked and slothful will not only be exposed and condemned and speechless, unable to utter a word in justification of his course, but will be compelled to share with the enemies of God and truth in the temporal judgments which shall consume the adversaries. His sentence is already written: "Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents." Depose him from the ministry, and let the privileges and gifts pertaining to his position be given to those who will improve them. "And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." The execution of this order seems to be given to the church, who in the faithful execution of the discipline of the house of God shall disown, depose and withdraw support, countenance and fellowship from the wicked and slothful servant, and in doing this they shall cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Outer darkness is the opposite of inner light. The light, joy and peace of the people of God are realized in the church of God. "For the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof (Revelation 21:23).” Expelled from the privileges of the church of Christ, and from the fellowship of the saints, the excluded, if a servant or child of God, is cast into outer darkness and utter wretchedness, “cut asunder,” or, as the margin reads, “cut off;” his portion no more with the saints in sweet communion and fellowship, but he takes a miserable portion with hypocrites, with those whom he has been eating and drinking, and a sad portion it must be to one who has ever known the inner joy and blessed light of the house of God. No wonder it is said there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; for while the poor banished servant from his Master’s house must weep bitterly when he remembers Zion, the hypocrites into whose society he is cast have no consoling words of comfort, but railing, reproaches and blasphemies. Like salt that has lost its savor, he finds himself good for nothing, but is cast out of the church to be trodden under foot of men.

We are aware that many have understood that this unprofitable servant is designed to represent one who has never been a true servant of God or of the church of Christ, but the whole connection shows that he was. The man in the parable called his own servants and delivered unto them his goods, and to every one according to his several ability. What part of the gifts of the church, goods of the spiritual household of God, or talents for feeding the church of God, has our Lord ever bestowed upon graceless hypocrites? Or what punishment would it be to cast out of the society and fellowship of an orderly church into the society and communion of hypocrites one of their own stamp, who in reality never knew the Lord and never saw the inner light and glory of the church of God? The character here presented is a servant, equally bought with a price and equally bound in duty to obey his master, with those who received the ten and the two talents. If the disciples were not themselves liable to temptations and slothfulness, and to the consequences of rebellion and disorder, why were these parables spoken privately to them? In Revelation 18:4, John says, "And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, that ye receive not of her plagues." This voice was heard speaking to those who were unquestionably God's people, yet they are admonished that if they partake of the sins of Babylon they shall also receive of her plagues. Of course the plagues spoken of are her temporal judgments, and so also in the case of the destruction of Jerusalem, to which all these parables primarily referred. Those who were admonished that when they should see the signs of Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem were to flee to the mountains, or participate in the temporal calamities which were to be poured out upon her. And so it is at this very day in which we are now living; the cup of anti-christ is nearly filled to its brim; she has slaughtered her hundreds of thousands, and her clergy is still as bloodthirsty as before, and still crying for carnage, and some of God's servants who hold a commission to preach peace on earth and good will toward men are even now evidently eating and drinking with the drunken, and in their mad intoxication are smiting their fellow-servants, who cannot join them in their murderous howlings in consigning their fellow-men to the sword. The admonitions of these parables in thunder tones are addressed to them, admonishing them that the time of her judgment is very near at hand, but from their associations with the drunken, infatuated fanatics of the day they are still assuring themselves that the Lord delays his coming, and are crying peace and safety now, while sudden destruction is near at hand.

"On wings of vengeance flies our God,
To pay the long arrears of blood."

The talent of the infatuated and slothful servant, though it be but one, is buried in the earth, or in earthly speculations, delusions and infatuations of the present times, and many have turned away their ears from the truth and are turned unto fables. But as surely as we have correctly understood the fearful import of these solemn warnings, the day is not distant when they shall call for rocks and mountains to hide them from the face of Him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. The measure which they are now meting to others shall soon be meted to them again in full measure, heaped up and running over. Let those of God's children who can, put far from their thoughts and apprehensions the evil day, and fortify themselves with their delusions; nevertheless

"That awful day will surely come,
The appointed hour makes haste,
When they shall stand before their Judge,
And pass the solemn test."

We do believe, however much of God's redeemed people may have to suffer with the ungodly world for their complicity with anti-christ, they shall finally all be saved, yet so as by fire, for however far they may go in wickedness, and deeply suffer in consequence thereof, their spiritual life is hid with Christ in God; yet while here in the flesh, it is equally certain that they that sow to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption. "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God (Romans 8: 13,14)."

Our friend Armstrong will understand us to consider the unprofitable servant in the parable to mean an unprofitable servant of Christ, and his punishments to be a suspension of the comforts and privileges of the church, and a participation with hypocrites in the temporal judgments to which they are doomed; and further, that this solemn warning was given privately to the disciples of Christ in special reference to the judgments at that time impending over Jerusalem, and that a record of the same is preserved as an admonition to the servants of Christ in all subsequent time until the end of the world; and what Christ has said to those servants privately on the mount he says also to all his own servants throughout all time: “Watch!” “Watch and be sober.” “Take heed that no man deceive you.” “For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them.” “Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober.” “For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ.”

A day is now most evidently upon us in which the faithful and unfaithful servants of the kingdom of Christ whom he has commissioned to minister to those of his household, and to give them their meat in due season, are being called to a strict reckoning, and the line is now being drawn between those who shun not to declare the whole counsel of God, even at the peril of their lives, and those who prefer to eat and drink with the drunken, and to smite the menservants and the maidservants who remain at their posts; and it will be made fully to appear that those who seek to save their lives by withholding the truth and conniving at error, shall lose their standing as ministers of Christ and be driven into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; and they who will lay down their life for Jesus’ sake shall find it. Servants of the kingdom, beware; spread your banner fearlessly, in the name of your God. Bury not your talent in the earth. Stand boldly forth and contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints, and count not your lives dear unto yourselves, that ye may finish your course with joy and the ministry which ye have received to testify the gospel of the grace of God.

MATTHEW XXVI. 40.

We have and do understand this passage to mean that the disciples - Peter, James and John - were literally asleep. Such was the weakness of their flesh, that, although they loved the Savior with the most sincere and abiding love, and were at that time willing in spirit to go with him to the prison or to death, they could not watch with him in that one hour of his dreadful agony and suffering. Peter’s protestation in a preceding verse, “Though all men should be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended,” and also, “Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee,” were uttered in the sincerity of his heart; and we have no doubt that the affections of the other two disciples were equally strong. But what are our affections and resolutions, when we rely upon our fleshly powers to execute them? “The spirit truly is willing, but the flesh is weak.”

There was a special cause for the selection of Peter, James and John, from the other apostles, to experience this scene of trial and of suffering. Peter’s evident confidence in his own fidelity and power of perseverance required correction. And James and John had said they were able to drink of his cup, and to be baptized with his baptism; and therefore felt themselves competent to fill distinguished places in the kingdom of their Lord; the one to sit on his right hand, and the other on his left. But Jesus had said to them, “Ye know not what ye ask.” And this utter failure for want of ability to resist this lethargetic pressure upon their natural energies, taught them most effectually by experience what they were slow indeed to comprehend in any other way.

Nor was this important lesson of the weakness of human flesh alone for the benefit of these distinguished apostles of the Lamb. The saints in all subsequent time are admonished to beware of self-confidence, or of reposing confidence in the flesh. The flesh is to be denied, the body kept under, for in the flesh dwells no good thing. The spirit within these disciples which was willing, was born of God; but the flesh which was weak, was not born of God; it was only born of the flesh, and therefore could not rise above itself; and in the most critical and important hour of trial, its weakness was developed. They could not watch one hour. Well did the inspired Paul say to those who were with himself, members of the one body of Christ, "We are the circumcision which worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." And why should we have? "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing."

Another important consideration bearing on the subject is, that our Redeemer was by the irrevocable decree of heaven, to tread the wine-press alone, and that of the people there should be none with him to share in the work, making reconciliation for the sins of the people. He was himself legally the embodiment of all his members; so that his death and suffering was the execution of the penal demands of law and justice which stood against them. So that when he died for his members, they were legally dead; and in his resurrection for their justification, they were released from death and delivered from all condemnation; yet the propitiatory sacrifice was made by him as their High Priest, single handed and alone. Therefore in his victory, his arm, in the achievement of their salvation, brought salvation unto him; for they are his body, his flesh and his bones.

It could not therefore be that any fleshly power should aid in the accomplishment of that work. When the Shepherd was smitten the sheep were scattered; and notwithstanding the strong inclination of these disciples to drink of his cup, and be baptized with his baptism of overwhelming sufferings, it was impossible for them to keep awake or watch with him that one hour.

MATTHEW 26:52

While we fully approve the views of brother Wlm. J. Purington on Matthew 26:52 in reply to the inquiry of "E. H.", we feel inclined to express a few thoughts further upon the same subject, which are designed to be in perfect harmony with what he has written. The perfect security and perpetuity of the Kingdom of Christ upon its own basis, independently of the powers of this world, is a delightful consideration to the enlightened children of God. No carnal weapons are required to repel the foes of God and truth, for no weapon that is formed against Zion can prosper. "Salvation [not swords nor spears, but the salvation of our God] will God appoint for walls and bulwarks." Not only are they not required or needed, but they are most positively forbidden. All our trust and reliance for protection and safety must be in God. He is himself a wall of fire round about his people, and the glory in their midst. In this particular is the church of God manifestly distinguished from all anti-christian churches or religious organizations. In all ages, worldly religion has relied on worldly support and worldly protections. At this very day there is a mighty howling among the shepherds of anti-christ, and those religious denominations who have been the principal promoters of the dreadful scenes of carnage which has just swept over our country, desolating what was the fairest portion of the earth, slaughtering hundreds of thousands of our fellow-men, and both at the North and the South are now appealing to the worst passions of men to aid in procuring from the secular powers a law for the suppression of those religious orders which they deem antagonistic to their interests, pleading that their religious establishments are in danger by reason of the Roman Catholics, and all others who will not pander to them. They staining the earth with a crimson tide ask, and even demand that the sword of state shall be drawn for the suppression of those whom they proscribe as heterodox, and for their own defense. They take the sword, rely upon the sword, and with the sword shall they perish. But it is not so with the church of the living God.

Not only has the cause of God and his church always been sustained without aid or protection of human governments, but in opposition to all the powers of earth and hell, and always in such a manner as to clearly show that God is himself the strength of Israel, and the Savior thereof in the time of trouble. His name is their strong tower, and in his pavilion where he has hidden them they have perfect safety. We perfectly agree with brother Purington that Christians are forbidden to use carnal weapons for the defense of the kingdom of God, which being "not of this world," cannot be sustained by the power of this world. But the question arises, and perhaps was intended by "E. H.," "Are Christians allowed, by the laws of Christ, to use the sword, or carnal weapons, in any case, or under any circumstances whatever?" The more we have reflected upon this subject, the deeper our convictions have become that the precepts, as well as the spirit of Christ in his saints, forbid it. Every essential requisite for a Christian disqualifies him for carnal warfare. To be a disciple of the meek and lowly Lamb of God, we must have his spirit and temper; and except we have it we cannot be his disciple. While to fit men for carnal warfare they must be bold, daring, defiant, aspiring, and unpitying. To be a disciple of Christ we must love God supremely, and love our neighbor as ourself; and we must love even our enemies, do good to them who despitefully use and persecute us; but to be a soldier in carnal warfare, we are forbidden to sympathize with our enemies, or to give them aid or comfort, on pain of penalties provided in the laws of human warfare.

The Christian then, to be a soldier in carnal warfare, must abandon the laws of Christ and submit to the military code; must disobey the commands of Christ, and obey the opposite commands of military chieftains. How truly are we told, "No man can serve two masters." How can we possibly obey both when one commands us to kill, and the other forbids us to kill? When one commands us to love, pray for, and do good to our enemies, and the other commands us to fight, rob, harass and destroy them? The example of Christ is given as an infallible guide to all his children, and in that example he went about doing good to all classes of men, friends and foes; healing the sick, feeding the hungry, and showing compassion to all who were in distress; in all his walks he was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, and he commands his disciples to follow him. And he says, "Except a man deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me, he cannot be my disciple."

The recruiting officers of Caesar would reject such men as really and truly follow Christ as unfit for a place in their army. What do they want of men who love their enemies, or who will not kill, nor rob, or spoil their enemies? But while the meek, lowly, loving, sympathizing Christian would be rejected, they would greatly prefer carnal professors and graceless hypocrites, who go in the way of Cain, whose feet are swift to shed blood, and before whose eyes there is no fear of God, and of whom it is said, Misery and destruction are in all their ways. Such are the men for carnal warfare; those who are led by the spirit, temper and example of him who was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth. But those who strictly follow him who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them, would only be in the way in earthly warfare.

But it is urged that Christians are to "be subject to the powers that be, and to obey those who are in authority over them." This is very true, but at the same time they are told that there is no power, or authority but that which is of God.

Usurpation is not legitimate power, and usurpers have in reality no authority to enjoin on the subjects of Christ's government anything that Christ has forbidden; for Christ is himself the only and blessed potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. In everything wherein God has invested kings, governors, rulers or judges of the earth with power or authority over the citizens of the world, the Christian is, by the laws and commandments of Christ, required to honor and obey them, to that extent, but no further. Whether it be right for Christians to obey men rather than God, judge ye. If Caesar commands us to kill, and God commands us, saying, "Thou shalt not kill," which is to be obeyed? Or if rulers of the earth forbid the ministers of Christ, as in the case of Peter and John in Acts 5:29, to preach in the name of Christ, and God has commanded them to preach, is it hard to determine which is the higher power, or which is to be obeyed?

It is said that some Christians have been compelled to take up arms, and to slaughter their fellow-men. This may be so; but we do not know of a case in which a Christian, who was conscientiously opposed to carnal warfare, viewing it a violation of the law of Christ, who has made his appeal in solemn prayer to God for deliverance, and has not been delivered. But even if it were so, if the Christians were actuated by the same mind which was evinced by the martyrs of former times, would they not sooner suffer death themselves than yield to violate the law of Christ by killing their fellow men?

Let the church of God take her position as a city set upon a hill, whose light cannot be hidden; and let it be known that come life, or come death, her members cannot be forced to shed the blood, or destroy the property of their fellow men under any circumstances whatever, then we doubt whether the governments of the world would have use for such soldiers as they would make. But should they persist, we might look for a divine interposition, or if brought to the test, God would give us grace to bear all the consequences. It is not strange, as the case now stands, that the governments of the earth should regard the conscientious scruples of Christians as unimportant and trifling. For while nearly all the anti-christian orders of religionists not only sanction, but absolutely occupy a leading position in all the wars that agitate the world, the church has been slow, very slow indeed, to declare her position and say to the world that she will, under no circumstance, stain her hands with blood. But instead of holding this position, has not the church been faulty in withholding her light upon this subject; and have not, some at least of her members voluntarily entered the field of carnage, or advocated the shedding of blood; and when the matter has been submitted to the voice or vote of the people, have not some, even of the members of the church of God, the professed disciples and followers of the Prince of Peace, given their voice, their vote, and the full measure of their influence for war, to the bitter end? How is this to be reconciled with the command of God to "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord?" There are many examples given of Christ and his apostles, and the primitive saints, resisting evil even unto the death, striving against sin, but in all cases refusing the use of carnal weapons. But in what part of the sacred volume have we an account of Paul, applying to Nero for a Major or Brigadier General's commission, or Peter asking for an army contract, or even of the loving John preaching war sermons, and making war speeches to induce the disciples of the Lamb to enter the army? Even if we had such examples left on record, we are forbidden to follow them; for we are only to follow even the apostles as far as they followed Christ. And Christ, when he was reviled, reviled not again; and he has commanded his disciples to "Avenge not themselves; to resist not evil with evil." If smitten on one cheek, to turn the other cheek also to the smiter, and to remember the word of instruction, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." If God thus claims the sole right of arbitration and retribution, and if he has as positively forbidden us to avenge ourselves, is it not irreverent and presumptuous for us to usurp the ministration of wrath and vengeance in his stead? Let those who know not God and therefore fear him not indulge their cruel passions; but, Christians forbear! Let not the sun go down on your wrath. Appeal not to the sword, lest by the sword ye perish!

Reply: – We have no further light on this subject than what we derive from the literal reading of the text, and we fear that our views may fail to satisfy our inquiring correspondent.

The opening of the graves of the slumbering saints, and the resurrection of their bodies, are recorded in connection with all the other astonishing displays of divine power on that eventful occasion in demonstration of Christ's identity as the Son of God. These demonstrations, however spiritual in their import, were literal and apparent to the apprehension of the natural understanding of all who witnessed them; therefore when the centurion and they that were with him saw those things, they feared greatly, saying, "Truly this was the Son of God."

We cannot doubt that the sun in the heavens ceased to shine from the sixth to the ninth hour; or that the earth quaked, and the rocks were literally rent, and that the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. That these wonderful manifestations were literally made, none will dispute; and why then should we doubt that the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, literally.

That all these wonders, though literally performed, have a figurative and spiritual signification perfectly imperceptable to the natural mind of the natural men, we have not the smallest doubt; and that in their literal development they were perceptible to ungodly men is clear from the confession of the centurion and those that were with him. This was apparent from their consternation as well as from their confession, “Truly this was the Son of God.”

We think it must be admitted that the graves were opened and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of their graves after his resurrection, and went into the Holy City, and appeared unto many, and literally and perceptably to the centurion and his company, so far as witnessed by them; for it is distinctly so declared. What the centurion and they that were with him saw was what occurred at the time Jesus yielded up the ghost; but the resurrection of the bodies of many of the saints, their coming out of their graves and going into the Holy City was not until after the resurrection of our Lord: and this was witnessed only, so far as we are informed, by those in the Holy City, to the many to whom they appeared; these we presume were chosen witnesses. Now what became of these risen bodies we are not informed. Whether like those of Lazarus and the widow’s son, they were subsequently remanded to their graves, or like the bodies of Enoch and Elijah, they were translated, or like the body of Moses, disposed of in a secret manner by the Lord, we have no information, and therefore judge that it is not proper for us to know. The testimony given we are bound to accept; and what God has seen best to conceal from us, we should leave with him, and cautiously avoid all vain speculations.

The Holy City in which these bodies of the saints appeared unto many we understand to be Jerusalem. Who these many were, and how the bodies appeared to them, we must leave just where the sacred record has left the matter.

But while we confess our inability to trace the literal bearings of our subject any farther than simply to accept and believe the statements as they are given to us in the faithful record, there is to our mind a sublime glory in what we perceive to be their spiritual import.

The three hours of darkness when the sun at mid day, as though utterly extinguished, ceased to shine upon the earth, answering to the three days and nights in which the Son of Man was in the heart of the earth, according to the sign of the prophet Jonah, shows the fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel, "And I will shew wonders in the heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood and fire, and vapor of smoke: The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come (Acts 2:19,20)." In his death, he who is the Sun, the fountain of that life which is light, was turned into death or darkness; and in that period in which he dwelt among the dead, there was no other sun, or light to supply his place; for truly there is life, light and salvation in no other name. But as soon as the three hours, or days of darkness were fulfilled, the Sun of righteousness arose with healing in his wings. Having in his death abolished death, so in his resurrection he brought immortality to light.

The quaking earth and rending rocks, responding to his dying groans, gives witness of the power of his atoning blood; which when and where applied, shall rend and break the obdurate and adamantine hearts of those for whom he died. Nature convulses, stirs up volcanic fires, and earthquakes rock the world. All this portrays the quaking of our earthly nature, the upheaving of our mortal powers, when, resulting from an application of his death and sufferings to his people, the law with all its fiery power, produces a quaking of the soul, and the vast magazine of hidden fiery wrath, like the irrepressible power of an earthquake throws up to our astonished view the mountains of our guilt, and sin revives, and the sinner dies.

The vail of the temple, which represents the law which hid the ark, the mercy seat, the cherubim, and all the sacred things of the Sanctum Sanctorum, from the congregation of Israel, was rent in twain; thus at once disclosing that way of life and salvation which the law had so long concealed. For that vail still remains untaken away from them that still read Moses. (See II Corinthians 3:1-18.)

The opening of the graves, spiritually considered, leads us to enquire how and by what power the graves were closed and barred upon us. "The sting of death is sin, the strength of sin is the law." "Death has passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." The challenge is given, "What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave (Psalm 89:48)?" The valley of dry bones which Ezekiel saw shows the utter impossibility of dead delivering themselves from the power of the grave (Ezekiel 37:1-4). "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." "Therefore prophesy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, 0 my people, and brought you up out of your graves (Ezekiel 37: 12,13)."

When divine justice had accepted Christ as the sacrifice for the sins of all his people, and laid on him the iniquities of us all, the doors of death and the grave were to them unbarred by his death; and he could say, as he said to the soldiers who came to arrest him, "If ye seek me, let these go their way." But although in his death he ransomed them from death, and canceled the demands of the law which had closed the grave upon them, yet their resurrection must be in the resurrection life and immortality of the Son of God; and in that, as in all things, he must have the pre-eminence; he must be the first fruits, the first begotten from the dead, the first born of every creature. Hence they could not, though the bars of death were removed and their graves opened at his death, come up out of their graves until after his resurrection. Dead with their crucified Lord, to their Adamic or mortal life, which is put away with the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ; they are buried with him by baptism unto death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so they should be raised up by the same power and glory of the Father, to walk in newness of life: as the children of the resurrection.

Those bodies of the saints which came out of their graves after Christ's resurrection, and went into the Holy City, and appeared unto many, beautifully exemplify or figuratively set forth the quickening of those who were dead in trespasses and sins, and their experimental deliverance from their graves when made alive by the Spirit, and born of the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead. Those who have been thus quickened and brought out of their graves, in a spiritual sense, or in other words, taken up out of the horrible pit and miry clay, have many of them appeared in the spiritual Jerusalem, the Holy City, and have there been seen by many of their kindred in Christ Jesus.

We might pursue this subject still farther, as we believe that all the wonderful events of that day when Jesus suffered and died on the cross, and which attended his resurrection, were designed to signify and represent the wonderous power and grace of God which has been subsequently manifested in our deliverance from wrath and bondage, and induction into the liberty of the sons of God: but what we have written we will submit for the present.

Matthew 28:20

‘Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.” Matthew 28:20.

An offering a few remarks upon this part of the commission which was given to the apostles, by our Lord Jesus Christ, when His mediatorial work was finished, and He was about to ascend to heaven, we wish to call the attention of the children of God, and especially of the ministers of Jesus, to the importance of this charge.

The field which would require to be explored, were we to dwell upon the whole of the commission, would involve all that belongs to the proclamation of salvation through the crucified, risen, and exalted Redeemer, together with the administration of the ordinances, the field of their labors, the manner and amount of their qualifications and the prospect of their success, &c., but this would present a greater range than we desire at this time to occupy. We by no means think these considerations less Important, but we are strongly impressed with the idea that the nature of a call to the work of the ministry, the doctrine to be preached and the ordinances to be administered, are more fully understood and more faithfully regarded among our Old School brethren, generally speaking, than the solemn charge which we have placed at the head of this article.

Those to be so taught are the same that were to be baptized, hence according to the common acceptation of the term they were to be Baptists, or baptized believers in Christ. These were not to be any longer confined to the cities of Judea, or the people of the house of Israel, but they should be found in all nations. So the pupils, or disciples to be taught were to embrace in every nation such as the Lord our God shall call. The commission to teach was in this case given especially to the apostles of the Lamb of God. And according to their instruction and decision, those who In succeeding ages of the church should hold the office of Bishops or Elders, must also be divinely qualified with an aptness to teach. It is to be feared that there are some, if not many, who have a much greater aptness to interest, to excite and to please, than to teach or instruct the children of God; and many who do possess a talent to an eminent degree, to teach, instead of teaching the children to observe what Christ has commanded, are teaching for doctrines the commandments of men; or, in other words teaching to observe things which Christ has never commanded. How important then that the New Testament be diligently searched, both by preachers and hearers, to see whether all the things taught by the preachers, are what Christ commanded the apostles. The commission, or command of Christ to teach all that He commanded them, fully implied that they were to teach nothing else, and as we have noticed the importance of the churches and the ministers searching the record of the commands to be observed, we will add that Christ has by His apostles taught, that when one speaks the others shall judge. And as all the Lord's messengers are called angels, It is said that the saints shall judge angels. There is an awful responsibility resting on the churches, that they should judge righteously on this subject. They are not however, to judge of a minister by the length of his face, nor the number of his admirers. He may be very grave in his appearance, and eloquent in his discourse, and still be no more than a sounding brass or tinkling cymbal; but the standard of judgment Is the New Testament. "Beware of men who come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves." "If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, (that which Christ and his apostles taught,) receive him not into your house," &c. If Paul, or an angel from heaven preach as the apostles did not preach, let such be accursed. And the necessity of ministers searching the New Testament as their standard, is fully implied in their commission, for where else shall they look for His commands? In the scriptures the man of God is perfect, thoroughly furnished to every good work; and as every good work is thoroughly furnished In the scriptures, no work can be good In the divine estimation which the word does not enjoin.

To speak of every particular thing which Christ has commanded, would require more space than we can find for this article. And, although we have no right to attach more or less importance to one command of Christ than to another, yet such as seem to be the most neglected, or the least understood by the saints, should be dwelt upon more especially on that account.

One very important command, although a new one, is that the saints should love one another. Now who will presume to think that it is sufficient for the minister of Jesus simply to remind his brethren that there is such a command, if the ministers are themselves indulging in biting and devouring one another? They are to be ensamples to the flock, and so teach by example as well as proclamation.

Christ has commanded that all who love Him should keep His commandments; and through His apostles He has taught us that to fulfill His law, we must bear one another’s burdens. Christ has commanded that all who would be His disciples, should deny themselves, take up their cross and, follow Him; and the grace of God that bringeth salvation, which hath appeared unto all men, (Jews and Gentiles,) has taught us, or is teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. Here a command of Christ is implied, that self shall be denied of all ungodliness; the flesh is depraved, and the carnal appetite is craving that which is ungodly, evil, pernicious and contrary to the faith. Let the ministers of Jesus solemnly, faithfully and in the fear of God teach, in their preaching and by their example, that these things are to be denied. Teach them how to live. Ministers are to institute no new laws or rules, for the law is laid down, the rule is given. Let it be enforced, let it be taught by precept and by practice. Live soberly, not drunken with wine, wherein there is excess. It cannot comport with the high and holy and heavenly calling of saints, that they should be tipplers or given to much wine, for in such carnal indulgence they find not the footsteps of Christ, nor of His flock. Teach them to live righteously, and remember that nothing can be righteous which is not embraced in the examples and commands of Jesus Christ, and that nothing can be unrighteous that He has enjoined. Teach them to live godly, possessing the love of God, the fear of God, and a desire above all things to glorify God, in their bodies and in their spirits, which are His, let the cost be what It may; although it is certain that If any man will live godly in Christ Jesus, he shall suffer persecution.

But to avoid persecution, no child of God is at liberty to depart from a strict and undeviating course of godliness. Christ has given commands in regard to the order of His church: who are to be admitted, and who retained in the fellowship of the church. He that believeth and is baptized, whether Jew or Gentile, whatever he may have been; whether a moralist or a murderer, a persecuting Saul or a devout Pharisee; if born again, and recipients of the faith of God’s elect, gladly receiving the word, they must be baptized and added to the church, received into the fellowship of the saints, and admitted to all the privileges of God’s house.

He has commanded how ministers and other members are to conduct themselves in the church; all the rules of order and discipline are given perceptively In the New Testament. To watch over one another; exhorting, admonishing, warning, encouraging, comforting and edifying one another; speaking in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs, and not forsaking the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is. He has commanded what course shall be observed when one brother has ought against a brother, or when one brother has trespassed against another. All the steps that are lawful or expedient to reclaim the offender, are clearly laid down, and the servant of Jesus should teach the saints to observe them all. The course to be observed by the church when her members are come together in the name of the Lord Jesus; how she Is to dispose of heretics, after the first and second admonition. If any is called a brother, be a fornicator, or covetous, or an Idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such an one no not to eat; therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person. Let the saints of God be taught by the faithful ministry of the word to observe all these commands, together with all others enjoined by Christ.

MEANS.

IT may be proper for us in replying to our correspondent to state our reason for the apparent neglect with which we have treated his former letters on this subject; and, first, we say candidly, we have not felt under any obligation to open our columns to the defense of doctrine in which we do not believe, and for the defense of which our paper has never been positively nor impliedly pledged, and of that character we hold the means doctrine, so far as we understand it to be.

2. It has been a matter of deep solicitude with us to avoid, so far as possible, needless and unprofitable jargon and contention, having already learned painfully that "a burned child dreads the fire."

3. We have been able hitherto to fill up our columns with what we have conceived to be more profitable and acceptable matter.

4. Because that the great number of queries would require as great a number of replies, and the numerous passages of scripture of which brother Sperry demands of us an explanation, and the entire irrelevancy of the greater portion of them, to the points where he seems anxious to apply them, affords but a dim prospect of our being able to satisfy the mind of our worthy querist, or of stopping the gainsayings of arminians upon the subject.

5. And lastly, because we conceive that the means doctrine has been met and ably refuted by eminent brethren in the region where it has made its appearance in guise of Old School Baptist doctrine.

Our object, even now, is not a strife for mastery, nor the indulgence of a spirit of retort, but the hope of being able so to present truth and oppose heresy, as to be of some service to such honest inquirers after truth as may be confused and unsettled on the subjects involved.

Brother S. assures us that his object in stating his queries, and insisting on a reply, is not to elicit controversy, for he is not a believer in controversy. It is well he has informed us of the fact; for, from the circumstance of his pressing his queries on us, whom he knew to be at anti-podes with the means doctrine, and from the manner in which he speaks of passing the subject to brother Trott, whom he considers always ready to fight, sword in hand, we should certainly have suspected that our quiet and peace-loving brother was almost willing to risk a battle on the subject. But this may show us how liable we are to be mistaken. Brother S. wants no controversy; he don't believe in it; he only wants, and (pardon us) is determined to have a hearing.

We beg leave here to digress from the subject a moment, to say that w-e have several communications on hand on other subjects, and from various quarters, from brethren who are equally opposed to strife and controversy, and who are unwilling to allow us to suppress them when we know they will provoke unpleasant contentions. But to return to brother Sperry's letter, the next item of which charges some divines among the Old Baptists, so called, of leaving the principles or doctrines maintained by our old standard writers of the Old Baptists order, and qf introducing new theories, &c. Who the implicated divines are, we are not told; but it is very natural to suppose that those who contend that it is immediately and exclusively the work of God to quicken and regenerate souls, are intended; that the new doctrine lugged in, is that salvation is of the Lord. It would be cruel for us to think that our brother alluded to any but the apostles of the Lamb, as standard writers of the Old Baptist order, as no consistent, well-informed Old Baptist ever regarded any but inspired men as standard writers for the church of God. If our deductions, inferences, &c., are correct, our Correspondent charges those who hold with its that the giving life, to the dead is exclusively the work of God, with departure from the apostles' doctrine, and of bringing heresy into the church, defiling the temple of God, and exposing themselves to swift destruction. But as no controversy is designed, we must conclude that our brother does not wish us to controvert the charges, but allow them to pass uncontradicted, seeing that a defense of the accused Divines would involve controversy. But for himself, he chooses to examine the subject a little be fore he swallows the Campbell, or camel. It is difficult for us to conceive how a soul can be born again without swallowing the camel which we understand him to allude to, namely, that it is independently and exclusively the work of God to regenerate the soul. We appeal to the experience of every child of God, and where shall we find one who is not thoroughly convinced that there was no eye to pity, no arm to save; that all hope had fled, and all means had failed to bring relief to him in his distressed and distracted state and condition, and that when peace and pardon came, they came by the manifestation, by the Holy Spirit of Jesus Christ unto him as his Savior? If it be a camel to believe that God without the help of man or use of means commands light to shine out of darkness, shines in the heart of his redeemed, that he gives life to the dead, sight to the blind, hearing, to the deaf, and peace and salvation to the poor condemned and lost sinner, then that camel must be swallowed; or, to speak without a parable, the doctrine must be experimentally received or no man can see the kingdom of God. Whatever novelty brother S. may detect in the theory in which his brethren attempt to set forth this doctrine, the doctrine itself is as ancient as the salvation of poor lost sinners.

Brother S. assures us that he had addressed his queries to us as to a teacher in Israel, whom he anxiously looked to for an answer. Here again we were at fault, for we honestly thought from the manner of stating the queries that the design was rather to teach than to be taught, nor did this impression altogether vanish when our brother referred his queries to one more valiant and fearless than ourself; but "to err is human, to forgive is heavenly;" we hope our brother will consider it so. Those cases which brother S. reminds us of, that we have referred to brother Trott, were so referred, from a consciousness of his superior ability to do them justice, and not because we thought him ready to fight his brethren, or indifferent to their feelings; and in the case of these queries, after we have written all that time and circumstances will permit us, we shall probably leave ample room for brother Trott or any other brother to express their views Upon the subject. In noticing the queries, as they are very numerous, we shall be under the necessity of studying brevity.

Query 1st relates to a dollar which our brother says he has sent us for sister Jewett, for which he has seen no receipt. We have been in the habit of receipting all money received for her, and of applying it according to her direction; the dollar in question we have no recollection of, but as brother S. has sent one, whether it has ever reached us or not, we will hand one dollar to sister Jewett, on his account, and in her behalf thank him for the favor.

2. The second query, if so it may be called, has the form of a reminiscence. Brother S. remembers when Old Baptist preachers talked much about primary and efficient cause, and also of secondary causes, and so (ho we; but we do not recollect of even hearing them refer to any scriptural authority for making such distinction; and as we read of no such distinction in the good book, as having been used by the standard writers of the New Testament, we are of time number who "hardly know what such language means." We know of but one cause adequate to the production of life and salvation, and that cause is both Alpha and Omega, First and Last, Beginning and Ending, the Almighty. If our brother knows of another, or a second, he is welcome to it.

3. The third proposition has the form of a challenge, rather than of a query, and our querist takes firm ground, not of a pupil instruction without controversy, but of one whose mind is fully made up on the subjects involved. If the brethren can reconcile the difficulties which he has started with the theory of the anti-means party, he will submit, &c. Thus it seems he would task the anti-means party with means to use in his own conversion, and if he cannot be convinced without the use of means of his own appointment, he will not be converted at all. This is ultra ground; it is going the whole figure. But has he really determined that the Lord shall not convince him of error in any other way? Alas for such rashness! For our part we know of no anti-means party in the church of God. The church is a unit, one body, not a heterogeneous mass of factions, and although her borders may be infested with the retailers of heresy, she to whom the sacred name of church belongs has but one Lord, one faith, one baptism. She is called in one hope of her calling, and all her children are taught of God. Those who cannot bear her doctrine, though they may have a name to live, are dead, and belong not to her.

4. “The entrance of thy word giveth light.” A strange passage this to prove that God depends on means, or makes use of means in quickening dead sinners! What is the Word? How doth it enter? “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.” This Word is eternal life, living and abiding for ever where it enters; and having entered, it is Christ in you, the hope of glory. In him (the Word which enters) was life, and the life was the light of men. Well might the Holy Ghost through the psalmist declare, “The entering of it giveth light.” But how does it enter? "God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." – 2 Cor. iv. 6. The vulture's eye cannot perceive the application of means, as they are called, in this. Reference is made to the creation of the world. What means did God use when he commanded light to shine out of darkness? Let there be light, he said, and there was light. He spake the word, and it stood fast; he commanded, it was it done. "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow, from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." – Isa. lv. 10, 11. Those who believe that God regenerates, quickens and communicates light to the dead, independently of means or second causes, ask for no stronger testimony than we have in the very text first quoted for the refutation of this glorious doctrine. We certainly should doubt the evidences of regeneration in any man who would tell us that the entrance of the word which giveth light, in the sense Of the text, was designed to mean the words of ministers or saints in preaching, warning or exhorting dead sinners. When, where and how has a dead sinner ever beer, enlightened but by the immediate power of the Holy Ghost? The natural or dead man cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. – 1 Cor. ii. 14. God has hidden these things from them; and they cannot see the kingdom, nor the things of that kingdom, except they be born again. – John iii. 3, 7. That an interchange of ideas from one man to another, even in a natural or unregenerate state, may enlighten the natural judgment of man in theories of religion, and cleanse them externally like a washed saw, or purge them like a sickened dog, and leave them still with all their unclean propensities, unchanged, to return to their vomit or wallowing in the mire, is not denied; and that the operation of means will produce mocking Ishmaels and carnal, graceless professors of religion, is very apparent; but the sons of God, the heirs of glory, are born of an incorruptible seed, by the entering of that word which liveth and abideth for ever. Nothing can be more clear than that they only who are begotten of God are the sons of God, while they who are begotten of means are the children of means.

5. The next text which we are required to harmonize with our view of salvation alone of God, is Heb. iv. 12. "For the word of God is quick [or life] and powerful," &c. If our correspondent had told us wherein he thought there was a want of harmony, we might direct our remarks to such difficulties, but for our life we can see no discord between this scripture and the doctrine we hold. If he has brought this text forward to apply to words which are preached, or articulation of sounds from the preachers' voices, he has greatly mistaken the text, as nothing could have been farther from the apostle's meaning, or more remote from the subject of gospel rest, on which he was treating. The word of God is vital, or quick, not the word of man. "It is the Spirit," says Jesus, "that quickeneth, the flesh, (or means,) profiteth nothing. The words which I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life," or quick. Now if brother Sperry has preachers out in Ohio who can speak life-giving words, words that are quick, or quickening, let them go on and raise the dead and cast out devils, and so demonstrate that they have the power which they claim; but let them not appeal to the bible, for that book bears testimony against their presumptuous pretensions, and stains the pride of human ambition. Let it not be forgotten that that word comes only from the mouth of God; and it comes not thence as the result of means, but it comes as comes the rain and snow. What means would brother S. propose to produce rain or snow? and if human means cannot produce an effect in nature, how shall they be effectual in things which are of a spiritual nature? His words are such as never man spake. No man's words can discern the thoughts and intents of the heart, nor divide asunder the soul and spirit, but the word of God can, do all this.

6. "Is not my word like fire," saith the Lord, "and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?" All that are born of God know that God's words are as represented in these figures, but they also know that man's words and man's means are nothing like these figures; hence this passage we use to prove the opposite of what is called the means doctrine, unless we can be made acquainted with some system of means by which we have power to cause God's words to be so spoken as to break the rocks, divide the seas, open the doors of death, and close the gates of hell.

7. "The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." But can men utter the voice of the Son of God? If not, how shall they use that voice as a means of saving sinners? Can that voice be uttered by any but him who called Saul, and who calleth his own sheep by name and leadeth them out? "I will cause my glorious voice to be heard, and will shew the letting down of my arm," &c.,saith God. Will the admirers of the doctrine of means tell us whether that cause is what they call first or second cause? God will not only utter his voice, hut he will cause it to be heard, and we confidently affirm that there is not another or a second power in heaven, earth or hell, that can cause the voice of God to be heard. We will say to brother Sperry in relation to this text, as Jesus said to the means using Jews, "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth," &c.; but what means does brother Sperry expect shall be used to produce either the utterance, or the effect of that voice.

8. “The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life.” Why so careful to keep back the other part of this text? “It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life,” and that exclusively of all fleshly power or means. Can the words of Jesus of spirit and life be spoken by any other than himself, or can others say to the winds and to the waves of the sea, “Be still!” and be obeyed?

9. “In Christ Jesus I have begotten you through, the gospel.” – l Cor. iv. 15. This text being the only one that has the slightest appearance of favoring the means doctrine, requires a careful investigation. The grand question involved is whether Paul was contending that the children of God, as such, were begotten by him, that he had regenerated them, had begotten them by proxy, or whether he used the term in the same sense as that in which he speaks of fathers and mothers in the church of God. One thing is beyond dispute that is in this text; he claims to be the further of such as he said he had begotten. No begetting of his could make them the children of any other than himself, nor did he claim beyond this. He says that he begat Onesimus in his bonds, and in the same sense he claims Onesimus as his own son. In the same figure of speech he claims Timothy and Titus as his sons. Not that he claimed to have been the cause of their regeneration any more than he was of their election, or redemption. The Corinthian brethren had many, or might in Paul’s supposition have had ten thousand instructors in Christ Jesus; yet they had not in the same relation and figurative sense. He does not claim that be was the instrument which God had used in begetting them, or that his preaching had been an instrumental cause or means of their regeneration, for that would not have constituted them his children, nor him their father. To us the sense of the apostle's words imply that their standing being like that of his own in Jesus Christ, by the election of grace, the redemption which is by the blood of Christ and the quickening power of the Holy Ghost, God had bestowed on him apostolic gifts, by which he was to occupy the distinction among his brethren of a father in the sense of the figure wherein he also spake of having travailed in birth for the distracted saints at Galatia, until Christ should be formed in them. – Gal. iv. 19 But, it will readily be perceived that travail had no allusion to their regeneration, as they had experienced that work long before, and the matter in which he travailed in birth for them, was that which formed the ground on which he called them his little children. As the children of God, Christ had been previously formed in them, they had began in the Spirit, had run well, &c., but they had become disordered by heresy, the means doctrine had got in among them and had bewitched them, and the apostle travailed for them until they should be restored to gospel order. Those who can believe that even Paul can or could produce the quickening and regeneration of a soul, must be strangers to the work. We once held a public debate with an arminian Presbyterian preacher, who contended that Paul actually regenerated all the members of the Corinthian church, but we never expected to have lived long enough to hear the absurd and ridiculous assertion made by a professedly Old School Baptist.

10. "Of his own will begat he us, with the word of truth." – James i. 18. Instead of honored instrumentalities, the whole power of producing the conception and consequent birth of the children of God is in this test accredited to "His own will" alone, that is, to the sovereign, immutable will of God, which proves the position we have taken in the preceding item of our reply. In the sense in which they were begotten of God, they were not begotten by Paul. Perhaps the means renders will try to make some capital of the words "with, the word of his power," construing the word of his power to imply instrumentality. One of two things must be intended by these words: "With the word," they were begotten by the Father of lights, spoken of in the context. Christ is the only begotten of the Father; but as a begotten emanation from the Godhead, he is the life of his people, head of his body, the church, mediator, &c.; as God he is self-existent, equally with the Father; but as the life and immortality of his spiritual body, he is the beginning of the creation of God, and the first born of every creature; and in this sense he only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, [not even by the magic Power of means,] whom no man hath seen nor can see; to whom be honor and power everlasting'. Amen. Now the one production of spiritual life w as what we understand to be the begetting of both the head and the body, so that if Christ as the Word is intended by James, the saints have a common origin with Christ their head, and both be that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one, for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren. Or, secondly, if by the word of truth we are to understand his word, as used Isaiah lv. 10, still there is no room for arminians to introduce a particle of means. The world was created by the same word. God said, "Let there be light." It was by the omnipotence of his word that all things came into existence, and we may with the same propriety talk of God's having used means in the creation, as in quickening his children.

11. "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God that liveth and abideth for ever." – l Peter i. 23. This is about the last text we would have expected to see brought forward to prove that the sons of God are born of such corruptible seed as means, works, instrumentalities, &c. How any enlightened christian can think that the words uttered by men are spirit and life, quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword, that they are an incorruptible seed, and that they live and abide forever, is truly more than we can comprehend; and to believe that such is the case, requires a stretch of what is called charity, beyond our ability. Is it possible than any who are born of God can believe that the incorruptible seed is communicated by what they call second causes? That seed which results in a spiritual birth, must of necessity proceed from a spiritual source. That which is born of the Spirit is spirit. It is so even in the unchanging laws of creation; to every tree and herb as well as to the animal creation God gave seed in itself for the propagation of its kind, but in no case seed in one tree or plant to produce those of another and different species.

12. “The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul.” What system of means men can make use of to bring the law of the Lord to act in the conversion of souls, is not stated; but if any is required it would contradict the plain declaration of the text, that that law is perfect; for that which is perfect cannot be improved or made efficient by something out of itself. Can the advocates of means tell us what means are used in putting this law in the inward parts of God’s new covenant people, and writing it in their hearts? The law is itself the governing principle which controls the affections, desires, hopes and emotions of a heaven born soul. God himself imparts and implants it. No part of the work is left to depend on contingencies.

13. “He called you by our gospel to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Not by our preaching, nor by our use of means. What then is the gospel? It is the Power of God unto salvation to every one that believes. It is Christ, the power of God, and the wisdom of God. The gospel is the thing preached, not the preaching. Strange that the distinction should be lost sight of by any who have ever felt its power. The gospel calls all who are saved, but the preaching of it has no such power. It was often preached by Christ and his apostles where it only occasioned the gnashing of teeth; but time gospel itself never failed, whether preached or otherwise applied to the soul, to produce salvation perfect and complete.

14. “Ye are clean through the word I have spoken unto you.” Shall we then understand that when our Lord speaks in the salvation of sinners, that he is only assaying to save them by the use of means I As well may we unite with the arminiain general atoners and conclude that the shedding of his blood was a means used to endeavor to procure the salvation of sinners, and dispute what the Holy Ghost has said, that by his stripes we are healed.

15. “Thy, word hath quickened me.” This is the very position occupied by those who deny the doctrine of means. His words they are spirit and they are life. His word, and nothing short of it, can quicken. He says unto the soul that is in its blood, Live, and that almighty word produces life, as when he said unto Lazarus, “Come forth,” or to the tempest, “Be still,” and there was a great calm.

16. “I had not known sin but by the law, and the law worketh wrath.” This is a very far fetched argument to establish the doctrine of means in producing life. The law working wrath is that which kills, but it cannot make alive.

17. “Look unto me,” (not to means,) “and be ye saved.” Who are called on to look, the living or the dead; those who have eyes, or those who have no eyes? The context says, “I said not to the sons of Jacob, seek ye my face in vain.” In calling his people to look to him alone for salvation, he gives the reason; for, says he, I am God and there is none else. It takes a God to save a sinner; if means could do it there would be no necessity to call on them to look away from means, and from everything else, to him who says in the same connection, “I am God, and beside me there is no Savior.”

18. “Preach the gospel to every creature,” (not only to the regenerate.) The words in crotchets are added. That the preaching of the gospel is ordained by Christ there is no doubt, whether the commission authorized the apostles to whom it was given to preach it to the old creation, or to every creature of the new creation, does not effect the present argument. It was to be preached, not used as a means for the regeneration of sinners. If the gospel, which is Christ, had not the power in itself without a system of collateral means, our Lord would not have prefaced that commission by a declaration, “All power in heaven and on earth is given into my hands; go ye, therefore,” &c. If part of the power were in the gospel, and part in means to be used, how could all power be in the hands of Jesus?

19. “So shall my word be that goeth out of my mouth,” &c. How shall it be? “Like the rain, and like the snow,” and are they, are either of them produced by the use of means? What nonsense!

20. “And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. And they went forth and preached every where, the Lord working with them and confirming the word with signs following. Amen.” That Jesus called, qualified, sent forth, and went with, and worked with his apostles with signs, &c., none will dispute; but that this display of his power and Godhead either says or implies that he is in need of means, or anything else to secure the great work of salvation, is denied.

We have noticed the twenty passages of scripture which were brought forward to sustain the doctrine of means, and find them all decidedly sustaining the opposite sentiment. And we have a right to believe that these scriptures are principally relied upon by the advocates of the means doctrine, or our correspondent would not have pledged himself to yield up the point if it could be made to appear that these scriptures were in harmony with what he calls the anti-means doctrine. If we did hot know. that, “It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps,” and that nothing short of divine power can deliver from the power of darkness, we should expect him immediately to give up the point. But there are some other arguments with which the letter is closed, which require our notice.

It is not the word means that we object to, but the unscriptural use which is made of it, in dividing the honor of our salvation with what that word is used to signify. This is what grates upon our ear, for we are taught both by the word and by the Spirit, that salvation is of the Lord. But we can find no system of means appointed of the Lord to be used by men, in the use of which God has promised to aid, them in their efforts to save sinners. It would not, therefore, remove the difficulty to change the name. Retaining the heresy is what we object to. The name has often been changed, and under a multitude of names the abominable doctrine has been wrapped up, and its deformity partially concealed, ever since the days of Cain.

MEANS.

(Concluded.)

THE old stale arminian hobgoblin difficulty is brought to bear against the doctrine of salvation alone of God, that, if the means doctrine is not true, there would be no use what ever for preaching, praying, exhorting, or anything else. This is what all arminians consider a “knock down argument.” Old Cain saw no use for Abel to live any longer if his doctrine was approved of God, and the utility of the ordinances of our Lord Jesus Christ, the preaching of the gospel, the prayers which are indited by the Holy Ghost, together with everything belonging to the order of the church of God is not only questioned, but absolutely denied by our correspondent, who virtually charges the head of the church with having instituted these things as useless lumber. May we not retort, Nay, but who art thou, O man, that repliest against God; that darest to denounce what he has appointed; and pronounce those things useless which have never been without their use among God’s dear children? Feeding the flock of God which he has purchased with his own blood, is denounced as useless, unless such feeding can be used as a means of making sheep. Prayer in which living souls hold converse with heaven, and breathe forth the desires, confession, thanksgivings, and adoration to God, is considered useless unless it can he made a machine for either raising the dead, or of so operating upon the unchanging God as to cause him to aid us in the regeneration of sinners. Exhortation which is injoined on the saints, has no utility with those who hold the means doctrine; and finally nothing else, of any use whatever, if the opposite of the arminian stuff be true. Well, our correspondent may depend on it, the opposite of this heresy is truth that shall stand when heaven and earth shall be dissolved, and when time shall be no more, and if there are those who profess godliness who cannot love it, we bless God there are others who have been made, to love it and to live upon it.

Our correspondent is mistaken in anticipating that we wilt say that we hold to all such means for building up, establishing, and comforting new-born children. We deny the application of the term means to, the institutions of the gospel; they are gracious provisions for building, comforting and establishing the saints, but they are not the means of doing that or anything else. Means is the name for a sort of machine used by workmongers, by which they expect to set the grace of God in motion; but preaching the gospel of Christ, praying, and every exercise belonging to the gospel, are put in motion by grace. This is the grand difference; the means doctrine reverses the order of things so as to even place the institutions of christianity under the control of men. Men turn the crank, use the lever, the wedge and the screw of means, and heaven and earth obey. Our eating, drinking and breathing, are not the means of our living, but the effect; for if we were not alive before we ate or drank, we should never have the one nor the other. We wish to set our face against the sly, insidious, God dishonoring doctrine of God’s helping men to regenerate sinners, because it is untrue, and no lie is of the truth.

If our brethren in the west who have been led away with this filthy trash, only wish to express the idea that preaching, praying, &c., are appointed for the comfort, establishment, &c., of the saints, why do they raise so much clamor about it, seeing there are none who dispute such a position? But from what we understand them to mean and to say, we can ‘make nothing more nor less of their doctrine than down-right arminianism. But hold! Here comes another query, viz.:

21. “Can you prove that God sends his Spirit in the one case and not in the other?”

We have already said we believe that God is both Alpha and Omega in all that he does in creation, providence and grace; we do not believe that he is second to us in any of his operations. Instead of sending his Spirit to second our motions in any thing, he, by his Holy Spirit, quickens dead sinners, unaided by men or angels; and by the same Spirit he raises up his ministers, and they are directed by his Spirit to preach, and all the “exercises of his children are produced by the Spirit,” which Spirit is uncontrolled, unbiased and unaided by them.

22. “Pray, what comfort or joy do the children of God enjoy from preaching, if God does not accompany the word by his Holy Spirit “ This is to us a hard question; for we know of no gospel preaching where the word is not administered in the Spirit. The preacher’s words may often be at random, cold, lifeless, and carnal, but such is not gospel. The work of the Spirit is not to warm up and enliven the cold, dull pratings of the minister; but the Spirit prepares the preacher, provides the message, gives the door of utterance, and at the same time prepares the hearers to hear, and their hearts to rejoice in the truth thus ministered unto them.

“If it is his good pleasure and will to send his Spirit with his word to comfort his children, why not send his Spirit with his word to awaken dead sinners?” The word which quickens dead sinner’s is itself spirit, and it is life; the testimony of those who have experienced the life-imparting power of that word comforts those who are prepared by the Holy Ghost to receive the testimony. But the testimony is one thing, and the thing testified of is quite another. The word testified of can quicken the dead and comfort the living, but the mere articulations of a minister’s voice can do neither. Sometimes the term “Word,” in the New Testament means Christ, as John i. 1; sometimes it means the quickening operation of the Holy Ghost, as where Jesus testifies, It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing; the words which I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life. In this sense the word is spoken of in connection with the regeneration of the saints. Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of an incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. If brother S. only intends to be understood that God sends his servants to preach Christ, and at the same time sends his Spirit to quicken dead sinners, and qualify them to hear and profit by the word preached, we shall not differ; but if he contends that the preaching of the gospel by the ministers of Jesus is a means to procure the quickening operation of the Spirit, we must differ. Indeed the same Spirit that sends the minister of Christ, and enables him to preach the word, quickens the sinner, and qualifies the living saint to profit by the preached word. But one is not to be regarded as a means or instrumentality for procuring the other. Thunder is not a means for procuring rain, neither is rain a means for procuring thunder; yet God in providence often sends them together. The Spirit is not the means, but the cause of God’s ministers preaching; so neither is the preaching of the gospel the means, but the effect of the Spirit’s operation.

Again, our correspondent says, “God is not limited.” Certainly not as to power to execute his sovereign and eternal purpose, and therefore he cannot require means to aid him in the quickening of his redeemed people; but ye are not, consequently, to infer that he has no fixed and definite mode of communicating life to the dead; that he effects this, sometimes in one way, and sometimes in another, as sometimes through means, sometimes by means, and sometimes without means. He has revealed to us but one way of salvation, and that is altogether of, by, and through our Lord Jesus Christ. The case alluded to by brother S. of the remark of an anti-means preacher would be more in point if the anti-means man had not involved the doctrine of means by his if. “There is,” says brother S., “but one way for every child, or heir of promise, to be brought to the knowledge of the truth, and that way is fixed in the eternal mind, unalterably fixed.” We understand him to mean that there is one way for each, or perhaps as many ways as there are children or heirs to be brought to know the truth; but while we admit there is or may be a variety of circumstances connected with the experience of the children of God, we contend that there is but one way, fixed, unalterably fixed, in the eternal mind, for bringing all the children and heirs of promise from death to life; and that one way is by immediately communicating life to them, without the aid of any intermediate cause, power, agency, means, or instrumentality whatever; and we are equally sanguine, with him, that God will not be frustrated in the accomplishment of his designs.

The allusion made to John Bunyan’s being awakened through a lewd woman is begging the question, for he has not proved that God did awaken or quicken John Bunyan through a lewd woman, or through any other name or medium than Jesus Christ, and we should be very sorrowful, while the testimony of Christ is before our eyes, that no man cometh to the Father but by him, to have brother S. prove that John Bunyan or any other person had received life and salvation through a lewd woman; at such proof heaven would be astonished, and earth would tremble. We do not dispute that after John Bunyan was quickened by the Holy Ghost, he might have received some of his first impressions concerning his sinful and lost estate from a lewd woman, or from any other circumstance; but at the same time it must be confessed that if he had not been previously, or at least simultaneously, quickened by the Spirit, the circumstances of the lewd woman would have passed without making any unusual impressions on him. The first thing seen or sensed by a living person cannot be the cause of his having life, but it is an evidence that he is alive.

Perhaps the most extraordinary passage in the whole letter of brother S., coming as it does from a professed Baptist, is this, "For to contend that God cannot, or does not, give faith until a man is regenerated and born again, is repugnant to the word of God." Well, we do contend that God does not give faith to an unregenerate person. Faith is the substance of things hoped for; and what hope has a dead sinner? It is the evidence of things not seen; and what does the unregenerate man see? Without it he cannot see God. Without being born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. "Marvel not [O Nichodemus] that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." The unregenerate man is a natural man, and the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. And faith is one of the things of the Spirit of God; for the fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, &c. If God gives faith to a sinner before he is regenerated, then faith is no evidence that a man is born of God; and what evidence can any person have that he is a child of God, if God gives it to unregenerate men? If this position could be established it would prove that faith is by no means peculiar to God's children, and Abel may be in hell! The illustrious catalogue of saints mentioned in the xi. chapter to the Hebrews, who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens, &c., might after all have died and gone down to hell in an unregenerate state. If unregenerate men are the recipients of faith, all these may have been unregenerate men. If such a sentiment does not deny the faith, we know not what language can. Is it possible that a heaven born soul can breath out such doctrine?

In support of this position, namely, that God gives faith to men before they are regenerated, this text is brought. “He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that seek him.” We have never met with even a professed arminian who would contend that the coming to God mentioned in this text had reference to the work of regeneration, much less that sinners must profess faith as a prerequisite to regeneration. The same text is prefaced thus: “But without faith it is impossible to please him; for he that cometh to God must believe,” &c.

This text is in perfect harmony with the words of Jesus. “God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth.” The whole epistle to the Hebrews was addressed to “Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling,” and the whole theme of the inspired writer was to show the distinction between the legal dispensation of, carnal ordinances and its worldly sanctuary, and the dispensation of the gospel, and that the law was not of faith; its provisions were, the man that doeth the things enjoined by the law should live by them. But the righteousness which is by faith. speaketh on this wise, “Say not in thy heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring Christ down from above; or, Who shall descend into the deep? that is, to bring Christ up from the dead,” &c. Although under the old covenant of works, much was to be done of manuel labor as a sort of means of temporal prosperity, yet under the gospel no means are to be used to bring Christ down, or to bring him up, for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with, the mouth confession is made unto salvation. Now seeing that it is with the heart man believeth, we ask, is it with his old heart of stone, his unregenerate heart, that man believeth unto righteousness, or is it with his new heart and new spirit which God has promised to give his people? "He that cometh unto God." Does the unregenerate or the regenerated man come to God believing that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him? If, as brother S. contends, it is the unregenerate man preparatory to his regeneration, let us not forget that "No man cometh to the Father but by me." Hence, if an unregenerate sinner comes to God it must be by Christ as the only medium of access, for he is the only way. And if a sinner can have faith, and can come to Cod through Christ, without regeneration, to qualify him to see the kingdom of God, what need is there for regeneration?

We call on brother Sperry to turn to Hebrews xi. 6, and read his text, and with its whole connection, and then say if he himself believes soberly that unregenerate men can possess that faith which is. the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen; by which the elders obtained a good report, and through which we understand the worlds were made by the word of God, &c. The allusion made to Paul's being sent to some places, and not suffered to go to others, shows he was subject to the government of the Spirit, and not that the Spirit was, through some magic power of means, governed by Paul. He was truly sent to places where God had much people, but he was not sent among them to use means for their regeneration. Philip was not sent to quicken and regenerate the eunuch; that work was performed by the Holy Ghost, and Philip was sent to preach Christ to him, and to baptize him. "Feed my sheep," "Feed my lambs." Feed the flock of God, is the commission; but the ministers of Christ are no where directed to make sheep, or to use means for increasing the flock of God.

"And what business, suppose ye, the apostle Paul would have amongst a parcel of dead sinners?" It was the business of the apostles to go where they were sent, and to tarry wherever the Lord commanded them to tarry; but if the Lord had intended to make it the business of Paul to regenerate the much people in that place, he would have told him so; but he was not so informed. The events showed that Paul was to preach the gospel, and "He that had an ear to hear, was to hear what the Spirit said to the churches." Paul had no ears to give to those who had none; but he had a message for such as were, by the quickening operation of the Holy Spirit, prepared to gladly receive the testimony which he bore. If the preaching of Paul had been a means used for quickening dead sinners, why were not all to whom he preached exercised alike? Will not the same cause, under similar circumstances, produce the same effect? But Paul's preaching was invariably, to the Jews, a stumbling block, and to the Greeks, foolishness; but unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ, the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Until God called sinners from death unto life, gospel preaching was unto them a stumbling block, and foolishness, a savor of death unto death, far enough from being a means of quickening them. The allusion also to the vision of Ezekiel, of the valley of dry bones, is equally unavailing for the purpose of proving the efficiency of means. All these dry bones were the whole house of Israel, who say, Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts. Therefore the Lord bade the prophet prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will – what? use the prophesying of Ezekiel as a means of raising you out of your graves ? Not at all. Ezekiel was not to raise them, nor to help raise them; neither was God about to raise them through the means of Ezekiel or his preaching; but Ezekiel was to declare what God had said that himself would do. Say unto them, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live; and I shall place you in your own land; then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord. The Lord purposed, the Lord spake, and the Lord performed; and all that Ezekiel had to do, was what all God's ministers have to do – to testify of the grace of God, tell of God's purpose, of his promises, of his power, and of the deadness, dryness, inability and utter dependence on the life-giving power of their sovereign God. Strange that a professedly Old School Baptist should wish to divide the quickening power between God and means.

Having noticed, as we believe, every item of the communication of brother Sperry, we will say in conclusion, that we have endeavored to use great plainness of speech, without designing to employ one word of unkindness. We honestly believe, as our remarks will show, that the means doctrine, as it is called, is a heresy of no trifling magnitude. That it has been suffered in the all-wise providence of God to annoy the churches for the purpose of purging the Old School community of corruptions, for the trial of the faith of the saints, and that its final tendency will be to relieve our churches from excrescences which do not belong legitimately to the mystical body of Christ, we have no doubt. Many have attached themselves to the Old School Baptists, simply because they were opposed to the Popular institutions of what is falsely called benevolence, and not from a unity of sentiment with the primitive saints in regard to the doctrine of the gospel of Christ. If in any part of our reply our language should seem unnecessarily harsh or severe, let it be remembered that we have been urged by the author of the communication which we have received, to publish it. We have not sought for an occasion of controversy, but on the other hand held back until we were confident that our backwardness to go into the investigation was being construed by the means party into a tacit endorsement of their heresy. We sincerely hope that such of our brethren as have become bewildered with this mischievous means doctrine, may be enabled to compare it with the scriptures, anti with their own experience, and be no longer like children tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine. Towards brother Sperry, as an old and valued correspondent and faithful friend of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, we entertain the kindest feelings and profound regard; but for the doctrine embraced in this communication, we feel unmingled regret that any of our dear brethren should be captivated by it. May the Lord deliver them from all error, and lead us all by his unerring Spirit into all truth, for his mercies' sake. Amen.

MEANS.

IN this number will be found another letter from Deacon L. Sperry, on the subject of means, in which, after a deep conviction on his mind that there is not a shadow of difference between us on that subject, he proceeds to fill out three sheets of manuscript, in which he labors to prove that his position is right and that we are wrong. We presume that brother S. is the only reader of the SIGNS who, after a careful examination of his former letter and our reply, has come to the conclusion that there is no difference between us. We have either failed to write intelligibly, or he has failed to comprehend our meaning; for it was our design to express our unqualified dissent from the means doctrine, as stated and defined by him. But what seems truly remarkable is that after a thorough conviction, after reading our reply over and over, again and again, that we were agreed, that he shall attempt to prove that our views were in opposition to the testimony of the scriptures, and antagonistic of the experience of all the children of God.

The desultory manner in which brother S. has written his rejoinder challenges our ingenuity in framing a response. To notice every point in which he has laid himself bare to the lash of truth for castigation, would occupy more room than we have to spare. We shall only remark upon some scattering points and leave the subject.

He is confirmed in his first opinion, that the difference between the means and anti-means parties consists only in words. Does he mean to say that the doctrine of the two parties is identica1, and only differently expressed? We are loth to rate his powers of perception so very low as to think this can be his meaning; for the words used by the means party, as defined by himself, show that they believe that God speaks the word of life in quickening dead sinners through good men and through bad men, through his preachers, and through the devil's ministers, thus using them as means or instruments in performing the work of regeneration, while every syllable of this is denied in the most unequivocal manner by the advocates of truth, called the anti-means party. Words are signs of ideas, and the words used by the two parties are signs which not only indicate a radical difference of sentiment, but positively affirm the existence of such difference. The means doctrine is as old as sin, and has been preached and practiced in our guilty world ever since the first transgression of our parents in Eden; while on other hand, the exclusive power of Cod to save sinners without any intermediate agency, instrumentality, or means what ever, has been clearly demonstrated from about the same period to all those with whom God has deposited the secret of the Lord. Light and darkness are not more opposite, heaven and hell are not further apart, than the doctrine of means, and salvation alone of God. We will not question the honesty of brother S. ill his assertion; but we are bound to admonish our readers that in this very shape nearly all the heresies that have ever afflicted the church of God have been sided in. Error assuming to be truth, steals the livery of truth, and its advocates affirm that it is the truth, only differently expressed. This sneaking way of foisting in heresy should be promptly met and resolutely resisted by the soldiers of the cross.

Brother S. may have presumed too far upon our republicanism, which is not quite so elastic as to embrace all the doctrines which men have endeavored to palm upon the church of God, and wink at them because they are brought in by professed Baptists. True, brethren may interchange their views, and even differ in their judgment on many points without breaking fellowship, and a calm, dispassionate discussion of doctrinal subjects may be conducted through our sheet to profit and edification. But the moment a Baptist, a Paul, or an angel from heaven, shall attempt to divide the work of salvation and ascribe any part thereof to works, good or bad, of men or of angels, that moment we feel the force of the admonition, “Let him be accursed.”

As to standard writers, whatever may be the signification of the term in the Ashdod language, we still contend that inspired men of God are the only standard writers for the church of God. Webster defines the word standard to signify, 1, An ensign of war, a staff with a flag or colors; 2, That which is established by sovereign power as a rule or measure by which others are to be adjusted; 3, That which is established as a rule or model by the authority of public opinion, or custom, &c. While the latter sense may answer for all other sects, and their writers may be held as standards by them, if public opinion consents, the church of God cannot measure with a standard of public opinion; nothing short of that standard established by sovereign power will do for her. We read that when the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard, &c. Is it likely that the Spirit of the Lord will hold up uninspired men, such as Sperry, or Beebe, or Gill, or fuller, as a safeguard to the saints against invasion? Such standards might be easily taken by the enemy, and if taken, the cause is lost, and all who are represented by such standards would fall captive to the enemy.

Brother S. says he had hoped that we would have caught his idea in his emphatic declaration that he attached no power, influence or merit, to means, and that it possesses no procuring quality whatever. If he had left this frank declaration to speak for itself, without going on to add that he held the term means to be equivalent to the gracious provisions which God has made for the salvation of his people, we might have been satisfied. But his position taken as a whole says substantially, that there is neither power, influence, nor merit, nor procuring quality, in gracious provisions, or provisions of grace.

Now he is evidently as far from truth in attempting to divest the provisions of grace of power and merit as he is when attempting to enrobe his heathen deity, Means, with both. How then could we catch his idea. It would require unusual dexterity to catch an idea that shoots about so much at random; at one moment means is a name for a powerless fantom without merit or influence; and anon, it is an equivalent for gracious provisions, and so powerful and meritorious that God is himself dependent on it in quickening the dead. If he would have us catch such an idea, we beg he would hold it still in some place until we can lay our hand upon it.

It was not a mere change of names for the same things that we desired. The application of the terms gracious provisions to the doctrine of means is a prostitution of sound words to corrupt purposes. The provisions of grace, as we regard them, embrace a Savior provided, and in him the election, preservation, life, calling, regeneration, adoption, justification, and eternal glory of the church of God. The preaching of the gospel is also a provision of grace, but not a means of grace; and not as held by brother S., a kind of instrument, through which God speaks to dead sinners. The gospel of means may belong to dead sinners for aught we know to the contrary, but the gospel of God our Savior makes no address whatever to dead sinners; it addresses the living, the quickened, and them exclusively. It preaches glad tidings to the meek; it proclaims liberty to the captives; the opening of the prison to those who are bound. It is glad tidings of great joy; but what is its language to dead sinners? It is to the Jews a stumbling block, and to the Greeks foolishness; it is hid to them that are lost; for God has hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes; and babes is a term applied to children after they are quickened and born, but not before. It seems to be almost impossible for an arminian to understand that the quickening of a sinner is time forming of Christ in him. Christ only bath, and Christ only is immortality. He that hath Christ bath life, and he that bath not Christ is dead. That time communication of this life, this immortality to a soul is effected by the immediate power of God, that there is no medium in heaven or earth through which God the Holy Ghost communicates Christ to the dead sinner. It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing. After God has quickened a sinner, the gospel is good news, glad tidings, &c., but not before.

Brother S. reminds us of the old proverb, "The legs of the lame are not equal," for while he disputes our position, that the gospel is not preached where the Spirit does not attend the word, he asserts that the preaching of wicked men, and even grand imposters, who are destitute of the Spirit, is frequently attended with almighty power and yet he contends that man can do nothing only as God directs by bi Holy Spirit!

The simultaneous operation of the Holy Ghost in causing Peter to preach, and in pricking sinners in the heart on the day of pentecost, proves nothing in favor of the doctrine of means. It might be as plausibly argued that sinners being pricked in the heart was the means used to make Peter preach, as vice versa: seeing. as brother S. argues, these operations were simultaneous. For our own part we have no idea that their being pricked in the heart was being quickened hut it was evidence that the were alive, and being alive, by the quickening power of the Holy Ghost, was what made them sensitive to the preaching of Peter; but if Peter's preaching was a means of giving life to the dead, or, as brother S. contends, if his words were in themselves spirit and life, the whole multitude who heard the sound of Peter's voice would have been effected alike. The could hear Peter, or Paul, or even the Son of God himself preach, without being pricked in their hearts, until God gave them life. We know nothing about God's bringing good out of evil, only that Job says it cannot be done; or that no one can bring a clean thing out of an unclean; but that God overrules all events for his own glory, and causes the wrath and wickedness of men and devils to subserve his righteous purpose, as in the case of Joseph and his brethren, and the crucifixion of Christ, we have no doubt. It is a singular argument indeed, and one that we did not expect from brother S., that because God has spoken through his Sou, that if he does not now speak to dead sinners through men, he has lost his immutability! Does brother S. not know that God wrought in Christ many miracles, such as healing the sick, raising the dead, and casting out devils ? Will he say that if God does not continue to perform these miracles through the agency of men, he is changeable God? We know that at sundry times, and in divers places, God spake to the fathers by the prophets, and that in these last days he has spoken to us by the Son, whom he bath appointed heir of all things; but it really shocks us to hear a brother say, If God does not continue thus to speak, he is a mutable God! Moses and Elijah were seen by Peter and John on the mount, transfigured and enveloped in the cloud, out of which the audible voice of God the Father was heard, saying of Christ, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. Hear ye him." The law and the prophets were until John, but they have ceased to speak to our fathers. Christ, who is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believes, has come; the government is now upon his shoulder, and his name is Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, and the Prince of Peace. He is to have no successor as the personification of God n speaking unto men. God evidently gives his ministers ability to preach the preaching that he bids them; but there is a wide difference between his speaking and their speaking. He speaks the word, and it stands fast; he commands, and it is done. But we know of none of his preachers who have that power. When he says to the dead sinner, Live, the bands of death are loosed, and the portals of immortality are opened, and he that was dead comes forth.

Brother S. has reminded us that what God has joined, man is not at liberty to divide asunder; but let him be careful, and not unite in marriage parties where God has forbidden the bans. It would be a difficult matter for him to show that because God's ministers speak as the Spirit gives them utterance, that therefore the words of his ministers are spirit and life; that would illy comport with another part of the text, "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that Ï speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." Brother S's" criticism" on our remarks in reply to his perversion of the words, "He called you by our gospel," &c., is a failure, for we did not attempt an explanation of the text; we only showed that it could not apply as he had used it. Now, who were called by the apostle's gospel to obtain the glory of Christ, the living or the dead? Did Paul, or Peter, or James, or any other apostle call dead men to obtain the glory of the Head of the church? If so, when, where, and who? But in their preaching they thus addressed the saints: "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." – Col. iii. 1. The glory which Christ has with the Father is what the gospel calls the risen with Christ to seek, and to obtain; but if the apostles ever called any who were not risen with Christ to seek or obtain that glory, the page on which the record is found is not in our bible.

Brother S. is not satisfied with our reply to the 17th item of his former letter, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth, for I am God, and there is none else." – Isa. xlv. 22. We showed by the context, that. this command was addressed unto the seed of Jacob, and not, as brother S. says, to every creature indiscriminately. Does brother S. know that the seed of Jacob, spiritually understood, means the elect of God? If he does not, we refer him to Romans ix. 11-13; and that the elect are to be gathered in from the ends of the earth. If brother S. will prove that every creature without discrimination on the earth is called to look for salvation from God, we will prove by Rom. viii. 30, that whom he called, them he also justified. Their calling, no less than their justification and glory, is the immediate work of God. But brother S. used the quibble which is in the mouth of every arminian, "Many are called and few are chosen." We call this quibble, because it is garbled from a parable which our Lord spake upon a very different subject, and has no kind of allusion to the calling of sinners from death unto life. The nation of Israel had, in the sense of the marriage Supper, been bidden, but they were not the chosen people of God. Brother S. is evidently unwilling to be called an arminian; but his speech betrayeth him. There is scarcely an argument used by him in hi two long communications that is not current among the most rotten kind of arminians. He says, "The proclamation of the gospel appears to be to all indiscriminately." And on the other hand, we affirm that no such thing appears, either from the gospel itself or from what he can establish by argument, and we hope he will just stick a pin in this place, and remember that there is a shadow of difference between us. If the proclamation of the gospel is indiscriminately to everybody, and brother S. says it is, if the above text from Isaiah means what it says, then everybody indiscriminately will be saved as sure as there is a God in heaven. For the gospel is a proclamation of complete salvation, of peace and pardon, of justification from all things from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses. It proclaims liberty to some captives, or to all captives; brother

S. says to all the word of God says to the redeemed. The gospel proclaims the opening of the prison to them that are bound. Is it. a general jail delivery, or is the prison Only opened to debtors whose obligations were canceled by the Son of God? “To everybody indiscriminately,” says brother S. The gospel proclaims that God has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places. Brother S. says this is indiscriminately to everybody. Paul says its application is only “according as he bath chosen us in him (Christ) before the foundation of the world,” The gospel proclamation is, “For by grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.” Now will even the worshipers of Means pretend to say that this proclamation is to everybody?

He says that these passages are not the only ones he could bring. We know it. We have been familiar with the whole catalogue of passages relied upon by the arminians for over turning the system of salvation by grace alone from our youth up, and could rattle them over, if occasion required, with as much ease as a new light engineer of a front bench revival. But how awfully must the scriptures be perverted, and the truth of our God turned into a lie, or made to testify the opposite of what they declare, in thus garbling and misapplying their testimony. With our remarks upon the commission to the apostles he is also dissatisfied; he still insists on the application of his generalism. According to his theory, which he thinks is more orthodox than ours, the apostles were to preach the gospel to everybody, teach everybody to observe all things whatsoever Christ had commanded the apostles; and they were commissioned to baptize everybody. But did the apostles so understand, or so practice? By no means. They preached the gospel among the Jews and Gentiles; and as many as were ordained to eternal life believed, and those that believed were baptized. This included every creature belonging to the new creation, and no more. But brother S. has the apostles preaching to the men of Nineveh, Sodom, and to the antediluvians; not to either the old nor to the new creation exclusively, but to all indiscriminately! And upon this point he thinks the subject turns. Well, we are willing to rest it here. If the gospel is an indiscriminate proclamation to everybody; if it proclaims peace, pardon, salvation and eternal life to everybody, we must confess ourself ignorant of its application altogether.

He thinks it devolves on us, or on some good brother, to tell what purpose God has in causing his gospel to be preached. So far as God has made known to us his design we are ready to announce it: First, "It shall he preached for a witness unto all nations." – Matt. xxiv. 14. Here we have one object stated by our Redeemer. Another design to accomplish is "To feed the church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood." – Acts xx. 28. But if there be any scriptural authority for saying that God designed the preaching of the gospel to be used as a means through which to quicken dead sinners, it belongs to the means party to produce it.

We were not a little surprised to hear even brother S. say that our denying that the display of Christ's eternal power and Godhead either said or implied that he was in need of means or anything else to secure the great work of salvation, was equivalent, in his opinion, to denying every ordinance and institution of Christ, and saying that they were of no use. We can conceive of nothing short of mental derangement that could lead him thus to speak; but in evidence of his total aberration, he attempts to shame the firmament above, and commands the very heavens to blush! Blush at what? Why, that it should overspread a person who denies that Christ needs means, or needs anything else, to secure the great work of salvation. We leave our readers to judge whether the blush does not belong somewhere else.

To the question whether anybody ever knew of a whole family's being born at once, we answer, we have heard of a nation's being born in a day, but we cannot perceive what connection this question has with the subject under consideration. His allusion to the blowing of rams' horns around Jericho, so far from being the means of throwing down the walls, that brother S. more than half yields that point, and does not know that it caused the walls to fall. Neither do we; so we will let that argument pass for all that it may be worth.

We did not say that eating, drinking and breathing were not essential to the perpetuation of human life, but that they were not the means of our living; that is, they never produced life in a dead carcass; and as brother S. has tasked us with an experiment, we will requite his kindness by proposing to him the experiment on a dead body; let him stuff it with as much wholesome food as he can get down, and see if it will produce life, and if he fails in this experiment, let him give up the point, and own that eating, &c., are not the means of producing life. A quickened soul lives by faith upon the Son of God; but their so living wag not the cause of, or means whereby they were made alive. We shall not attempt an explanation of Paul's meaning, where he said that he rejoiced that Christ was preached, notwithstanding some preached of envy, &c., thinking to add affliction to Paul's bonds. But to brother S's conclusion that God's Holy Spirit was, or is administered through the agency of ungodly men, we enter our unqualified Protest. Truly such a version of Paul's views does not very well comport with brother B's views, nor the views of any other person with whom we have ever had correspondence, except brother S. As to the experience of the thousands to whom brother S. alludes, if in harmony with that sentiment, we could not regard them as gospel experiences. Any spirit communicated to them through the envious preaching of ungodly men cannot he the Spirit of Christ.

He does not know why, in alluding to Ezekiel's vision, we skipped over the first ten verses. Did he suppose it was necessary that we should comment on every verse in the bible? But he says he thinks it is most clear to every common sense reader that God wrought through, or by the prophet Ezekiel, to the quickening and making alive those dry bones. Well, if so, we are not a common sense reader; for we did not know that there were any dry bones quickened, and much less did we imagine that God quickened any by or through Ezekiel. We understand the whole to be a vision which the prophet saw, and that in the vision God caused the bone to come to his bone, and the breath, not of Ezekiel, but of God to enter them. And God interpreted the vision to Ezekiel very differently from the manner in which brother S. has to us. "Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel," not everybody indiscriminately. "Therefore prophesy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves," not by or through Ezekiel's digging, "and cause you to come up out of your graves," &c. "And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land; then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord." And we ask if there ever was an instance where God has opened the grave of a poor dead sinner, brought him out of his grave, and put his spirit in him, and that quickened sinner did not know that it was the Lord, and not Ezekiel, that had spoken and performed it?

But after all that has been said, brother S. hinges the whole "jet" of the subject on the question, "Is it, or is it not, clearly revealed in God’s word that God makes use of his gracious provisions, or instrumentalities (not men) in the awakening of dead sinners “ If he means by gracious provisions, what he has been contending for, instrumentalities or means, there is nothing of the kind clearly stated in the scriptures; for in the quickening of the dead, there are neither means nor instrumentalities used; bat if he means what God has provided, namely, life in Christ, election, predestination, calling, &c., which were provided graciously, none will deny that these provisions take effect when God communicates life to the soul; but that these are used as instruments, or as means of quickening the dead, is denied. His version of our admission is calculated to give a wrong impression; because we allow that the Spirit can and undoubtedly does sometimes quicken sinners, simultaneously with the preaching; he says that we allow that the word preached, and the Spirit and power are simultaneous, as though we had admitted that it were always so, or more frequently so, than otherwise, which was not out intention. We hold that it can neither facilitate nor retard the work of the Holy Ghost. In his contrast between his views and those of arminians, he comes, in many points, upon the anti-means ground, and, as above, excludes men and means from all power; but still he contends that God exerts his power in the work of regeneration by or through men and means. So bewitching is this means doctrine that those infected can frequently contradict their own words without being aware of it. The very same arguments and quibbles generally used by arminians are used by brother S. in attempting to sustain his darling bantling, Means, and all that he has admitted of the opposite doctrine, or nearly all, has also been admitted by John Wesley and other famous arminians. He demands, If the saints are fed through the preachers, or by the preaching of the gospel, why not quickened and made alive through them? Strange confusion of language! If a shepherd can feed sheep why can he not make sheep? God has given us natural life through Adam, and life coming to us, by or through him, makes us his children; and if God gives spiritual life through his preachers, the medium through which we receive it must constitute us the children of the preachers; not of God. When children are born, no nurse who may be employed to feed them can change their relationship as children; but if God's children are quickened through an intervening agent, then is there an intermediate father between them and God, which must effect, if not destroy, their heirship. But he asserts that it is just as reasonable and scriptural that they should be made alive by or through preachers, as to be fed, after being made alive, by the preaching of the word.

This wild assertion is followed by a chapter on charity; but, although charity may cover a multitude of sins, it can not reconcile this absurdity with the truth of God, nor have we a charity cloak sufficiently broad to wrap it up.

In our former position, which brother S. seems inclined to controvert, we assert that the church of Christ is a unit, and we are sustained by Cant. vi. 9, Eph. 11, 1622, and iv. 4, with as many other scriptural declarations as he will be able to dispose of conveniently. He allows there may he in some churches those who agree in all the essential fundamental doctrines of the gospel; but will he tell us what doctrine of Christ is more fundamental, or of more vital importance in the economy of salvation, than that which asserts that life and salvation is of the Lord alone? Truly, we believe that all must come up to the scribe, and, as far as we are enabled, we shall hew to the line, and let the chips fly. He admits that Paul did contend that "Salvation is of grace, and not of works." This is the very point at which we are now at issue. We contend that salvation is wholly of God; and he is laboring to wedge in the rotten arminian notion of means. He says, "Paul did not contend about means." True, for that heresy was known in Paul's day by other names. None more boldly contended that the quickening of the dead was exclusively the work of God than Paul. The charge that he used means for quickening the dead cannot be proved; and the foundation which Paul, as a wise master builder, laid is the same that brother S. and all his means fraternity are laboring to overthrow.

MEANS.

"They take up all of them with the angle, they catch them in their net, and gather them in their drag: therefore they rejoice and are glad."

"Therefore, they sacrifice unto their net, and burn incense unto their drag; because by them their portion is fat, and their meat plenteous." - Habakkuk i. 15, 16.

EULOGY.

O glorious Means! omnipotent in thy power, novel in thine appearance, and miraculous in thine effects. How greatly do the nations admire thee! The Scribes and Pharisees rejoice in thee. Work-mongers and Arminians bless thee! Deluded mortals put their trust under the shadow of thy wings! Ashdod and Moab are among thine admirers! Ishmael and Cain, with Esau and Goliah, are among thy mighty men! In thy praises the daughters of all the uncircumcised unite! To set forth thine excellency, the most popular, learned and influential clergy of modern times are zealously engaged! For thy service, Theological Colleges and Sunday Schools are greatly multiplied, and all who hate God and despise his salvation, and wantonly disregard his word, and do despite to the spirit of grace, are wont to bow obsequious at thy glittering shrine! Great is thine antiquity, and venerable thy hoary locks, for very age. Thine ancient wonders and thy mighty works of old, as with a sunbeam, record the history of thy demoniac renown.

No sooner had the light of heaven shone upon the new made works of God, in the morning of time, than thou wert there, even thou, and thy father, to teach the parents of our race the way to become as gods; and when their eyes were opened, and they saw with shame their nakedness, by thee a covering of fig-leaves was seasonably provided. To thee did Cain apply for reconciliation with the offended Majesty, from whom he had received his existence; and by the use of thee, O means! did he insult Jehovah, with an offering from the earth, then groaning under the weighty curse of God, - an offering which the Lord had not required at his unhallowed hands. And by the use of thee, his zeal waxed hot against the religion of his brother, who rejected thee. Yea, in his fiery zeal did he decree, in thy great name, the complete extermination of heresy from the new born world. A lasting monument of thy ancient works, was, at an early age, erected on the plains of Shinar, to stand coeval with the world, whereon, indelibly, thy name is written; and who, we ask, shall dare dispute that Babel’s mighty tower was the production of means? To thee, the incestuous origin of Moab and Ammon most unquestionably belong; and he doth wrong thee, who this truth denies. And by thine ingenuity were good old Abraham and Sarah, with their bond-women, enlisted in the enterprise of hastening the fulfillment of the promise of the God of heaven. Ishmael also is thy son, and all his numerous offspring have received their existence through thine instrumentality.

O means! if thou wert dead, what pen of scribe could write a fair biography of thy deeds of fame? To frame new gods for Israel’s fickle tribes, resort was had to thee. The borrowed jewels which once adorned the Hebrew women, quickly assumed the form and beauty of a calf, when Israel's mitred priest, in thy dread name, devoted them; and when amid the deafening shouts of all thy Hebrew worshipers, Aaron brought forth the god of means, how thou wert honored. To thy new gods, honors immortal were ascribed; and at the priest’s protracted-meeting, held before it, thousands of converts left the worship of the most high God, and bowed themselves to thee, and owned thy god as their deliverer from Pharaoh’s cruel yoke; nor did this revival cease, until an old school Moses preached his antiquated doctrine in their ears. To fill the land with prophets such as Ahab loved, and kill the prophets of the Lord of Hosts, that monarch sold himself for thee. And in thy name, thy daughter Jezabel, with zeal unequaled, spread her table to sustain thy troops. By thee, the men of Egypt wrought their miracles in the presence of the king, until thy stock of wisdom and of power were overdrawn, to imitate the plague of vermin.

Turn back thine eye, O Means, to days of yore, and in the retrospect behold the heathen world filled with thy temples, swarmed by thy missionaries, and finally worshiping no less that thirty thousands of thy gods. Then turn thyself around, and from the climax of thy splendid Babel look to every high hill, and under all green trees, in Israel, and mark the chosen tribes, in wild devotion burning incense on altars of brick, offering to the Lord swine’s flesh, and broth of abominable things. Yea, see them devoutly baking cakes unto the queen of heaven; all in thy use, and all to honor thee!

If, then, under the sable ages of the world, while the earth in darkness groped, thou wert the pride of princes, and the pillar on which the monarchies of nations learned, what art thou now? No sooner had the God of glory sent his Son into the world, than Herod came to thee for aid to slay the young child Jesus. To help him out, thy hands were stained with the blood of all the infant males, from two years old and younger, throughout his jurisdiction. To perpetuate the connection of church and State, and seal forever to the neck of Israel the yoke Which neither they nor their fathers were able to endure, the Jewish Rabbies had access to thee. In keeping with thy various transformations at that important period, thou didst profess a zeal for God. Then didst thou teach thy sons to swear that they had heard the holy Jesus blaspheme - that they had known him to break the Sabbath, eat like a glutton, and drink as a wine-bibber. They called him Beelzebub, and said he cast out evil spirits through the prince of devils; and to arrest the further progress of his doctrine, the earth was traversed, and the sea compassed, by thy missionaries of Pharisaic sentiments, to make one proselyte, who, when converted to thy craft, thou madest him more the child of hell than were the pious Pharisees. And further, if our recollection serves us, thou didst originate on one occasion, a tee-total abstinance society, in which no less than forty of thy sons not only pledged themselves to drink no wine or beer, but also bound themselves under a curse, that they would neither eat nor drink until they had killed Paul. Five times didst thou repeat thy forty stripes, in the case of Paul, as *means*to bring him into thy new measures; and once thou didst persuade him to shave himself, and be at charges. Poor Peter also used thee, to avoid the strong suspicions which attached to him, in consequence of the affirmations of a damsel. Judas, thy treasurer, held unshaken confidence in thee. He found thee useful in collecting funds to fill his bag; and through thine influence he was enabled at one time to lift a collection of thirty pieces of silver. It is true, thy disciple, Simon Magus, did not succeed when, for thee, he offered money for gifts of the Holy Ghost; but it is very evident that if Peter had really known that sinners were redeemed by silver, or with gold, he would not have sentenced the money with the wretch to perish. The money for thy service, would have been kept back.

Had the good Master approved thy doctrine as it is generally understood, and practiced by his professed disciples of the new school, so far from directing them to call upon the Lord of the harvest for laborers, he would have directed them to thee; and by thine aid, to rear up colleges, and Theological Schools, form National and State Societies, Missionary Boards, and to establish a thousand agencies in all parts of the land, to raise funds and inducements for pious, lazy young men, to enter the vineyard. But oh! how unfortunate for the ante-deluvian world - for Sodom and Gomorrah - for Tyre and Siden, and for ill-fated Jerusalem, that the marvelous power to moralize and christianize the world were hidden from their eyes) and the refulgent blaze of thy glory reserved for this wonderful day of Means, in which our lot is cast.

The present is a day devoted to thy service, distinguished from all former time as the peculiar day of means! In the developement of thy powers are brought to light the hidden things of dishonesty, and thou art known and acknowledged as the originator of all the popular modern religious institutions which claim the right to monopolize all the benevolence on earth. Thou art like a powerful locomotive, puffing, snorting, and letting off thy surplus steam, while thy thundering wheels, with sound of mighty power, makes nature tremble, and in thy train are found all the religious inventions of fallen man, drawn onward by thee with the most astonishing velocity. Thy splendid cars, bearing the names of every religious society under heaven - with the bare exception of the church of God - dash on with frightful celerity to consummate thy glory. To thee, the clergy of our day ascribe salvation; the pulpit and the press reiterate the sound that God has ordained eternal salvation through thy instrumentality; that thou art accessible to all men - that thou art even in the hands of all men, and if all will use thee, all shall be saved; and that the reason why any are lost is, because of their rejection of thy sovereign power to save. In the wonderful march of mind, characteristic of the present times, few, very few, are found who dare even pray to God for any blessing, temporal or spiritual, for time or for eternity, through any other name than thine. The name given under heaven and among men, whereby the apostle tells us sinners must be saved, sounds harsh, antiquated, obsolete and barbarous in the pious ears of those who admire thee. To justify the foregoing remark, we refer for testimony to the general language of what bears the name of prayer in every part of our land - "Lord, bless the means made use of for the spread of the gospel, for the revival of religion, for the conversion of the heathen, and for the evangelization of the world! Bless our Theological Schools, our Foreign and Domestic Mission Societies, our Sabbath Schools, our Bible and Tract Societies, with all other means made use of for the good of thy cause," &c. While on the other hand, sinners are taught to expect salvation through the use of means, and christians are gravely told that all their prayers to God to carry on his work and grace, to build up his cause and kingdom, to supply the walls of Zion with watchmen, to gather in his ransomed people, will prove abortive and vain, unless we apply ourselves to - means!

In the diversification of thy transformations, sometimes thou appearest as a mighty deity, having power to control the mind and will of the unchanging God, and causing him to forego his plans and adopt those which bear thy superscription; and when thou dost assume this god-like form, we are directed to depend on thee to aid us in persuading the Lord to convert our wives, our children, our neighbors, and the world at large - to bless our enterprises, and to give success to all our plans, and efficacy to all our measures. Anon, thou seemest like some net or drag by which the portion of thine advocates is fat and fall of marrow, and by which their meat is plenteous. Just as the silly fish catch at the angle .of the artful fisher, infatuated mortals grasp at thee; and like a net or drag, thou makest fat the portion of thy votaries, who, in return, with grateful hearts and willing hands, sacrifice to thee, and on thine altar burn their incense.

Before we close our eulogy, we would remind thee that all the numerous host of thy disciples have long applied to thee for aid to put down the Old School Baptists! and in thy cause they have not shunned to declare all manner of evil falsely against them, nor left a stone unturned,; yet why have they not, with all thine aid, prevailed? Because that he is mightier who stands for his people, than thou, with all thine armies. Hence, means, WE DARE THEE! Do thy worst, we dread not thy power. The God in whom we trust has set bounds to thy power, saying unto thee, as to the waters of the mighty deep, "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." And even shouldst thou be permitted to wear thine ancient costume of prisons, racks and halters - of gibbets, flames and faggots, as christians trust in God they fear thee not. Put on, therefore, thy most terrific forms, and, as far as in the lies, blast our reputation, operate against our worldly interest, confiscate our property, and even drench the earth with oar blood, still we defy thee, still we refuse to have our portion made fat by thee; for unto us thy base reproaches are greater riches than all thy treasures. The God in whom we trust is able to deliver us out of thy hands - and if not, be it known unto unto thee, O Means, we will not worship thy gods, nor bow down to the images which thou hast set up.

MEANS ONCE MORE.

IN our last number we called the attention of our readers to the subject of Means, and in a manner somewhat ironical, set forth some of the properties which means is supposed to possess; and for our eulogy we presume our Arminian neighbors will feel themselves greatly obliged. We are not willing, however, as yet to dismiss the subject of means, as we have somewhat further to say on this point, which we will endeavor to do in a more serious manner.

It has been reported by some, and believed by others, that we discard altogether the idea of God's using means or instruments for the accomplishment of his divine purposes. This charge is gratuitous and untrue. Although we do most positively deny the supposed power or efficacy of humanly invented means to facilitate the salvation of lost sinners, in the manner the doctrine is preached, believed and acted upon at the present day, we most freely admit, and firmly believe, that the all-wise and glorious God has appointed instruments by which he will accomplish his adorable purposes. This truth is clearly taught in the scriptures; but in the examples we shall give the reader will do well to mark the difference between the wisdom of God and the policy of men, in providing and bringing means into requisition. The unskillful management of man, as set forth in our last number, will form a striking contrast to the handiwork of God.

The first example we shall give of God's using means is that of the salvation of Noah and his family. (See Genesis.) The means made use of on this occasion was an ark; the plan, form and construction of which were. all of God. He that was able to dash a thousand worlds to death at a word, and amidst the general calamity say, "Let Noah and his family be saved," chose to pursue a different course. No part of the work was left discretionary with Noah, but all must be done agreeably to the divine instruction Noah received from God. The plan of man to save the human race from a devouring deluge was to build a tower whose top would reach to heaven; but the means which God employed to stop the progress of the work of Babel was to go down and confound their language. The train of means which God employed to elevate Joseph, and to humble his ambitious brethren, were such as human wisdom would have thought the most unlikely to succeed. The jealousy of Joseph's brethren, their envy and hatred, their murderous designs, their avarice and treachery, their selling him into slavery, did not look much like means to bring him into power and subjugate his brethren. The unmerciful Ishmaelites were another link of God's appointed means; by an all-wise decree they were on the spot at the appointed moment; had they delayed their journey a few moments, Joseph had been no more. But when the murderers saw them, Joseph was raised from the pit and conducted down to Egypt, where he withstood the temptation of his mistress, was falsely accused, unjustly condemned,thrown into prison, miraculously brought forth therefrom, and finally raised to the government of Egypt. Good old Jacob did not seem to understand or like the means which God made use of in this case.

The means which God employed to rid his ancient Israel of a rebellious king was to send an evil spirit with a commission to, Go and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all Ahab's prophets. These were ordained to persuade him to go and fall at Ramath Gilead; and that by lying to him, and saying that he should go and prosper, and the Lord would deliver Ramath Gilead into his hands. When the beloved Son of God was to fulfill all that was written of him, in law, and prophets, and psalms; wicked men and devils were God's sword. In many instances we are told by the evangelists of what they did "that the scriptures might be fulfilled." When but a babe we see the Holy Child chased down to Egypt by cruel persecution; and being called from thence, he turned into a small city, that the scripture might be fulfilled; from the manger to the cross, his life is loaded with reproaches, abuses, blasphemies and insults, and all to preserve the sacred volume inviolate. At length against him both Herod and Pontius Pilate meet, with men of Israel and the Gentiles, "for to do whatsoever (God's) hand and counsel before determined should be done;" the heathen raged, and the people imagined vain things against the Lord, and against his Christ; yet all these things were God's chosen instrumentalities for the accomplishment of what his hand and counsel had predestinated. And when the dear disconsolate disciples, on their way to Emmaus, journeyed and were sad, because of what their Lord had done and suffered from the hand. of wicked men find devils, our Lord reproved them, saying, "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have written, ought hot Christ to suffer these things and then enter his glory?" Heaven had ordained the accomplishment of all these things, and all requisite means for the accomplishment of the end were duly provided.

But ere we close our article on this subject, let us examine the means which God has ordinarily employed to facilitate the spread of the gospel ministry, not the making of ministers, nor the regeneration of souls, but the publication of the gospel. As the heavens are high above the earth, so the ways and thoughts of God do truly transcend the ways and thoughts of man. Let us contrast them. For the spread of what they pall gospel, men form large, popular and moneyed societies, establish permanent funds, call into existence unheard of, unscriptural and uncalled for begging agencies, establish dignified executive boards, &c., to induce by hire or bribery such as are greedy of filthy lucre to enter their field and labor under their ecclesiastical dictation. But how different is the plan of God; the means, if we may call them so, which he employed in the primitive days of his gospel church was to let loose the powers of wicked men and devils upon his dear servants, to persecute, whip, imprison, calumniate and distress them; and he had previously given them directions, "If they make up for you a full purse and a splendid outfit in one city, take it and go as their hirelings to another"? Not exactly so; but these were his words: "If they persecute you in one city, flee unto another." Such were the means which the all-wise God employed, and so when it became necessary to start them out about their Master's work, there arose a great persecution, and the saints were scattered, and they that were scattered went everywhere preaching the word. It was persecution, under God, that took Paul to Rome, and John to Patmos for the benefit of the Seven Churches; and persecution has been ever since employed by the great Master in compelling his ministers to traverse the earth with the ministry of the everlasting gospel. But mark! while the enraged Jews were made subservient to the cause of God in wickedly and maliciously persecuting the ministers of Jesus, they themselves had their popular religious preselyting missionaries out in all the land and sea, under good pay and easy circumstances, even as are their successors in the pharisaical crusades of modern times.

Down through the dark ages of Pagan, Papal and Protestant persecution, God has overruled all their rage and malice, and brought it to bear upon his servants in such a manner as to make them the more active in preaching the word of God everywhere. It was persecution in Europe that brought the pioneers of the gospel ministry to our beloved shores; and when they thought to sit unmolested and secure under their gourds, and enjoy that social felicity together for which they had bidden adieu their native countries, and for the enjoyment of which they had crossed the mighty deep, God prepared a worm to gnaw the gourd - it withered, it died.

Persecution then arose from the most popular party, (Congregationalists,) and they were scattered and went everywhere as God directed their way in providence.

At some future time, we hope not far distant, we intend to give our readers a more full account of the persecution of some of the first Baptist preachers, who went everywhere preaching the word, when there was no golden wedges or Babylonish garments in the camp to induce hypocrites and nominal professors to reiterate the ancient petition, "Put me, I pray thee, into the priest's office, that I may have bread." Our dear brethren in the ministry who have labored in the gospel when Baptist ministers preached at the peril of their lives, when instead of loaves and fishes they were treated with showers of stones, with tar and feathers; and in not a few instances, like old Elder Morse, who preached the gospel laying on his back in a broiling sun, with his feet made fast in the stocks; and when preaching a short time before his death at an association, brushed back his venerable locks and showed the scars and wounds received in the service of Christ – having been stoned while preaching Christ to the people. It was this kind of treatment that often drove the old soldier of the cross from his own fireside to penetrate the newly settled wilderness; and as he went he preached Christ.

When in this manner God had sent and sustained his gospel ministers until he had by them raised up churches throughout our Eastern and Southern States, their enemies, finding that they could not exterminate them from the earth, changed their tone, and said, "Come let us all build together." They crept in unawares, by peace and by flattery, as Daniel says, and when once in, there was war in the camp; the old veterans of the cross became targets for the new lights to shoot at. Grieved and afflicted, they were by persecution compelled to retire from their flocks, and being scattered, they went everywhere preaching the word, while their ill-fated brethren amalgamated with the Ishmaelitish multitude of new measure converts, were left to go hungry, or like the prodigal, strive to fill themselves with the husks which the swine do eat.

Pastors by this description of means were furnished for the far West; hundreds from Virginia and other States went out to find a peaceful home where the cry of the panther, the growl of the bear, the howling of the wolf, and the yell of the savages, were to them less dreadful than the persecution from which they had retired. Here in the uncultivated wilderness, they little suspected that the dandy cut clergy of the older States would molest them; nor was -there .any danger until they had subdued it, and made it literally a fruitful field - when cities and villages were springing up, and when they had finished the ministry which God had intended by them in these places; then the flood-gates were opened, and their churches were soon inundated with young men from theological schools, who were sent over, not to escape from persecution, but under the patronage of the popular religionists of the East. Like lions let loose, they made it their business to divide and distress the dear people of God in the Great Valley. And even now the struggle is going on; the Pope, the world and the devil are all engaged in furnishing the Mississippi Valley with missionaries of their own manufacturing to supplant the Lord’s ministers; and God is, we doubt not, even now suffering this war to go on, until by the use of these means he will drive his ministers into other destitute parts, and leave in their places ravening wolves to drive out all such as fear the Lord, and tremble at his word.

Finally, we write that we do know, and testify what we have seen; aye, and felt too, when we assure our readers that the ordinary means or instrumentalities which the Lord employs to remove his servants from one place to another is persecution in some form or other. When the Jews accounted themselves (by their conduct) unworthy of eternal life, ho! the apostle turned to the Gentiles; for so had God commanded. Let down from a window in a basket, to avoid the murderous enemies of the cross, the apostle fled to another field of labor. But oh, how different with anti-christ's hirelings! Note the scores of young and old clergymen in almost every city in our States panting for the work; panting for the salvation of souls; panting for a call, an outfit, aye, panting for a respectable salary: but yet they stand idle in the market-place because no man has hired them; and yet their benevolent bowels yearn over the perishing millions whom they say are dropping into hell for want of their labors of love, while their sense of the incalculable worth of immortal souls often makes them ejaculate this prayer to Mammon, their god:

Oh for a thousands pounds a year,
That I may go and preach,
And loud proclaim to every ear
What I delight to teach!

Oh that our missionary board
More agents would employ!
And send them forth, the dust to hoard,
How I would leap for joy!

Oh that the halcyon days were come,
When all, both far near,
Would bring their earthly wealth, as one,
And say, "Lo! it is here."

Oh what a precious heap of gold,
All corban'd to the Lord!
For this my service shall be sold,
And I will preach the word.

My generous hands and liberal soul
Of cash shall grasp a store;
Then will I preach from pole to pole,
And cry, Give more! give more!

But oh! how painful to my eyes,
The cash comes in so slow;
I fear they'll all, to their surprise,
Sink down to endless wo.

Say, honest reader, is not this the very spirit of modern benevolence? Surely these are the men who claim an exclusive right to the title of benevolence. Persecution never did, and we are confident it never will, drive them into the work; they had much rather lounge in the cities than go moneyless into the field of actual service to labor. But the ministers of the Lord go at his bidding, and when they return, they return as did the seventy, saying, "We lacked nothing, even devils were subject to us through thy name."

PRIESTHOOD OF MELCHISEDEC

Mt. Ida, Kentucky

Brother Beebe: - Brother Charles E. Stewart desires your views on the origin and extent of the priesthood of Melchisedec.

James Terry.

REPLY: Wise and learned men have failed to satisfy the curious upon this subject. Their researches have been laborious, and their conclusions various and conflicting. Perhaps the most popular idea has been that Melchisedec the priest, who met Abraham and blessed him, and Shem, the son of Noah, are one and the same person; as Shem lived nearly three hundred years after the birth of Abram, and is said to have been called "King of Justice," and supposed to have officiated as a priest. Living at Salem, near where Abraham offered up Isaac, and in Abraham's day, the conclusion is somewhat plausible that it was him that met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him. All this, however, we only give as the speculations of men on the subject. All we can know, and all we need to know, is just what God has been pleased to reveal in the scriptures. And all that the scriptures contain in regard to Melchisedec is in regard to his priesthood, as independent of and anterior to the priesthood of Aaron and his sons. Just enough of Melchisedec is given in the scriptures to make the figure perfect. As a man his descent is not given, as it was not required to perfect the type. If his lineage is given, in the person of Shem, or any other individual, it is not as a priest, but as a man. If Shem was the Melchisedec mentioned m the scriptures, as the son of Noah, his descent is counted; but, even if that be so, his priesthood was not in that descent, and as a priest he was still without father, without mother, without descent; having neither beginning of days or end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually. That is, as a priest, the type was made like or to agree with its legitimate anti-type, the Son of God. The only difficulty in understanding this record of Melchisedec seems to arise from confounding his priesthood with his person as a man. No man since Adam has lived on the earth without descent, or without father and mother, as men. But Melchisedec, as a priest, stands before us in the scriptures without descent; the representative of a priesthood of a peculiar order; expressly given to typify the order of the priesthood of the Son of God, as being not only independent of and superior to that of the sons of Levi, but of an unchangeable character, without derivation or descent, without beginning of days nor end of life, abiding forever.

In Hebrews 7, this figure is brought forward from the Old Testament types, and all that is found in the Old Testament is faithfully transcribed as constituting the figure, in all its fullness. All that is here copied is necessary to make the figure complete; anything more would be redundant, and worse than useless, for the purpose, as it would mar the accuracy of the figure. Had Moses given us the biography of Melchisedec, his lenial descent, as a man, the history of his natural life and the time and place of his death, as a man, where could these particulars be used in illustration of the priesthood of the Son of God? Had they been required they would have been furnished; but they were not necessary, and therefore we are told that his "descent was not counted." (Heb. 7:6) That is, his descent as a man, for as a priest he had none; but as he is called "Priest of the Most High God," we clearly infer that his priesthood was by special appointment of God, and not by lineal descent from any previously existing order of priesthood; neither had he any successors, but an independent and unbroken priesthood, having neither predecessors or successors. The whole of the seventh chapter to the Hebrews is devoted to an explanation of this subject, showing that the priesthood of the Son of God was after the order, or according to the order of Melchisedec, and not after that of Aaron.

Indeed, the whole epistle to the Hebrews is devoted to the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Apostle and High Priest of our profession. And to show that it was not a continuation of the Levitical priesthood, the inspired writer assures us that it was not after the order of Aaron, but after the order of Melchisedec. The origin of Melchisedec's priesthood, therefore, was immediately from God himself, as this order is the result of the word and oath of God himself. "The Lord sware and will not repent. Thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec." And the extent of the priesthood of Melchisedec, like all other types, was carried to and merged in the priesthood of the Son of God.

We have now given our views as far as they were called for by brother Stewart. But, if the Lord permits, we will hereafter attempt to show how and wherein the priesthood of the Son of God is after the order of Melchisedec, which we conceive to be far more important and interesting than the origin and extent of the type.

MELCHISEDEC

The history of Melchisedec is purposely withheld. Only so much is recorded of him as would suffice to make him an eminent type of our Lord Jesus Christ; both in regard to his priesthood and kingly office. The priesthood of Aaron was hereditary, passing down from sire to son until by its limitation it ran out. But of Melchisedec, no record is given of his parentage or posterity. Without (so far as his priesthood was concerned) father or mother; that is, as we understand, he did not, like the sons of Aaron, inherit the priesthood from father or mother. As a mere man he undoubtedly had both father and mother, but as priest and king, we are told that his descent was not reckoned; for in these respects he had neither. Neither have we any account of his beginning of life or end of days; for such a presentation would have greatly lessened, if not destroyed, the force and beauty of the figure. He is just presented in the figure as a priest and king - nothing is told us of how or when he became a priest, or whence he received his crown and regal honors as a king, when he began to reign, or when he ceased to reign. His name and titles imply that God himself made him both priest and king: for he says king of Salem, which name signifies righteousness and peace. And he was priest unto the Most High God as he was evidently recognized as such by the oath and testimony of God in Psalm 110:4. The inspired apostle calls this whole account of Melchisdec a similitude. And it was principally designed to show the surpassing glory of the royal priesthood of Christ over the typical priesthood of Aaron and his sons.

1. In that he has power and dominion which did not belong to the Levitical priesthood. He is king as well as priest. And in his regal glory Zechariah saw and testified of him thus; “Behold the man whose name is THE BRANCH; and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord; even he shall build the temple of the Lord, and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne, and he shall be a priest upon his throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between them both (Zechariah 6:12,13)."

2. Aaron was made a priest by the law of a carnal commandment; for the Levitical law made men priests who had infirmity, and were liable like other men to die. But Christ is made a priest after the power of an endless life.

3. Men, by that law were made priests without an oath; but of Christ it is said, "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent. Thou art a Priest forever; after the order of Melchisedec (Psalm 110:4)."

4. The priesthood of Christ is not transferable; He abideth a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec.

5. The priesthood of Melchisedec was anterior to that of Aaron, and so far superior to it, that Levi, the patriarch of the Aaronic priesthood, paid tithes to Melchisedec when yet in the loins of Abraham; thus signifying that Christ's priesthood is without beginning of days, nor end of life. And finally it shows Christ is the substance of all the types, shadows, and figures, used in the Old Testament, as pointing to him. That is, he is not in a figurative sense, but really the King of Righteousness, and Priest to the Most High God. And although all the redeemed people of God are made kings and priests unto God, and shall reign with him in immortal glory as a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, and a peculiar people, yet his priesthood is not hereditary, for it is in him, not as succeeding, or superseding him; as members of his body, his flesh, they are identified with him in his royal priesthood.

Our sister inquires! Who is Melchisedec? We have tried to answer, he was a man who in the days of Abraham was literally king of Salem, and priest to God, and made to prefigure the royal priesthood of the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus.

Abraham gave him a tenth part of the spoils he had taken from the kings over whom he triumphed in the restoration of Lot, and the treasures of Sodom and Gomorrah, and this in paying tithes of temporal things to Melchisedec, recognized his superiority; and signified that all honor shall be paid to Christ as our spiritual and ever abiding High Priest.

Is there more than one King of Salem, or King of Peace? There were many kings of Salem, or Jerusalem, all of whom, so far as their position is concerned, were typical of Christ. But in the anti-typical Salem, the New Jerusalem, there is but one King, and this is Christ, who is the "Blessed and only potentate," the King Eternal, Immortal, Invisible, the Only wise God, our Savior, to whom be honor, praise, power, majesty and glory forever. Amen.

MELCHISEDEC.

ELDER BEEBE: – if not asking too much, or consuming too much of your valuable time, I should be very glad if you would give your views or opinion of Melchisedec through the SIGNS, whether he was anything more than a man. As this is the first time I ever troubled you for your views, I shall be glad if you will answer.

Respectfully yours,
NANCY BRUMBACK.

REPLY. – That Melchisedec was a man who lived in the flesh in the days of Abraham, there can be no reasonable doubt; and that he was also king of Salem, and a priest of the Most High God, is equally evident. His priesthood was prior to, and of a different order from, that of the sons of Levi, and so far superior to it that Levi, while yet in the loins of his great-grandfather, paid tithes to and received blessing from Melchisedec; who, though a man in the flesh, and like all other men, had parents, yet his "descent was not counted," or given, that the type might be the more perfect, and the order of his priesthood more strikingly emblematic of the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is not said of him as a man, but as a priest and king, that he was without father and without mother, and that he was made in these respects like unto, or a perfect type of, the great High Priest of our profession. In the type he is without father or mother, or beginning of days or end of life; no descent is given in the type of beginning or end. Unlike all other kings and priests, his priesthood and kingly office were without any predecessor or successor. Neither of his offices were hereditary; and in these particulars, as also in what his name and titles signified, he was an eminent type of the Son of God, as King of righteousness and peace, and Priest of the Most High God.

For a more elaborate expression of our views on this subject, we refer our correspondent to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, Vol xv., No. 24, Vol. xix., No. 2, and Vol. xxxii., No. 24.

METHODS OF MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

THE LORD'S METHOD OF EXTENDING THE PUBLICATION OF HIS GOSPEL, CONTRASTED WITH THE DEVICES OF MEN FOR THE SAME OSTENSIBLE OBJECT.

THE gospel is emphatically "The power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth," it is substantially, "Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, and its report or proclamation is glad tidings of great joy to every heaven born child. We should always bear in mind that the gospel is one thing, and the preaching of it another; the gospel is invariably the power of God unto salvation, while neither the preaching of it by apostles or ordinary ministers can affect anything like salvation or even comfort, edify or instruct the people of God any farther than it is attended by the sacred power of the Holy Spirit; and this it will effect to the exact extent which the Lord designs. With the spread of the gospel, strictly speaking man has no agency whatever; but God has raised up, qualified and sent forth men whom he has commissioned to preach the gospel; that is, to preach the power of God, through faith unto salvation to all that believe; but that God has ever authorized men to exert the power of salvation cannot be proved. In sending his messengers forth, God acts no less independently than when He created the world. He saith unto one go, and he he goeth; to another come, and he cometh. No human contingencies can possibly interrupt his divine arrangements. He did not from necessity call the unlearned, the poor and the weak into this work, but from choice; for God has chosen such, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of man; and the sublime mysteries of his kingdom he has hidden from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes, because so it seemed good in his sight. But the methods by which he has generally caused the publication of this gospel have always confounded the wisdom of this world. In the primitive age of the gospel church, while the wisdom, zeal and bigotry of the carnal Jews, had invented their foreign and domestic missionary plans for compassing the seas and land for the extension of their religion, our Lord adopted such a course of operation, as to all human wisdom, was most likely to exterminate from the earth every subject of his kingdom. Such the divine policy.

First: No luring bait of salaries or fame to "call out" the talent, erudition and influence of the great and mighty of the earth: and when any volunteered to join his band, he told them "The Son of Man bad not where to lay His head," and if any would come after him, they must deny themselves, and take up the cross, &c. In the present day the wisdom of this world as manifested by the New School, speaketh on that wise, viz:

"WESTCHESTER, April 2, 1840.

"MINISTERIAL HELP WANTED. - Dear brother, As your situation affords you an opportunity of frequent intercourse with ministers of our denomination, I address myself to you in behalf of the church in this place. We are now without a pastor, and have no prospect of getting one. If we could command money that would soon bring us a Shepherd. We are however, a feeble band, but lately organized as a church; built a substantial house, have been struggling alone, and made more sacrifices, and contributed more to sustain ourselves according to our means, than any church in Pennsylvania. Although I say it, I believe it to be solemn truth.

We feel now that the question must be met - shall we exist as a church, or shall we shut up our house and permit the cause to languish and die? We can and will hold prayer meetings, and try to keep the church together, but you know that without a pastor it will fare illy with us. Our church numbers some 70 members, can raise $300, and are in as good condition as any other church spiritually.

* * * * * * *

Now where is the minister in our denomination of equal grade of ability with them who will come here for the cause sake and receive 400? My most fervant prayer is, that the Lord may send such a man along." - Bap. Record.

The above specimen may serve to show the decisions of human wisdom on the subject. No money - no preaching; no preacher - no church; but,

Secondly: All those whom our Lord originally called into the work, were just such men as the wisdom of this world would conclude would do more hurt than good: the poor, obscure, weak, illiterate, despised and base men of this world, yea, publicans and sinners. Such was the divine choice: it was not necessity but choice; for all power over all flesh was in his hands. Even so, that the excellency of the power of the gospel might be of God and not of men. Is it objected that out of eighty three that were called to the work, there was a Saul who had received a religious education? True, but with it all he knew not the Lord who addressed him on 'his way. No theological rules taught by Gamaliel, or any other professed *divine*can bring a poor lost sinner to a knowledge of Christ; for none calleth him Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. And Paul, laying aside all his boasted knowledge of the Jew's religion, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, came not to the gospel ministry in excellency of speech or of wisdom; but was with them in weakness, fear and much trembling; and his speech and preaching was not with enticing (persuasive) words of man's wisdom, &c., that the faith of the saints might not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. See 1 Cor. ii. 1-16.

Thirdly: These poor "inefficient" and despised "babblers" were sent where, in all human probability, they were the most likely to be killed, and that in the most defenceless way that earthly wisdom can conceive of: "Behold I send you forth as lambs in the midst of wolves!" To carnal reason there was no more ground to expect they would be successful than if our Lord had literally sent so many lambs into the midst of thousands of devouring wolves. Although going directly among enemies, no splendid outfit of purse, apparel, chariots or even staves, or scrip! What an opportunity was here by divine management presented for the display of that protecting care and providence which God did then, and ever will display in defence of his ministers!

Fourthly: We invite the attention of our readers to the manner of dictating the movements of his ministers. Human sagacity says, "When a minister in one city receives a call, by which he can get a higher salary in another, he shall then move; but never stir to supply the Westchester, Pennsylvania, church, or any other at $300 or $400 per annum, while he can get $1,500 or $2,000 at Philadelphia or New York. But our Lord's instructions to his ministers were, "When they shall persecute you in one city, flee to another." And persecution has been the principle instrument in the hand of God, in directing to the field of their labors all his ministers in all ages of his church, the present not excepted. By the persecution of the primitive church, they were greatly scattered, and they that were scattered went every where, preaching the word. Here again we see the instrument, (persecution) which above all others threatened the entire extermination of the church, was chosen of God and overruled for its advancement.

Upon precisely the same principle, the Head of the church is at this day presiding over the movements of his servants. We who labor in the ministry, are naturally inclined to make our nest and take our ease; we become attached to the dear people of God among whom we labor, and make our feeble calculations to abide with them until we drop the mortal tabernacle; but anon, our gourd is blasted! The Philistines are upon us, and we must strike our tent, and away to some other field of action.

Cast your eye over the pages of church history for more than eighteen hundred years: Has the gospel, in any one solitary instance, been introduced into any nation or country with, what is now called Missionary Societies, funds, or agencies? Or has it in any instance been accomplished without persecution? True this persecution has been generally waged against God’s people under religious pretensions, they have been charged with heresy and pursued for nonconformity to the popular or prevailing notions of religion, whether Jewish, Pagan, Papal or Protestant, and their persecutors, in every instance, as in the present, have professed to be doing God service in persecuting them. It was thus, as we have shown, in the apostolic age, and it was thus when God’s appointed time had come to light up a heavenly ray in Europe, a few persecuted disciples fled before the fury of the pope, and were conducted thither; and when the vast continent of our birth and present home, which had groaned in heathenish. darkness for many ages, was by God’s appointment to be illuminated with the proclamation of the gospel; a bitter prosecution in Europe drove out the pilgrim pioneers of our early settlements to seek a peaceful grave in the bosom of a soil inhabited by the native savage tribes and the furious beasts of a vast wilderness. Yea, and when the early settlers of Eastern States, thought their troubles ended, and their persecutions had ceased, they began to build and plant, and fixed their expectations on remaining undisturbed in their peaceful houses, when schisms amongst them demonstrated that the hydra monster from whose terror they had fled, still existed among them. Roger Williams, banished from Massachusetts for maintaining the views now held by Old School Baptists, found his way to Rhode Island, and planted the standard of' religious rights in that colony. But in almost every state in this union, persecution has been employed in scattering the men whom God has provided and ordained for the work of preaching his gospel from state to state. Some were whipped, some imprisoned and some banished, while others were actually slain in our own country, and all this suffering on their part has been overruled and made to contribute directly to the. extension of the propagation of the gospel of Christ.

MIAMI ASSOCIATIONS

We owe an apology to our brethren of the Miami Association, and particularly to brother Saunders, for so long delaying the publication of his communication, which appears in this paper. Our unavoidable absence from home so large a portion of our time since we received the manuscript, has been a principle reason for its being deferred until the present.

Our readers will discover that the churches which were dropped from this association, have raised a great outcry against the right of the association to drop them. But what is fellowship? Is it anything more than an empty names We Old School Baptists hold it as the bond of' vital and spiritual union, and it certainly cannot imply any thing less than a union of faith and practice. Do these Fullerite and Missionite churches pretend to say that such union did exist between themselves and the association from which they have been severed? Let the history of their quarreling jargons for the last few years, and up to the time of their separation from the congregation of the Lord, answer. Yet in what plaintive sounds they vociferate the cry, oppression, injustice, &c., because the Miami Association will no longer recognize them among the living in Jerusalem.

One word upon the subject of the. charge of oppression. Professing the faith of the old Miami Association, these four churches applied for admission; on that profession they were received. Now does it follow as a matter of course that because they have made that profession as a passport to get into that association, that the association is bound to retain their names after they have thrown off the disguise and demonstrated that they are not of the same faith and order? Certainly not. If the association had a right in justice and equity to judge of their profession of faith, and to extend to them their fellowship on such professions, in the first instance they must have the same right to determine what they can not fellowship. Hence, away with the cry of oppression.

Again. What advantage could result to either party from a continuance of a nominal union of such heterogenious materials? They could get together once a year and quarrel, and disgrace the very name of that holy religion which we profess. Nay, more: these new light churches, if they could manage to perpetuate their connection, could eat their own bread, and wear their own apparel, and be called by the name of the association to take away their reproach, and thus keep up their standing on the credit of those who are esteemed sound in the faith. But what would be the expense to the association? Paul says, “He that is joined to a harlot has become one flesh.” The association would identify herself with the whole mass of the iniquity of the other; and she would also have to sacrifice all the grand objects of her first organization, and give way to discord, contention, and continual strife; but the Miami Association has gloriously acquitted herself - she has dropped them from her connection - she has returned them to the place from whence she has taken them, and we hope she has learned a profitable, if an unpleasant lesson in this case, to beware of again being entangled with the yoke of bondage.

The rejected churches have organized themselves apart from the others; this was their right, and to this the old school should have no objection; and whether they feel disposed to christen themselves Tom or Harry, is a matter of little importance, except the mere compliment of selecting the name of Miami, in preference to any other, which shows that they were aware of the high standing of the legitimate Miami Association. To us, however, it seems more rational to suppose that their object was to build on better credit than their own, and so they have borrowed the name, but rejected the purity of Miami Association.

The bearing which this separation has in a general point of view on other churches and associations, cannot be otherwise than salutary. Already do the good results begin develop themselves. The churches cast oft are driven to the necessity of separating from them such as will not bow to Baal. The line is drawn, and stragglers of both sides are compelled to return home. The East Fork, of Little Miami Association were compelled to show their flag, and choose their associates, at their last session; others are and will be compelled to go and do likewise. So mote it be.

MICAH II. 10.

“Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest: because it is polluted, it shall destroy you, even with sore destruction.” – Micah ii. 10.

A CORRESPONDENT in our last number requested our views on the above text; and although we have no very special light upon the subject, we will offer a few general remarks.

The time of the prophecy of Micah, as the introduction of the first chapter will show, was in the days of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and the burden of his vision had reference to Samaria and Jerusalem; the former being the location of the revolted tribes, and the latter the seat of the national government, and the worship of Judah; or that portion of the family of Jacob which adhered to the house of David after the revolution of the ten tribes in the days of Rehoboam. The judgments predicted by this prophet were for the transgressions of Jacob, which were Samaria, and the high places of Judah, which were Jerusalem. The whole tenor of the Prophet’s message set forth the degeneracy and abominable wickedness of Judah and Israel – their transgressions of the covenant under which they had been organized as a nation – and the idolatry of their high places; the impending storm of wrath which should suddenly fall upon them, and which should ultimately scatter them like the chaff of a summer threshing floor. The corruption of the lords and nobles, as well as that of the prophets, priests and masses of Israel, is set forth in very strong language. They were charged with devising evil upon their beds, and executing their abominable devices in the morning. They coveted fields and took violent possession of them, they oppressed the poor, they hated the good and loved the evil, they plucked off the skin and the flesh from the bones of God’s people which were among them. Their choice of prophets and ministers was that they should walk in the spirit and falsehood, and lie, and say, I will prophesy unto thee of wine and strong drink; even such should be their prophets; while those who spake only truth unto them in the name of the Lord, were subjected to have their bones broken; they were chopped in pieces, as for the pot,and as flesh within the caldron. The day when God would avenge the blood of his slaughtered people upon that wicked generation was hastening on apace. A few brief centuries should show the fulfillment of all the judgments which were written against them.

To our mind it appears clear that the portion of the prophecy on which our views are called for, had reference to the time when the sceptre should depart from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet, when the breaker should come up before them, and they should be utterly broken up. Or, in other words, when the Son of God should be revealed as the Shepherd of his people, when he should put forth his own sheep and go before them, when he should call them by name and lead them out from Judaism, and they should hear his voice and follow him, and then the house of Israel should be left desolate, according to Matt. xxiii. 38. This view is strengthened by the closing words of the chapter: “And their king shall pass before them, and the Lord on the head of them.” Also, the prediction in the connection, that “The mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills, and people shall flow unto it; and many nations shall come and say, Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob,” &c.

“Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest.” This was typically a rest unto Israel from their trials in the wilderness; but as such it was figurative of the gospel. The legal dispensation affords no rest to the weary and heavy laden children of God, and God had such a people in the midst of national Israel, at the time when the breaker came up, which were in Israel as the new wine is in the cluster; but their rest was not in their connection with the worldly sanctuary, nor in the carnal ordinances of national Israel; yet they required to be informed that that was not their rest. There was in them a strong inclination, as there also is in christians at this day, to look for rest where it is not to be enjoyed; in a system of works; a covenant gendering to bondage, and among a people who are nominally called the Lord's people. But that rest which remaineth for the people of God, is only realized by believers in Christ, who are brought out from the yoke of bondage, and unto Jesus who giveth his beloved rest.

" Because it is polluted." God's hidden ones he will not suffer to rest in a polluted pace. Their rest is the gospel, not the law; their resting place is Jesus, not Moses. Their companions, the spiritual children of that Jerusalem which is above, which is free, and which is the mother of them all.

"It shall destroy you, even with a sore destruction." "You" in the last quotation, is supplied by the translators, as also the words is and your, in the former part of the text. The legal dispensation presented a ministration of death, of condemnation, destruction, and wrath, and therefore could not afford rest to the people of God; but the gospel is a ministration of life, of peace, safety, and assurance forever, and of it the Lord has said, "This is my rest forever," &c.

As what was written aforetime was written for our instruction and admonition, may we not learn from the figurative import of this part of the history and condition of Israel, that under the present anti-typical dispensation there should come scoffers in the last days, corrupters of the word; men of corrupt minds, who should be turned away from the truth and turned unto fables; covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers; and that men in this condition should heap to themselves teachers having itching ears? And do we not find these scriptures being fulfilled before our eyes? These teachers heaped like those of old, must be men walking in the spirit and falsehood, who do lie; men who will prophesy of wine and strong drink; or of something which will intoxicate and bewilder their deluded hearers, and make them fancy that they are rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing, even when they are in reality poor, and blind, and naked, and miserable. For "There were false prophets among the people, (ancient Israel,) even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of; and through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you; whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not." – 2 Peter, ii. 1-3. And to all the dear people of God, situated among those filthy dreamers, those clouds which are without rain, driven by the tempest, do not the words of the Lord by Micah very appropriately apply: "Arise, depart ye, this is not your rest?" Can God's children rest among those who walk in the spirit and falsehood, and do lie? The wicked are like the sea that cannot rest, that continually casteth up mire and dirt. But as judgments were hanging over those guilty Israelites of old, so hang the dreadful bolts of wrath which God has prepared for the corrupters of his word; and as the angel cast the millstone into the sea, so with great violence shall Babylon sink down beneath the avenging wrath of God, and be. found no more at all. "Come out of her," then, "my people, that ye may not be partakers of her wickedness, nor receivers of her plagues." Arise ye. and depart; for this is not your rest."

MICAH V. 4, 5.

"And he shall stand and feed in the strength of the Lord, in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God; and they shall abide: for now shall he be great unto the ends of the earth. And this man shall be the peace, when the Assyrian shall come into our land: and when he shall tread in our palaces, then shall we raise against him seven shepherds, and eight principle man."

About a year ago we were requested by correspondent from Rocky Mount, North Carolina, to give our views on this portion of the scriptures, but deferred a compliance; not because we had no views on the subject, but fearing that the particular part of the text on which our correspond desired light was equally obscure to us. Nor are we yet prepared, after so long a delay; but we do not feel justified in withholding such views as we have because there are some expressions in the passage that we do not clearly understand.

The allusions made by the inspired writers in the New Testament to this prophecy leave us no ground to doubt that the person described, who should stand and feet in the omnipotence of the Lord, is the Ruler who came out of Bethlehem Ephratah, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting. In Matthew ii. 6 and vii. 42 this prophecy is referred to in proof that Christ should come of the seed of David, and out of Bethlehem were David was. The second chapter of Luke is also very clear in applying this prediction to the birth and birthplace of Immanuel. Joseph and Mary when up from Galilee into Judea, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem, because he was of the house and lineage of David. And the angel of the Lord, in announcing the birth of Jesus to the shepherds, said, "For unto you is born this day in the city of David the Savior which is Christ the Lord." "And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherd said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger." The distinguishing honor of making Bethlehem the birthplace of the Messiah was not in recognition of the greatness or of the piety of that place, for it was little among the thousands of Judah; and there being no room for his reception in the inn, does not speak well for their piety. But that the purpose of God and fulfillment of the scriptures should be accomplished, it was brought to pass. Thus the Son of God, the Lord from heaven, the brightness of his Father's Glory, and the express image of his person, in his incarnation was made a little lower than the angels, was made flesh and dwelt among us, was made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, and came to do and suffer all that was needful to redeem his people from their sins, and to fulfill all that was written of him in the law, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, and into a send up to where he was before, to be glorified with his Father's own self, with all the Glory which she had with him before the world was.

In the description given of him in the second verse of this fifth chapter of Micah, is to our mind set forth the self-existent and eternal Godhead, the be gotten Sonship, and the fleshly incarnation of him who is to rule Israel, and who shall stand and feed in the strength of the Lord, in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God, and in the most perfect harmony with all the scriptures which testify of him, as God, Man, and Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, "whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting," or as expressed in the margin, "from the days of eternity." As comprehending in his infinity the days of eternity, an inspired apostle ascribes to him the most sacred homage, as "Unto the King Eternal, Immortal, Invisible, the only wise God." And as the man, Christ Jesus, he is set forth as the one Mediator, embodying both natures in his Mediatorial fullness. The fullness of the Godhead, and the fullness of the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all. "For it pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell." – Col. i. 19. He is the Word who in the beginning was with God, and he is the Word which in the beginning was God. And he is the Word which "was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his Glory, the Glory as the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." "And of his fullness have all we received, and grace for grace." – John i. 1, 14, 16. In the Godhead he and the Father are one. – John x. 30; xiv. 7-11. And in his Mediatorial Headship of the church he and his people are one. – John xvii. 21-26. He is in the Father, and the Father is in him. – John xiv. 10. The churches in him, and he is in the church. – Eph. i. 4; John xvii. 23.

The glorious Mediator, who was born of the virgin, in the city of David, in Bethlehem Ephratah, ordained to be the Ruler in Judge of Israel, who shall stand and feed in the strength of the Lord, did exist in the Glory of his Mediatorial Sonship and Headship of the church in all the days of eternity. Not in a fleshly body, for that was not taken on him until the fullness of the time had come in which he was made flesh, and became incarnate; but as the Son of God, and the Mediatorial Head of his mystical body, the church, his goings forth were of old, from everlasting. It is in his Mediatorial relation as the eternal Son of God, and Judge, Ruler and Shepherd of Israel, that he came out of Bethlehem, to stand and feed in the strength of the Lord, and in the majesty of his God. Of him all the profits have written, identifying him as the Redeemer who should come out of Zion, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob. The enraptured Isaiah, by the word the Lord, proclaimed his advent thus, "O Zion, that bringest good tidings, get thee up into the high mountain; O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings, lift up thy voice with strength; lifted up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God! Behold, the Lord God will come with strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him: behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him. He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently leave those that are with young." – Isa. xl. 9-11. Here the supreme Godhead in Mediatorial office and work of the Shepherd of Israel are clearly expressed, in perfect union with Micah's testimony, that he shall stand and feed in the strength of the Lord. His goings forth from everlasting, (or as in the margin, the days of eternity), signify action, as well as purpose and design, and are a reproof to those who deny that God actually chose, loved and saved his people in Christ, or that the church actually existed in him, or was actually blessed with all spiritual blessings, according as they were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, or from the days of eternity. If the words have any meaning, goings forth signify action; and all that pertains to the eternal life and salvation of his body, the church, was fully provided, treasured up, and secured to all his members in him, according to the eternal purpose which God purposed in himself before the world began.

If we have a correct understanding of this profoundly grand, glorious and sublime subject, the Son of God was as truly, actually an immutably the eternal life and spiritual head of his body from everlasting, or from the days of eternity, as when he became part acre of their flesh and blood in his incarnation, or will be when he shall present them in his own image and Glory in their final resurrection, clothed with his immortality and incorruptibility, when time shall be no more.

But we pass on to consider the Decree and promise in our text.

“And he shall stand and feed in the strength of the lord.” It is comforting to know that he shall stand, despite the wrath and opposition of wicked men and devils, unmoved by all the raging powers of darkness which he would have to encounter and subdue. His goings forth from the days of eternity should bring into the standing position which he was ordained to fill as the Shepherd in Bishop of his people, to minister to them all the spiritual blessings which were given them in the days of eternity. “Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirsting more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of water: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.” – Rev. vii. 15-17. But his standing shall not be in the strength of the Kings or potentates of the earth, nor by the aid of earth, nor earthly devised institutions, nor in the multitude of free-willers who profess to be “working for Jesus;” but it shall be in the strength of the Lord. All power in heaven and on earth is in his hands. Power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father has given him. He has upon his vesture and upon his thigh his power inscribed, “King of Kings and Lord of lords;” for all the power of his eternal Godhead dwells in him. Therefore it is in the majesty of the name of his God, who is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he stands and feeds his flock with a shepherd. The Father being in him, and all the fullness of the Godhead dwelling in him bodily, with heaven and earth at his command, the power and majesty of the name of his God are far beyond and infinitely superior to all opposition. The majesty of that awful name belongs to him by inheritance as the Son of God, and in that majesty he is

God with us, the true God and eternal life, shining in all the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person. Only so far as we're led experimentally, and taught by the Holy Spirit, can we conceive the supreme power in majesty of the name of God in which the great Shepherd of Israel feels his Mediatorial relations to his people; for only as God shines by his spirit in our hearts, we can have the light of the knowledge of the glory of God shining in the face of his dear Son. Yet, not withstanding our dullness and insufficiency to comprehend the excellent glory of our divine Redeemer, he stands to feed, and deals to all the redeemed vessels of his love and mercy in all the refulgent glory and supreme majesty of the name of his Father and our Father, of his God and our God. And they who from his fullness are fed on the bread of life which came down from heaven, whose flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed, shall abide; for he has said for their comfort and assurance, "I give unto them eternal life: and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one." – John x. 28-30. In this oneness in perfect identity with the Father, Jesus Stanton his supreme majesty to feed and protect his people; and because he lives, they shall live also. The Lord is their Shepherd, therefore they shall not want; they must to buy, for the gates of hell shall not prevail against them.

"For now shall he be great unto the ends of the earth." Has this prophecy evidently related to the gospel dispensation, the setting up of the Redeemer's kingdom among the Gentiles, and abolishment of the partition which under the old dispensation had separated the Jews from the Gentiles, it foretells the wide dominion of our King, extending from the Rivers unto the ends of the earth. As Jesus himself said to his disciples, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, [in the majesty of the name of his God,] and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sat upon the throne of his Glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats," &c. – Matt. xxv. 31, 32. Invested with power over all flesh, over all beings, all events, and all worlds, in all the majesty of his eternal power and Godhead, now shall he be great unto the ends of the earth.

"And this man shall be the peace, when the Assyrian shall come unto our land." The word man in this is marked by Italics, as supplied by the translators; but the supply does not, in our judgment, materially change the sense, as he whom it is used to identify is God and Man, and in the sacred union the two natures he is the Mediator between God and men. All his Mediatorial work is performed in the majesty of the name of God, for "The God of the whole earth shall be called." – Isa. liv. 5. He shall be the peace, when the Assyrian shall come into our land, and when he shall tread in our palaces. As the Assyrians were the enemies of Israel, and the lands of Israel were frequently invaded by them, and as a chastisement of Israel for their idolatry and departures from the laws and provisions of the covenant they were under, God use the Assyrians as a rod in his hand, with which to chastise them. "O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their land is mine indignation." – Isa. x. 5. Indeed the whole chapter is illustrative of the manner in which the Assyrians were used as a rod in the Lord's hand for the punishment of Israel, invading their land, and spoiling them of their treasures, and polluting their palaces, and thus foreshadowing the persecutions that the people of God under the gospel dispensation should experience from the powers of darkness. We'll Israel were never able to successfully resist the Assyrians; nor are the people of God now able to resist the enemies of the truth by any power short of that which is in the hand of their glorious Prince and Savior, who with his bow and with his crown in righteousness doth judge and make war, and seated on the white horse which John in vision saw going forth conquering and to conquer. It is written of him that "his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever." – Isa. ix. 6, 7. Not only is he our peace has the propitiation for our sins, who has by his obedience and atoning sacrifice canceled all the demands of divine justice, and hushed the thunders of his holy law, and so making peace by the blood of his cross, but also in meeting and vanquishing all our enemies. "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." In an experimental sense, although in the world we have tribulation, yet in him we have peace. His piece he gives unto us, and we sweetly enjoy peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

And when the invading foes of Zion shall impose themselves upon our land, and attempt to usurp the right to rule in our palaces, our protection is in Christ, who shield of power is mighty in our defense. "When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him. And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob." – Isaiah lix. 19, 20. "Then shall we raise against him seven shepherds, and eight principle men." The number seven has frequently been used in the scriptures to signify a competent or perfect number, and we feel assured that God will not leave himself without a sufficient number of witnesses. As there were seven churches in Asia, and in each church an angel, pastor or shepherd, seven golden candlesticks, seven stars in the right hand of him who is dead, but is alive for evermore, and has the keys of hell and death, so the number 7 May in this case be used to signify a sufficient supply for all the several branches of the kingdom over which this Ruler should preside. And the eight principle men may have a reference to the prominent gifts, as prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, mentioned Eph. iv. 11, but more especially to those inspired writers in the New Testament. Whether this is the true meaning of the seven shepherds and eight principle men are text are not, we will not presume to decide; but we are fully persuaded that on all occasions when the house is of the church of God or invaded by Indians, the faithful servants of Christ in defending the truth do bring to bear against the invaders the testimony of those who have written by inspiration of the Holy Ghost against them. As it is written, "When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the spirit of the Lord shall lift up the standard against him." – Isa. lix. 19.

We submit what we have written on the subject to the consideration of our inquiry correspondent, and to our readers general, only desire that our views may be received so far as they are sustained by the word and spirit of our Lord, but no further.

MILK AND MEAT.

In reading the excellent letter of brother Durand, as published in our last number, we have been led to a more close examination of those portions of the word wherein these figures are used, and we do most fully concur, and doubt not that all our brethren, on a full investigation of the subject will, in the conclusion that they were not intended to signify or teach that some portions of the gospel of Christ are compared to meat, and others to milk. For if the inspired writers had so designed they would have told us what part should be regarded as meat and withheld from babes; and what part as milk, and unfit for those of riper age. The ministers of Christ who are called to feed the flock of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood, would surely need very special and particular instruction, or in the absence of such instruction they might do much mischief, by dealing to the tender ones of the flock some parts of the gospel too strong and solid for them to digest, and starve them by ministering such food as they cannot eat. Certainly if there is any part of the doctrine of Christ unwholesome or unfit to be eaten by any portions of the flock, such as would have a pernicious effect on them, it is highly important that we should know what it is. But the apostle Paul, for himself, declares most solemnly, and on a very solemn occasion, in his farewell address to the Elders of Ephesus, and those among whom he had labored long and faithfully, and whose faces he knew he should never see again, and called them to witness how he had kept back nothing, even in the face of persecutions, stripes and imprisonment. "Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure of the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God (Acts 20:26-27)." Now as Paul at this time gave a solenm charge to the elders to take heed to themselves and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers, to feed the church of God, would he on this occasion have declared that he had kept back nothing in his ministry, nor shunned to declare to them all the counsel of God, if he had designed to warn them against declaring all the counsel of God in feeding all the flock of God, over the which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers?

If it were true that any part of the doctrine of the gospel of Christ ought to be withheld from any portion of the church of God, we should have been thoroughly furnished as to what part we might conceal, and what part to exhibit.

It is a fearful thing to either add to or diminish from what God the Lord hath spoken. Hear the admonition given in the last chapter of the book of God. "I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches (Revelation 22.16)." "For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book: And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, [or as in the margin rendered, from the tree of life] and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book. He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly (Revelation 22.18-20)." "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord (Jeremiah 23:28)."

The meaning and design of the apostles in using the figurative words milk and meat, the former for the weaklings, dwarfs, or babes, who, either from infancy and want of more experience, are unable to digest the truth, and the latter for those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil, teaches us, not that either Christ or his gospel is or can be divided. There is a difference in the capacity of the children of God to comprehend so as to feast upon the doctrine of God our Savior. Paul speaks of the Corinthians as being babes in regard to spiritual things, from their strong propensity to look back to the law of a carnal commandment. Their digestive organs had not been sufficiently exercised to comprehend the perfection of the gospel. And he told the Hebrews that when, for the time, they ought to be teachers, they were in need of one to teach them the first principles of the oracles of God, and therefore he had to treat them as babes, and feed them on milk.

Now let us examine these figures. What is meat? And what is milk? All the productions of the earth, every green herb, tree, etc., were given unto man to be meat for man to subsist upon. Man in his first estate being made of the dust of the ground himself, and man from his creation with fully developed natural powers, could at once eat and digest the strongest meat. And so also with all the beasts of the field; while they in their developed capacities could feed on the grass and herbs of the field, their young required to be supplied with milk. Well, what is the difference? Nature has provided for that portion of the animal creation which cannot in infancy, by reason of weakness, masticate and digest the productions of earth, that the mother's or parents' teeth and digestive organs shall masticate and prepare the same food on which the parent subsists, so as to suit the weaker capacity of the babes, or young; food so prepared is called milk. So whether in nature or in spiritual life, the babes live on precisely the same food as that which sustains the parent, from whose maternal organs the food is rendered suitable for the babe.

Now apply this figure to the saints, all of whom are born of incorruptible seed by the word of God. Jerusalem, which is above, which is free, is the mother of all the children of God.

This Jerusalem means the church which is raised up together with Christ, in her gospel exaltation above the old Jerusalem. In the gospel church, as all the children are born of the incorruptible word of God must live on every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God; and in the infancy of experience they are to desire the sincere milk of the word. To supply them with milk suited to their capacity, the church, which is the mother of us all, is supplied with gifts, by which the doctrine of the gospel is elucidated and adapted to the understanding of the babes of the family, or lambs of the flock. Not by selecting some portions of the doctrine and calling it milk, but by defining the whole, every word which cometh from the mouth of God, so as to make it plain to the feeblest of the saints. Thus in beautiful figures used in the Song of Songs, it is said to the church, "Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn, which come up from the washing;" etc. The teeth of the church are not only ornamental, but useful in masticating the food for the body. The gifts which God has placed in the church add greatly to her beauty, for they are even-shorn, as they come up from the washing, and are set in the church for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come in the unity of the faith and knowledge of the Son of God. As in the perfectly organized body of Christ, God has set all the gifts as it has pleased him, there are teeth to masticate the food, and organs to so perfectly digest it, that its nutritious virtue is dispensed to every part. "For there is one body, and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling." A rich variety of figures, forming one perfect cluster, are used to illustrate the peculiarities of the church. Not only as a perfectly organized body, with teeth even-shorn to aid the body in the reception of its spiritual food, but as a mother, prepared with the breasts of her consolation, to supply her newborn babes with the sincere milk of the word. Special mention is made in the Song of Songs of the breasts of the church; her breasts are like towers, affording strength and security, comfort and safety to all the children of her maternal care. The church, or mother of us all, eats the flesh and drinks the blood of the Son of Man. She lives on the bread which comes down from heaven, and on every word that proceeds from the mouth of God, and she is thus prepared to impart through her organic gifts succor and food to the feeblest of her children. But the mother, in order to afford wholesome supplies to her children, must herself be fed only on wholesome food. The milk, to be the sincere milk of the word, must be wholly derived from the doctrine of God our Savior; it must be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and that defined and explained by the gifts in the church so that all may understand it, and realize the healthful virtues of it. Should any but the sincere milk be ministered to the feeble ones, they will still remain feeble and sickly.

Peter speaks of its suitableness for new-born babes, or infants in the divine life, and Paul speaks of those who being carnal in their propensities, when for the time they should be able to instruct or feed others, require to be instructed in the first principles of the oracles of God, and when for the time they have had hope in Christ they should be men, with fully developed minds, they are mere babes, and to be treated as such.

Practically, then, as the creatures of earth are to be fed and nourished by every vegetable production of the earth, every green herb, etc., so in our spiritual life received from and by the word of God, which by the gospel is preached unto us, we must be fed, nourished and sustained by every communication from heaven contained in the word which by the gospel is preached unto us.

The distinction made by the apostle between milk and meat for the saints is to impress us with the importance of defining, examining and instructing the feeble ones and babes so that the essence and virtue of the strongest food may be received by them. If there be some old members in the church whose senses or capacities by long experience are able to more fully comprehend the deep things of God, they are to bear the infirmities of the weak by employing their gifts for the mastication and digestion of the strong meat, for the benefit of the feeblest of the flock.

None of us have grown so strong as not to need the instruction of the apostles of Christ to teach us to observe all things which he has commanded us. In this sense they are the teeth for chewing our food, or breasts of the church for supplying us with the spiritual nutrition of the gospel. And all the gifts which God has bestowed on the church are also for the same purpose, that we may be helpers one of another.

How absurd then to suppose that there are portions of the Scriptures so full of instruction, so sweet and nutritious that the babes and weaklings of the flock must not taste them. Above all others they need to be strengthened and fed; and the strongest meat in the gospel, when duly defined, is the richest milk, and most wholesome food on which the little ones can feed.

The apostles have given example as well as precept for feeding the church of God. Paul says he has fed some of the children with milk; and his manner of doing this is clearly manifest in the record of his whole ministry; not by withholding from any of the saints any portion of the counsel of God; for he declares, as we have seen, that he had done no such thing; but by adapting his instructions to the weakest capacity as well as to the strongest. In his own account of his manner he says: "For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; To them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under law to Christ,) that I might gain them that are without law. To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. And this I do for the gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you (I Corinthians 9:19-23)." Thus, in his ministry the apostle, whom we have as a pattern or example, adapted his ministry to all classes, capacities and conditions of the children of God, that he might gain them all, that is in the sense in which Christ says, "If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." (See Matthew 18) Not a wit inferior to the very chief of the apostles, yet less than the least of all saints. Able to vie with the strongest and most gifted, yet to the weak, because he is weak; adapting himself to the condition of all the saints, just as the prophet Elisha did to the child of the Shunanimite, when "And he went up, and lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands: and he stretched himself upon the child (II Kings 4:34)." Thus making himself as small as the child, while in stature he was able to measure with the greatest of the prophets. So the apostle could make himself useful to any and to all the children of God. To those of riper age and stronger capacity he could speak as unto wise men, so that they could judge of what he said: but unto the weak, like a nursing father, he could make himself as weak, and use such language and figures, illustrations and words as they could comprehend. But be it remembered that in all his ministry, under no circumstance, did he ever shun to declare the whole counsel of God.

MILK THE GOATS.

ON opening the October number of the American Tract Magazine, we were greeted with the following draft, viz:

"$30,000 FOR THE FOREIGN CHRISTIAN PRESS. - The American Tract Society, at its last anniversary,

'Resolved, That in the accumulating facilities and motives for diffusing, by the press, the glad tidings of salvation to all nations, God in his providence evidently requires that $30,000 be raised and remitted with the least possible delay.'"

To whom this draft is addressed by the Lord, or from whom, or by what means it is to be raised, the above proclamation saith not. The document is quite defective in regard to where this trifling sum is to be remitted; and as the published decrees of God are always explicit, and consistent, and. invariably in strict accordance with the tenor of the scriptures, we are disposed to doubt its having come directly from heaven. For this skepticism we may perhaps be rated with infidels, but, be it so; we must and will for the present protest the draft, at least until we have better reason to believe that God requires this amount, or any part of it, at our hands.

The popular motto of these religious swindlers, is that God works by means, or instrumentality, and so it would seem by their maneuvering for their imaginary deity. Imaginary, we say, for the existence of such a god as they describe, cannot be demonstrated by scripture, or by reason. In harmony with the spirit and letter of their motto, they assume to be the vicegerents of their god; and in this assumed dignity make it their business to pass decrees, establish counsels, make promises, execute designs, accumulate motives, and multiply facilities for the accomplishment of his purposes; draw on the community for funds, and have them remitted with the least possible delay to their lord, through them. And will it be churlish in us to believe that the god to whom they will appropriate these funds when raised, is their own bellies? See Phil. iii. 19. The name of their imaginary deity is Mammon, and his influence is felt by all the families of the earth. But we are happy to state that the God whom we serve is perfectly solvent, possessing an unwasting fulness; his arm is not shortened nor is his ear heavy. With him are treasures of wisdom, more precious than rubies, or the most fine gold; durable riches of righteousness are m his possession, and he redeems his people, not with such corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ. No humanly organized board, council, or society have occasion to pass decrees for him, for his goings forth are from everlasting. He has declared the end from the beginning, saying. “My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.” Should this God require of us our money, our services, our friends, or even our lives, our response to his demand should be in the words of Job, “The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord.”

MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE.

WE copy from the Baptist Repository the following resolutions passed at a meeting of Baptist preachers at the Hamilton Theological Seminary, June 5, 1833:

Resolved, That it is the duty of every minister of Christ to become well acquainted with the various objects of benevolence in which christians are engaged for the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, to explain the objects to all the members of the church in which he labors, and urge upon them the duty of serving Christ with their talents and with their property.

Resolved, That as it is the duty of every disciple of Christ to make temporal sacrifices to promote the eternal salvation of men, to aid them in rendering their sacrifices regular and effectual, we will furnish them, through the Baptist Register and the Repository, a schedule, with a column for the names of members, and one for each of the objects of benevolence, which we recommend to their patronage, and use our influence in our own churches, to induce every member to subscribe to each object such amount as their circumstances and duty may require, annually, to be paid promptly.

Resolved, That in our opinion nearly an equal amount ought to be contributed by the churches in this State for ministerial education, Domestic and Foreign Missions, the present year. And we will do all in our power, consistently with other duties, to raise for each of these objects ten thousand dollars this year, trusting in God to infuse his own spirit into his people, and succeed our endeavors.

Resolved, That we recommend the immediate formation of associational and sectional Conferences, auxiliary to this conference, throughout this State, and that they use their efforts to carry into effect the above resolutions in their respective limits.

Resolved, That this Conference hold its next annual meeting at Hamilton, on the day after commencement, at 10 o'clock, a. m.

Adjourned.

REMARKS.

How astonishingly rapid is the advancement of priestcraft and clerical power amongst the Baptists of the present day. Never, until the present, has anti-christ appeared so conspicuously to flourish under the Baptist name. Never, until the present, have the saints so fully and so fearfully realized the apostolic prediction, "Even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. And through covetousness shall they, with feigned words, make merchandise of you; whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not." - 2 Peter ii. 1, 3. Can it be doubted that these men who assume to be teachers, divinely authorized to teach young men the science of preaching, and the arts of modem medieancy, are pointed out by the apostle as false teachers? Or who can doubt that these are teaching damnable heresies, who in the second of the above resolutions are teaching that "it is the duty of every disciple of Christ to make temporal sacrifices to promote the eternal salvation of men!" This sentiment, glaring as it is, is set down as a given point with them, and seems to be the very ground and pillar of their faith; remove this pillar and down their entire system must fall. Now if it be the duty of the disciples of Christ to promote, or aid Jehovah, in the eternal salvation of men, we ask, On what page of the bible is the obligation recorded? Or in what respect, or respects, is God deficient, that he should need the aid of his saints in the promotion of the eternal salvation of men? Will the diviners of the Ministerial Conference inform us what proportion of eternal salvation is of works, and what of grace? How much depends on the saints, and how much the Lord intends to do himself? Should those learned sages condescend to answer our enquiries, they will please to recollect that we have been in the habit of believing that the eternal salvation of men,. i. e., all that God ever designed to save, was beyond the reach of being promoted by our temporal sacrifices. We read that God "hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus (before this ministerial meeting was organized, aye) before the world began." Hence it appears to be quite too late for us to promote that which was accomplished before the world began. We would have them inform us to whom these temporal sacrifices are to be made? They cannot be to God, for he is full of burnt offerings; "and sacrifices and offerings he would not," says the Lamb of God, "because he has no pleasure in them." He has also said, "Go ye and learn what this meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice." Hence it cannot be our duty to disobey God, and offer sacrifices to him in violation of his express command. Is it then divine justice that calls for temporal sacrifices to promote eternal salvation? If so, how much must be added to the sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ, which through the eternal Spirit he offered up to God, in order to secure the eternal salvation of the elect? But should we be told that the sacrifice of our Lord secured the eternal salvation of the elect, and that he by one offering or sacrifice (not temporal) hath forever perfected them that were sanctified. Heb. x. 14. We would ask those knowing ones of Hamilton Theological Seminary how many of the non-elect can be eternally saved by the offering of temporal sacrifices? Again since it is written, "There remaineth no more sacrifice for sin." For what are these temporal sacrifices to be made? And how are they to promote the eternal salvation of men? If the eternal salvation of men may be promoted by our temporal sacrifices, surely the cattle upon a thousand hills would be a glorious offering, and ten thousand rivers of oil would be an offering of great magnitude.

But perhaps those ministers will say we have mistaken their design, and misinterpreted their sayings, and that their object is only to awaken the saints to a sense of their duty touching the temporal concerns of the church. If this be all, why tell them to make temporal sacrifices "for the promotion of the eternal salvation of men?

Is salvation of the Lord? And if it is, can that eternal salvation which is of the Lord be promoted by men? And if it can, why did the apostle say, "By grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast," &c. See Ephesians ii.

How easy for a reflecting mind to detect the sophistry of those lovers of filthy lucre. They would make the people believe their money, if rightly applied, will save the souls of men with an eternal salvation; but in order to secure this grand object it is necessary that all the young gentlemen of Hamilton Theological Seminary, with as many of the Baptist ministers of the State of New York as will say aye, to all their propositions, should form one grand phalanx, whose business it shall be "to aid in rendering their (the peoples') sacrifices, alias money, regular; i. e., inform the people when, how much, and to whom their sacrifices mi(st be made to be effectual, as all the liberality of the saints will be null and ineffectual unless it passes through their priestly hands, like the unhallowed loaf in the eucharist, until it receives the blessing of the Pope.

"We will furnish, through the Baptist Register and the Repository, a schedule, with a column for the names of members, (in order that the left hand may be informed what the right is about,) and one column for each of the objects of benevolence which we (not the the bible, for that is buried among the rubbish, as in the days of Ezra,) WE recommend to their patronage, and will use our influence, (for popular men, even magicians, have influence,) in our own churches, to induce every member (to "watch and pray lest they enter into temptation?" O no, nothing of that kind,) to subscribe to each object such amount as their circumstances and duty may require, annually, to be paid promptly.

The next resolution announces to the gentle and simple of the churches through this State, and throughout their respective dioceses, "in their opinion nearly an equal amount ought to be contributed, &c., for ministerial education."' Thus one-third of the people's money, or "sacrifices for the promotion of the eternal salvation of men," is by those inmates. of the Theological Seminary graciously and modestly bestowed upon their own dear selves; and the other two-thirds is to be devoted to "Domestic and Foreign Missions," so that in the end they will get the whole. Who can wonder that the prophet should call these watchmen "Greedy dogs?" "And (say they) we will do all in our power, &c., to raise for each of these objects, (i. e., for themselves,) ten thousand dollars this year," making in all $30,000; $10,000 for their education, $10,000 for their use as Domestic Missionaries,. and $10,000 for them as Foreign Missionaries.

Thus we see them, after organizing at the place where the greater part of the constituents of this august assemblage first received their ministerial existence, proceeding to transmigrate themselves into an Annual Conference, for the purpose of drawing into their ranks all the Baptist ministers within the bounds of this State, and thus to spread themselves like a green bay tree. The object of all this can need no interpretation. Their object is imprinted in legible characters upon the very frontlet of their proceedings. They tell us that the object is "to promote piety, usefulness, &c., and to excite the churches to the performance of practical duties, especially in reference to all benevolent objects - objects in accordance with the mind of God." Now let us seriously enquire, Is it necessary that a new order of things should be established, and new combinations of clerical power and authority should be brought into requisition, in order to excite the churches to attend to such benevolent operations as are in accordance with the mind of God? Surely not. "It is God that worketh in his people both to will and to do of his good pleasure?' We have no right to believe that any system, (call it benevolence, or what you please,) is, or can be in accordance with the mind of God, but such as are authorized by the precepts and examples of our Lord Jesus Christ. But they say, "And such as are approved by our denomination." Now this last clause seems to give them more room, for if on this ground they can make it appear that their projects are pleasing in the eyes of the denomination, they will not be put to the inconvenience of proving that their plans are agreeable to the mind of the Lord; they will only be required to show that it is approved by a majority of themselves.

The second article of the constitution breathes the same language, viz: "And to devise and prosecute an efficient and Systematic plan of benevolent efforts, which shall arouse, direct, (mark their language) and concentrate the energies of the disciples, &c., for the salvation of a perishing world.”

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.

A WRITER in the Religious herald, on the subject of ministerial education, assumes the position that the apostles were highly educated, having in their onset strong native intellect and good sound common sense; second, a thorough knowledge of Greek; and in the third place, they had a three years' course of theological study, during which they were not allowed to preach except occasionally, when they were sent out two and two, that one might correct the mistakes of the other! What a pity that the modern false apostles have no one with them to correct their mistakes, not to say misrepresentations and palpable falsehoods.

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.

"When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war."

THE writer of a circular upon the subject of Ministerial Education, published in the Michigan Christian Herald, by the committee of the State Convention, makes use of the above quotation, in showing up what he conceives to be the necessity of making the Baptist Ministry familiar with the Greek language, in order that they may compete successfully with their learned opponents of other denominations. How various and discordant are the reasons assigned by the advocates of a man-made ministry, for their preference of human above divine qualifications for the ministry. At one time we are told that our version of the scriptures is so imperfect, that a thorough knowledge of the original text is indispensably necessary in order to produce unanimity of sentiment; and to know the original text we must of course understand the languages in which they were at first written, to wit: the Hebrew and the Greek: and not infrequently in the same treatise we are told that they have to contend with learned critics, and therefore we must meet them Greek to Greek, and Hebrew to Hebrew, or we cannot do them battle. Now both of these arguments cannot be good for the purposes intended, even if either or both of them could be established in point of truth: but we propose to show that neither of these positions are tenable. A collegiate or classical education never has led to unanimity of sentiment, or we should not find, as now we do, giants of literature distributed among almost every religious sect in existence. So far to the reverse of this, there are very few religious sects, heresies, or speculations, which may not be traced back to some profoundly learned man. We might here name a catalogue of them, such as Luther, Calvin, Cromwell, Wesley, Priestly, Gill, Fuller, &c. Why so much discord among these worldly wise men, if much learning tends to unanimity. If a thorough knowledge of the original language in which the scriptures were written, will enable men more readily to understand these scriptures, why were not the Jews, who understood their own language, the first to understand what the prophets had written! And why was the gospel, as preached by Paul and his brethren in the primitive church, foolishness to the Greeks. The truth is, the gospel of Jesus Christ is, at this day, as great a stumbling block, and as great foolishness to our Hebrew and Greek scholars, generally speaking, as it was in the apostolic day to the Jews and Greeks; because it has seemed good, in the sight of God, to hide these things from the wise and prudent, and to reveal them unto babes. No man can therefore admit that the scriptures are truth, without denying that human wisdom or education can assist its possessors to understand, from the scriptures, the things of the Spirit; things which can be known only as they are spiritually understood, by a spiritual people, or a people born of the Spirit of God.

Neither is human erudition the armor in which the battles of the Lord are to be fought; for then would God have chosen the mighty, the learned, the wise, the noble, and the great; but this the apostle expressly declares was not the case. Paul was himself a learned man, but his learning did not make him acquainted with the spirituality of the scriptures, for he was not taught it but by revelation. When it pleased God, who separated him from his mother's womb, to reveal his Son in him, straightway he conferred not with flesh and blood; and his speech and his preaching was not in the language which man's wisdom teacheth; that the faith of his brethren should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

Examine the history of the church of God in all ages of the world, and tell us, if it be true, that the cause of truth has been defended by the learned and wise of this world. In what college did Moses, and Aaron, and Joshua, and Sampson, and Gideon, and Daniel graduate? What were the classics of David and of all the prophets of our God? In what seminary did John the Baptist study Latin and Greek; and what human training caused him to leap at the salutation of the virgin Mary? What was the education of the apostles of the Lamb of God? In what chapter of holy writ are we informed, that, when the foes of Zion perceived that the apostles were learned men, they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus? So far as divine revelation extends, the testimony of Paul is sustained, that God has chosen the foolish and weak things of this world, to confound the wise. This was not from necessity, but choice: for God was as able, if it had been his pleasure, to call learned men as fools to the work; but that would not show that the excellency of the cause was of God. A bad cause may often be made to appear very plausible when defended by the eloquence and the talent of the learned and the mighty; but when the learned and the mighty are driven from the field by the unlearned, the artless and the simple, the excellency of the cause is made more prominently to appear.

Now let us review the retrospect we have taken of the history of the children of God, and inquire who have uniformly been the enemies of the truth of God? On this branch of sacred history, let the modern disciples of Gamaliel feast their vanity. All the magicians who opposed the word of the Lord by Moses, were learned men! All the astrologers and soothsayers of Babylon were men of education! All the prophets who were fed at Jezebel's table were learned at the expense of the crown. The scribes, the pharisees, and sadducees, who constantly opposed and persecuted the Son of God, were all learned men. Pilate, who condemned to be cruelly scourged, insulted, and crucified, one in whom he could find no guile, was able to write a superscription to place above the head of Zion's King, in Hebrew, Latin and in Greek, where human literature, when religiously employed;. is generally placed. An orator of distinguished talent was hired to impeach an apostle of the Lord Jesus, before Felix, the Roman governor, and learned men have flourished among the principal Pagan, Papal, and Protestant persecutors of the people of God, from that time to the present, in what part of divine revelation is the church of God taught to trust the defence of the cause to the learning and the talent of men? Is it where God has said, "Cursed is man that trusteth in man, or maketh flesh his arm?" The people of God shall dwell as towns without walls; for God himself shall be a wall of fire round about them, and the glory in their midst. And is not our God a sufficient Refuge for his people? He is our Shield, our Defence, our Strong Tower, and our Avenger. Are we not safe without the armor of Saul? "Walk about Zion, tell her towers, consider her palaces, and mark well her bulwarks, that ye may tell it to the generations to come." He is indeed our Hiding Place, our Covert from the storm, and he is unto us as rivers of water in a dry place, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. The place of Zion's defence is the invincible munition of rocks; the Eternal God is her Refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms. He rideth upon the heavens in her help, and in his excellency on the sky. Who is like unto thee, O Israel, a people saved by the Lord?

But it is said, "When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war." The perversion of this motto, from its original application to Grecian chivalry, to make it apply to the lily fingered and effeminate production of modern academies and colleges, is no greater than the perversions which such writers usually make of the scriptures when they take occasion to refer to them. It would be curious enough to witness the tug of war when the aristocracy of religious learning compare their notes. How often they have been called into the field like horses trained for the turf', or like game cocks, to contend for some premium offered for a tract. There have we seen Greek to Greek, and there the tug of war. Greek has met Greek at the Congress Hall, at the commencement of almost every session to contend for the chaplaincy, and there have we witnessed the tug of war. Where rich congregations, splendid meeting houses, and heavy salaries have been in the market, there has been a tug of war; there Greek and Greek have dressed themselves (not in thunder, but) in smoke, and fought with zeal worthy of a nobler cause. High offices of honor, trust, and emolument, in modern voluntary religious associations, fat missionary fields, and lucrative agencies, have often brought Greek to Greek, and there has been the tug of war.

But when have men, distinguished for their literary attainments, been assembled for the defence of the doctrine of divine sovereignty, against the attacks of arminian work-mongers? When and where have they ever been known to advocate unpopular truth against popular error? Reader, have you ever seen the powers of darkness rally against the little flock of Jesus? Have you seen them in deadly strife? Then have you marked on the part of Apollyon a collection of wealth, talent and learning; and on the part of Zion, the poor, the obscure, the unlearned, and the unpopular. On the one side you have seen the Davids, and the Goliaths on the other. Those on the one side boasting in human power, and ability, and learning, and those of the other, discarding all confidence in the flesh, and in the name of their God, setting up their banner. The help which the church of God derives from State Conventions, Education Societies, and other humanly devised worldly religious institutions, is very similar to the aid which the cause of truth has been favored with by popish inquisitions, racks, tortures, gibbets, flames and fagots, for the extermination of heretics and heresy. From all such helps every devoted soul shall pray, "Lord, deliver us." In reference to the pretended object of the Michigan Baptist State Convention, in calling for money to make Greeks of those agonizing young men, whom, they say, are panting to do good, and whose souls burn within them to preach the gospel, and who are so inflammable and likely to be burnt up, as to extort from the convention the pathetic cry, "Brethren, shall we let the internal fires consume them?" In reference, we say, to the object of the convention, it is the most flimsy and hypocritical that we have ever heard of, viz: to defend the Baptist denomination from the learned trickery of the Pedo Baptists, and thus to keep up our denominational distinction, &c. Is there a national being in our country who does not know that the greatest pretenders to learning among the Baptists, are invariably among the very first to join affinity with the leading spirits of antagonistical denominations? Are not the leading actors in all the worldly institutions of our times, such as National Bible, Missionary, Tract, Sabbath School, Abolition, and Total Abstinence Societies, in which the various ring-streaked and speckled professed denominations are united with the world, educated men? Do not those Baptist preachers who have learned the science at college, interchange with preachers of the Methodists, Presbyterians, and other opposite denominations, following around, and hailing them as brethren, and paying more respect to one of them than to a dozen of the poor brethren of the Baptist order? It cannot be denied; and yet they have the affrontery to ask us to educate their beneficiaries, in order to defend the distinguishing points on which we differ from our neighbors. Who by learning the Latin or Greek language can better understand that Christ's kingdom is not of this world, and that the subjects of his government are required to become a separate and distinct people? Who that has been taught of God, and can read the English version of the New Testament, needs a Greek Lexicon to define the language that enjoins on all who love our Lord, to follow him in baptism? Our version of the scriptures has been scrutanized by the best linguists of all the conflicting denominations, and the result of all their criticisms is before us, in plain English. Where then is the necessity of spending our time and the people's money, to acquire a knowledge of the dead languages? If these sprigs of scholastic divinity, who study the science of sermonizing at colleges and theological schools, were qualified to do all their preaching in the Greek language, their hearers generally would not be profited by it. It is all a mistake to suppose that the defence of gospel truth, gospel rites or ordinances, requires any other ability than that which God giveth. We have men enough among us who have never seen the interior of a college, who, with the scriptures in their hand, and the grace of God in their hearts, could set the world on fire, while one of our college-bred dandies would be lighting his match. It is a gross impeachment of the wisdom of God, to say that those whom he has called to the work, need to be trained by the wisdom of men, for the work whereunto he has called them. It is his exclusive province to call and to qualify whom he pleases and as he pleases; and all whom he has thus designated are required to preach as with the ability he giveth. How presumptuous, heaven daring, and insulting to the divine majesty for man, in the pride of his vain heart, to attempt to improve what God has done. May not the works of God, in creation and providence, be as easily improved as his works of grace. Why not, then, try the powers of human sufficiency upon the natural heavens, polish the sun, hang out a greater number of stars, forbid the waning of the moon, and increase her lustre until her radiance shall surpass the brightness of the sun, as far as it is supposed the wisdom of men excels the wisdom of our God? Why not improve the fixed laws of nature, annihilate the covenant which God has made with day and night,

"Make frightened rivers change their course,
And backward hasten to their source."

Alas for the vanity of the human heart, thus to contend with God! If human wisdom and power can neither improve nor change the principles of nature, why should it be thought that the spiritual things of God are more susceptible of human improvements? High as the heavens transcend the earth on which we tread, do all the thoughts and ways of God transcend the vain, illusive and arrogant thoughts and pretensions of the human heart.

For want of time and space we must defer further remarks on this prolific subject for this time. In our next number we propose to copy the Circular of the Michigan Convention, from which we have copied the motto at the head of this article, and review it in its parts, comparing them with the testimony of the bible. We think it will be no difficult task to drag to the light and show up the hypocrisy, covetousness and abomination of the leading arguments made use of in that document, to persuade men to support a learned religious aristocracy in Michigan.

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION

(Concluded)

"AT a meeting of the Executive Committee on Education, held at Tecumseh, June 1st, the following, resolution was passed, viz.:

"Resolved, That the committee request, through the Herald, the pastors of the various Baptist Churches in this state, to take up a collection in their respective congregations to enable the Board of the Convention to aid brother Fletcher Marsh in obtaining an education for the ministry.'

"CIRCULAR.

"DEAR BRETHREN: - Among the items of benevolence recognized by the Constitution of our State Convention, as claiming and receiving its patronage, is Ministerial Education. Hitherto, little or nothing has been done by the Convention, beyond the appointment of an Executive Committee, in this department. The urgent calls for ministerial labors, echoing from settlement to settlement, present the Home Mission cause in such an imposing attitude, that it absorbs the undivided attention of the churches, associations and convention. The cry, Send us ministers,' thrills through the delicate nervous system of gospel love, and awakens to lively exercise the noblest sympathies of the devout mind. The cry is heard - is felt, and nearly our whole pecuniary force is directed towards the relief of the applicants; consequently the operation of the Convention, in the other departments of benevolence, is of an exceedingly restricted character. We call not upon you, brethren and friends, to relax your efforts in behalf of Domestic Missions. No; God forbid! but we call upon you, as God has prospered you, to aid the Convention in their noble purpose of giving to Michigan an educated ministry. You will soon be in your graves, and your spirits, saved!

saved!! eternally saved, will, in immortal triumph, stand day and night in the presence of him who, though rich, for your sakes became poor; your offspring will take your places in Zion, and, be assured, will long feel the effects which the attitude you may now take, with reference to ministerial education, may produce. Let the sentiment be deeply engraven on every heart - let it be proclaimed from every pulpit - let associations and the Convention take up the sound, and send it on the wings of the wind through the length and breadth of the peninsula, that an educated ministry is essential to our ultimate prosperity as a denomination in the state. In arriving at this conclusion we do not look back fifty or an hundred years, but fix our eye upon the attitude assumed by the community in 1843. Education is now liberally patronized by the state. The church must keep pace with the march of mind or sacrifice her dignity, and with it, her moral power over cultivated intellect. It is also worthy of notice, that a large proportion of our Pedo-Baptist brethren send only men of finished education in the field. These annihilate one of the Savior's institutions, substitute a rite foreign to the New Testament in its place, and gravely inform the community that they are sustained by the Greek. Such assertions may be, must be passed by in silence, when there are no kindred resources to meet them; but when Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war;' truth is not prostrated without a rational defence, and the church is, on this point, blameless before God, having done what she could.' There are several young men in the state, belonging to our denomination, whose souls burn within them to preach the gospel of Christ to their fellow-men; but they are poor, and destitute of the requisite amount of knowledge to render them acceptable or useful pastors or missionaries. Brethren, shall we let the internal fires consume them? Shall we suffer them to pine away in agony of spirit, panting to do good t Will God bless us as churches or as individuals should we, in the premises, do less than our duty? Must these brethren enter the field as they are, and, in mortification of soul, contend with learned opposition all the days of their life? Or has the church of God nothing to do with the matter? I trust that every Baptist in the state understands his duty to God, to the church and to his fellow-men, better than to arrive at such a conclusion. It is sometimes said that uneducated men have done much good in Zion. True, there have been brethren, there still are, possessing clear heads, warm hearts, anti the most rigid powers of analysis - brethren of capacious minds, capable of grasping and illucidating the darkest points of revelation, (except when obscured by Grecian metaphor, or concealed beneath the usus loquendi of eastern nations) and of making the hearts of their hearers tremble under the awful truth of the Almighty; yet men thus great and useful by nature, must even be greater and more useful still when educated.

"As the rough diamond when it leaves the mine
Only in little breakings shows its light,
Till artful polishing doth make it shine -
So education makes the genius bright.'"

"The question is not solely, what will promote the interests of the Savior's kingdom? but what will most promote it? It was wrong before God for the church to attempt to build up Zion by the adoption of measures which she knows to be less efficient than others which might be adopted. Now ask our aged brethren, both educated and uneducated, those who have exhausted their energies in striving to forward the interests of truth, what course shall we take with our young men who, in the judgment of the churches, are called of God to preach the gospel, in order that they may effect the greatest amount of good? With one voice the veterans of the cross will say, GIVE THEM AN EDUCATION. If this is the mind of God, he cannot accept less at our hands, and that it is his will, might be argued from the diversity and complexion of human language, the miraculous bestowment of knowledge, classical and sacred, upon those who were first appointed to preach the gospel, and the enlightened state of society at the present day. But our limits forbid our elaborating the subject, nor do we deem it necessary, amid the light of the nineteenth century, to do more than to present a brief acumenical view of it.

"Our object in writing this Circular at the present time is to call the attention of our brethren to the resolution of the Executive Committee on Education at the head of this article. Our beneficiary, brother Fletcher Marsh, to whom the Board promised assistance six months ago, is pursuing his studies at the University at Ann Arbor. It is not too much to say to the churches that brother Marsh is a brother of great promise. From the developments which we have witnessed, both of his head and his heart, we believe that he will be a valuable accession to our ministerial ranks; especially should he be permitted to complete his studies. But be needs assistance; he is already in debt for his last quarter's board, or rather, the Board of the Convention are indebted to him, according to their pledge. His hope is directed to us as a Board - our hope is based upon the benevolence of the churches. Brethren, will you help us? Will you do it immediately? Can we not raise six cents from every Baptist member in the state for educational purposes? We can. Brethren in the ministry, let us try. Pastors and missionaries, attend to it immediately. Our brethren are liberal - our Board, our brethren, are needy; and God says, He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord. Produce or any article of family consumption, sent (care of B. Align) to Ann Arbor, will be acceptable.

"By order of the Executive Committee on Education.

"JAMES PYPER, SEC'Y.

"ADRIAN, Aug. 17, 1843."

IN addition to our remarks on this subject in our last number, we promised to copy the Circular into this paper, and to show the corruption, hypocrisy and covetousness of its doctrines; but before we proceed to uncover its doctrines, we will offer a word or two in regard to its origin. This Circular is the Ishmael of a church and state establishment in Michigan; it emanates from the Michigan Baptist State Convention. The kingdom of Christ is not of this world, but the Michigan

Convention is of this world, and without a warrant, either example or precept, in the scriptures. Separate what is called "the church" from the world, and you annihilate the Michigan Baptist State Convention, and with it the whole brood of its kindred arminian institutions; it is therefore unlike the kingdom of the Lord Jesus. To justify our conclusion, that this convention is a church and state establishment, examine its composition, and the number of its name. This creature is not the church, nor does it claim to be; but take from it its connection with what is called the church, and you destroy its existence. Again, it is not the state of Michigan, or it would adopt a more summary modus of raising the lucre for Mr. Marsh to sport in idleness upon; but it is a thing composed of church and state, and of this its sponsors were aware when they christened it, by a name appropriately signifying its mongrel composition. The number of its name distinctly articulates the names of the church and of the state, and in the absence of either it must cease to be. It is a religious organization, whose maker and builder is man. Without being born again, men can see it. Without being born of the water and of the Spirit, men can enter into it. The Lord Jesus Christ whom God has set upon his holy hill Zion, presides not over it; for the president's name is J. Booth. It is not governed by the New Testament; for it has a constitution and laws of it own. Not grace, but money, is the required qualification for membership. This beast is not to occupy a place subordinate to the church, but is destined to hold the station of a god. Prayers and supplication are made unto it, and offerings and costly sacrifices are made unto it. The cry comes up to this humanly devised deity, from settlement to settlement, and the cry "Send us ministers!" absorbs the undivided attention of the churches, associations and Convention, so far at least as relates to those compressed within the slimy folds of this leviathan. If the worshipers of this beast do not regard it as a god, or cause it to sit in the temple of God, showing itself to be a god, why do they pray to it for ministers, or gifts and qualifications for the ministry. The King of Zion has instructed his subjects to pray the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into his vineyard; and in regard to qualifications for usefulness, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth liberally, and upbraideth not." But how different the policy of anti-christ! If settlements and churches want ministers, let them pray the Convention, and let their piteous cry echo from settlement to settlement, until it absorbs the undivided attention of the Convention. And if any of their ministers lack wisdom, let them ask it of the education department of the Convention. Is not this rival of the government of Christ an idol? "The cry, Send us ministers," says the Circular, "thrills through the delicate nervous system of gospel love, and awakes to lively exercise the noblest sympathies of the devout mind - the cry is heard - is felt; and nearly our whole pecuniary force is directed towards the relief of the applicants - consequently the operation of the Convention in the other departments of benevolence, is of an exceedingly restricted character." What a burst of eloquence! Who, by reading one plain old-fashioned bible would have thought of the delicate nervous system of gospel love? Gospel love is not quite so nervous as the Circular would represent. By gospel love, in a scriptural sense, we understand the love of God. It is sovereign, immutable, efficacious, and eternal. Such is the love of God, and such love God communicates to his children, and they when under its governing power, love the gospel, and all that it develops, of doctrine, of faith, and practice; and as they love God, his people and his laws, they discard all who would rival him in the management of his kingdom. This love is not so nervous as to be acted upon by animal magnetism, or the galvanic battery of arminianism. What this Circular profanely calls gospel love, is only the love of the world, its sympathies are to be moved by human machinery, and when excited, to be measured out in dollars and cents, until "nearly the whole pecuniary force" of the Convention is exhausted. But what is the pecuniary force of the love of the gospel of Christ, when reckoned in silver or gold? That love which Judas possessed, amounted to thirty pieces of silver! But gospel love could not be displayed with such corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ.

Pecuniary force may properly belong to that kind of love which is excited by State Conventions, and other idols set up and worshiped by men. But if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, (the love of God, which is stronger than death) it would be utterly condemned. - Canticles viii. 7. These pecuniary exhibitions of the Convention's love, have, like Pharaoh's lean kine, eaten up all the fat kine. "Consequently the operation of the Convention in other departments of benevolence is exceedingly limited. This may explain the reason why bread is not dealt out to the poor, by these monopolizers of modern benevolence; no milk of human kindness dealt out to suffering humanity around this monster; and it would be regarded as a prodigal waste of benevolence, for this Convention, under its present embarrassments, to even speak the truth concerning the Old School Baptists.

But, says the Circular, "We call upon you, as God has prospered you, to aid the Convention in their noble purpose, of giving to Michigan an educated ministry." Like all other heathen deities, this god is dependent upon its worshipers for the means to execute its dispensations, and those who worship this beast are called upon to furnish the funds for supplying Michigan with an educated set of hirelings. But it is quite different with the King of saints. He has never had occasion to call on his subjects to furnish him with the means to supply Michigan, or the world, with ministers, nor has he ever called for aid in the business of preparing men for the work whereunto the Holy Ghost has called them. He came in possession of ample means for supplying his church with all needful gifts, "When he ascended up on high, and when he led captivity captive;" then did he receive gifts for men, and in evidence thereof, he gave a specimen of what sort he was able to give, for he gave to some apostles, to some prophets, and to some pastors and teachers; and before he left the world, (in his ascension) he left with his church the standing order, which we have before referred to, viz: Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, &c. All the idol gods that have ever been made or worshiped by pagans, Jews or professed christians, have required a supply of priests. God's ministers of course are not the kind wanted; they have consequently been under the necessity of making or buying such as would answer their purpose. The glitter of gold has uniformly called them out, and, as far as we can judge, Satan has always been as ready to furnish the men, as the people were to supply the funds; nor has the old serpent been backward to furnish just the sort that was wanted, provided the requisite sum of lucre could be forthcoming, as he is only averse to barely one sort of ministers. Not so with the ministers whose vocation is of the Lord; they take the oversight of the flock of Jesus, not for filthy lucre's sake, but of a ready mind.

"We call not upon you," says the Circular, "brethren and friends, to relax your efforts in behalf of Domestic Missions. No; God forbid! But we call upon you to bid the Convention, &c., to give to Michigan an educated ministry."

How their pious, covetous souls recoil at the thought of relaxed efforts to provide for the support of their machine-made ministers, and they pray God to issue an order from his throne, forbidding their dupes to give less for the support of their ministers, when made, on account of being taxed by the Convention, to give more for the manufacturing of an additional number of them. If the Convention should succeed in giving Michigan an educated ministry, to whom will that state be indebted for the pestilential boon? Not unto God, for they have only asked him to forbid the people's giving less to the Domestic Mission; but to the brethren and friends of the Convention, as they alone are called upon to aid the Convention to make the bequest. Next flows a train of incentives: "You will soon be in your graves, and your spirits saved," &c. "Your offspring will take your place in Zion and be assured, will long feel the effect which the attitude you now take, &c., will produce." This extract is partly true; those who are cajoled out of their property will not live always to need what they so foolishly contribute, to enable the Convention to insult the God of heaven, and afflict the church of Christ: they may be enclosed in their graves before the scales fall from their blinded eyes, and not live to see what their offspring shall see, nor to feel what their posterity must inevitably feel. Posterity robbed, by an aspiring, avaricious hierarchy, finding the inheritance to which they were naturally and justly entitled, in the hands of a religious aristocracy, and in lieu thereof, entailed to them, poverty and vassalage, embellished with religious establishments of proscription, persecution, inquisitions, prisons, racks, tortures, stakes, chains and fagots, and well may we be assured that posterity shall long feel, and also groan under the deleterious effects of the attitude now taken by those who lend their aid to make an image to the beast whose deadly wound was healed. But that their spirits shall be saved eternally, as promised by the Convention, is not so clear. The original beast, as well as the false prophet, made similar promises of eternal life, to their deluded millions, but who is prepared to believe that the pope's pardon or Mahomet's promise can remit our sins or raise us to immortal glory. The Circular demands a general effort; the sound must echo from every pulpit, and, go from every association and convention on the wings of every wind of doctrine. The zeal with which the Convention labors to forge chains to bind down the people of Michigan, is astonishing, and can only be equaled by that of kindred institutions in other parts of the land. "In arriving at this conclusion," says the Convention, "we do not look back fifty or a hundred years." Well, then they certainly do not look back far enough to find a warrant in the scriptures, or in the practice of the apostolic church; for that would require them to look back eighteen hundred years. But by their own admission, there was nothing of their New School machinery to be found even fifty years ago. These new gods have come newly up. If not fifty years, how old is their idol? Why, it was born in 1843, and lacks some months, according to their own chronology, of being one year old. But here leaks out the secret, viz:

"Education is now liberally patronized by the state. The church must keep pace with the march of mind, or sacrifice her dignity, and with it her moral power over cultivated intellect."

Can "the church," spoken of in this passage from the Circular, be the bride, the Lamb's wife? Is this the virtuous, chaste, modest, beauteous and unspotted spouse, whose Maker is her Husband, and whose Redeemer is the Mighty One of Israel? Does Zion "gad about" in this manner to seek new lovers, and to keep pace with the world - even step with an adulterous generation? Base slander! It is the whore of Babylon, whose name is in her forehead, "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and Abominations of the Earth," and Michigan and all her sister states are even now drunk with the wine of her filthy cup. In the seventh chapter of Proverbs, and the seventeenth of Revelation, this lewd and strange woman is described with unerring accuracy.

How ridiculous, to represent the church upon a stride with the states and nations of the earth, striving to maintain a dignity, by securing humanly cultivated intellect, as though she was afraid of being eclipsed by the superior excellence of the world. If the poor stupid fool who wrote this slander, could but see the kingdom of God, he would behold her as the holy city coming down from God out of heaven, adorned as a bride for her husband; and not adorned as a harlot to seek lovers. In the next sentence of their Circular the Convention brings railing accusations against her Pedo Baptist brethren, her own mother's children, and charges them with annihilating one of the Savior's institutions. This charge is false. The Pedo Baptists do not annihilate any institution of our Savior; nor have they power to annihilate anything that God has established. It is true they practice what they call baptism, as they received it from the pope, but with christian baptism they have nothing to do; and it would greatly relieve the people of God, if all other anti-christian establishments would follow their example, and not profane that sacred rite by applying it to the productions of their anxious benches. But according to the old adage, "Set a rogue," &c. The New School Baptists do oppose the government of our Lord Jesus Christ, preach false doctrine in his name, deny the faith of God's elect, prostitute the ordinances of the gospel, believe that gain is godliness, and usurp the peculiar prerogatives of our Lord Jesus Christ, and then gravely inform the community that they are sustained by the Greek. But the sons of Zion are able to meet, combat, and put them to silence, with no other qualifications than those which their God has given them. One can chase a thousand, and two can put ten thousand to flight.

The next passage of the Circular requiring notice is the pathetic appeal in behalf of those poor panting lads in Michigan! Only imagine, reader, the Position occupied by these boys: they are longing to preach; their souls burn within them to preach; they are poor; they have not the requisite knowledge; with all their ardor and fire, they cannot be pastors, nor missionaries; the internal fire is burning them up. Poor fellows! they are pining away! Oh, shocking! They are in agony of spirit; and lastly they are panting; like a fish out of its element, or a wind broken horse! Is not this enough to touch your sympathies? Will you not shell out your sixpences, and relieve them? Are your hearts made of granite, that you should withhold your money when these panting, burning, agonizing, longing, brainless, lazy, greedy, pining youngsters feel as though they cannot do without it!

"If," says the Circular, "this is the mind of God, he cannot accept less at our hands." Very well, show us in the scriptures, which are the record and revelation of his mind, where he has authorized this course, and we will go into it most heartily; but this cannot be found; the word of God virtually forbids it, and commands those whom he has called to the work to trust alone in him, and to speak with the ability that he giveth; and to speak, not with the words which man's wisdom teacheth, &c. Therefore to require it, as the Convention does, is ad ding to the words of the book of God, and to demand it in the name of Christ, without his order, is forgery.

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT

IT has been supposed by some of our readers that we are opposed to a minister receiving any remuneration from the people of his charge, for his time and services in the gospel ministry; this error has probably grown out of our known aversion to the missionary system. We wish to correct the wrong impression by giving a statement of our views on the subject.

We wish in this, as in every other respect, the churches and preachers to be conformed to the word of God, and we believe the word is as clear and pointed on this point as on any other involved in the relation existing between churches and preachers. The obligations devolving on preachers and churches towards each other are reciprocal, and both parties are viewed in the New Testament as stewards. "For a bishop (pastor or elder) must be blameless as the stewards of God." - Titus i. 7. "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God." - 1 Cor. iv. 1. And Peter writes to the elect to "Use hospitality one to another, without grudging, as every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God." - 1 Peter iv. 9, 10. Here we see that both the ministers and brethren are stewards of God, and as stewards are servants who are entrusted with their master's property, to deal it out according to his direction, so the minister of Jesus receives in trust the mysteries of God; these mysteries then they are bound to deal out or explain to the people of God, and this according to the gift which they have received of the Lord. Now this is the preacher's business; he must preach the word, be instant in season, out of season. &c., and feed the flock of God which he hath purchased with his own blood; nor is he permitted to take thought for the morrow, what he shall eat, what he shall drink, or wherewithal he shall be clothed. This is not his concern; and if he should take thought, what can he do? He cannot add to his stature one cubit, or make one hair black or white; hence it is unnecessary for God's stewards or ministers to bargain with the mission boards or with the churches, by the day, month or year, to preach for a stipulated slim, and hold them bound to raise for him just that amount. There are good reasons why our Lord has otherwise ordered this matter; in the first place, the ministers are not so capable of calculating and providing for themselves as the Lord is for them, and besides their time is to be occupied in other matters; hence our Lord in the order of his kingdom has kindly freed them from that distracting charge, and by his divine arrangement the minister is more immediately called to trust in the Lord for all he needs, both spiritual and temporal. The minister whose living is secured to him by the obligations of responsible men, whose sermons are written down, and prayers committed to memory, no more trust in God for qualifications to preach the gospel than they can in sincerity say, "Give us this day our daily bread."

Again, by making no provisions for stipulated salaries, there is less temptation to those who say, "Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priest's offices, that I may eat a piece of bread." - 1 Sam. ii. 36. As it has pleased the Lord to enjoin upon his ministers that they should "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and has given them the assurance that all these things shall be added unto them, (Matt. vi. 33,) so he has also enjoined upon his church to provide for those who labor in word and doctrine. As stewards, they are entrusted with temporal things, and as they receive from the stewards of the word of their spiritual things, they are required to administer to them of their temporal things. This requires no bargaining between the churches and preachers, for a stipulated sum of money or a given term of service; the church has a right to expect the labors of the minister of Christ, and the minister has a right to expect from his flock a competent support; neither are they to look for these things on the ground of legal obligation or contract, but from the nature of the relation which they stand in, one to the other. No minister of Christ will refuse to do the best, and all he can, to feed the flock of God, so we think no church or individual, in gospel order, will refuse to make their minister as comfortable as they themselves are.

We wish not to forget that there is a vast difference in the circumstances of those whom God has called to preach. Although God's ministers are generally poor, yet there are evidently cases where one minister is more in want of help than another; some have large and expensive families, others have none; some few are wealthy, and need nothing from their flock, others are entirely dependent, and are to live of the gospel; some, again, are not so closely occupied in the labors of the gospel, as to prevent their laboring some part of their time, and thus, in part, minister to their own necessities; yet generally speaking, it seems highly desirable that the ministers should be so far liberated from the distracting cared of this world, at this particular time of trial to the church of Christ, as to spend every moment in the labor of the gospel. There was a time in the primitive church when the ministers of Christ could and did attend to the widows, but there also came another time when it was not meet that they should leave the preaching of the word and serve tables, (Acts vi. 1-4;) and so it appears at the present moment, that the few who remain firm in the old track should be encouraged to go among the scattered sheep and lambs, and confirm them in the truth by preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. Our object in writing on this subject is not to complain of any deficiency in the support of the Old School preachers - we hear none of them complain. Their savory meat, like that of Jacob, in a temporal as well as spiritual sense, is often made ready to their hand, while Esau’s party are penetrating the wilds of mission boards for the former, and theological schools for the latter. But we wish to correct the wrong impression that we are opposed to the idea of ministers receiving from the churches a competent support, when such a support is afforded them in a scriptural manner. We do not oppose it, but believe on the other hand that the obligation on the church to impart to the comfortable support of those whom God has thrust into his vineyard to labor, is as imperitive as is that on the minister of Christ to preach the preaching which Jehovah bids him. We would pursue the subject further, but our limits will not permit us. We hope that some of our correspondents will more fully present this subject in its scriptural light.

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

THE communication of "Joseph," commenced on the first page of this number, may seem to some of our readers some what out of the ordinary course of this paper. It has been common for Old School Baptists to bear heavily upon those who preach for filthy lucre's sake, and make merchandise of the gospel. We have no doubt that some of our brethren, in entering their honest protest against the monied religious institutions of the day, and the avarice of those who, like Isaiah's dumb dogs, can never have enough, have, either from want of proper discrimination, or from some other cause, left great reason for many to suppose they considered it unscriptural for churches to sustain, by pecuniary aid, those whom God has placed among them as preachers of his word. We have, ourself, heard some zealous brethren repudiating, in unmeasured terms, the idea of preaching for money, as though they could not in conscience be prevailed on to receive a cent from those to whom they were preaching, when we have known that their circumstances and those of their families required rather that they should call the attention of their brethren to those passages of scripture quoted by "Joseph."

We are far from believing that a preacher should consider himself called of God to remain year after year with a church which, having the ability to relieve his necessities, has not the faithfulness to do it. Nor do we believe it is scriptural for a church to wait till the patience of her pastor or preacher is exhausted, and force on him the necessity of begging or fretting. There are mutual obligations devolving on both pastor and church.

If a man preaches for filthy lucre's sake, he is a hireling, and should receive no encouragement from the people of God.

But, those who are called of God to the work, and of whose calling the church has no doubt, they are as fully bound by the laws of Christ to supply his temporal wants according to their means, as the preacher is to preach.

With “Joseph,” we are inclined to believe that much of the fault lies with the preachers, in withholding the proper admonition of the gospel; but a still greater fault is in frequently preaching as though they thought it wicked for the ministers of Jesus to receive remuneration from their brethren for their time, service, &c. Let this subject, with every other in the New Testament, receive due consideration and prompt action.

MISSIONARY BENEVOLENCE.

THE following description of Catholic missionism coincides; so fully with that of the Protestant upon the Island of Jamaica, as given by Mr. Weston and corroborated by other testimony as well as the farcical defence of the missionaries themselves, that we give it place. It is from a historical work published in 1825 by H. Huntington.

"An ecclesiastical establishment was instituted in Spanish America as an auxiliary branch of the government, on a similar model to that in Spain, and was extremely burdensome to a young and growing state. At so early a period as the year 1501, the payment of tithes was required and laws made to enforce it. The exactions of the clergy were extended not only to every article of produce, but also to those which comprised a portion of manufacturing industry, such as sugar, indigo and cochineal; and these legal burdens were greatly increased by the bigotry of the colonists and their fondness for external pomp and parade in religion, which made them easy dupes of the clergy, who drained their wealth from productive branches of industry to endow churches and monasteries. Pope Julian Second conferred on Ferdinand and his successors the patronage and disposal of all ecclesiastical benefices in America, so that the Spanish sovereign became the head of the church in America and the administrator of its revenues, a prerogative which he did not possess at home. The bulls of the Roman Pontiff could not be admitted until they had been examined and approved by the king and the council of the Indies. The hierarchy was as imposing as in Spain, and its dominion and influence greater; the arch-bishops, bishops and other dignitaries enjoyed large revenues and the ecclesiastical establishment was splendid and magnificent. The lower order of the clergy consisted of the curates, or parish priests, the doctrineros, who have the charge of such districts as are inhabited by Indians who are subject to the Spanish government, and the missioneras, or missionaries, who are employed in converting the Indios Bravos, or fierce tribes. An inconsiderate zeal for the establishment of monasteries was disclosed at an early period, and from the influence of the regular ecelesiastics these institutions were multiplied to a pernicious extent in a new country where every encouragement ought to be afforded to the increase of population.

"Most of clergy in America were regulars, and many of the highest honors and most lucrative preferments were in their possession. Great numbers came out as missionaries, and most of them in quest of liberty, wealth or distinction. To certain orders of missionaries the pope allowed the privileges of accepting parochial charges and receiving the emoluments, without depending on the bishop of the diocese, or being amenable to him. Some of them, in violation of their monastic vows, openly engaged in commercial pursuits; others amassed wealth by oppressing the natives, whom they pretended to instruct and christianize; and notwithstanding their vow of continency, many of them were dissolute and licentious in a degree almost exceeding belief.

"The success of the missionaries in converting the natives was almost entirely deceptive; they made use of the same unjustifiable means that have been resorted to by the Jesuits in other parts of the world and with like successs. To render the new religion more palatable, and to introduce it with greater facility, they pretended that there was a similarity between the doctrines and mysteries of christianity and the crude notions of their own barbarous superstitions. Being, in many instances, overawed by the power of their conqerors and excited by the example of their chiefs, multitudes expressed a reluctant consent to embrace a religion of which they were entirely ignorant, and were instantly baptized by the missionaries. By such means as these, by fraud and by force, in the course of a few years after the reduction of the Mexican empire, more than four millions of the natives were baptized; but they remained the same, or at least no better, for such spurious conversion; they were not only entirely ignorant of the doctrines and duties of christianity, but retamed all their veneration for their ancient superstitions. This mixture of christianity with their own superstitions and rites was transmitted to their posterity, and has never been eradicated. One ecclesiastic baptized, in one day, five thousand Mexicans, and stopped only when he had become so far exhausted as to be unable to lift his hands. Other missionaries, less successful, declared that the natives were too little removed above the brutes to become christians; and a council was held at Lima which decreed that they had not sufficient understanding to be admitted to the sacrament of the Eucharist. This decree was abrogated by Paul the Third, who, in 1537, promulged a decree declaring them rational creatures, and entitled to the privileges of christians. That infernal engine of hierarchial power, the inquisition, was established in America by the pious zeal of Philip the Second in the year 1570. The natives, from their incapacity, were exempted from the jurisdiction of this horrid tribunal.

"If the Spaniards rendered little benefit to the natives by their attempts to christianize them, their conduct towards them in other respects was severe and oppressive in the extreme." – History of South America and Mexico.

MISSIONARY BENEVOLENCE.

"ELD. WM. C. BUCK – DEAR BROTHER: – Inclosed I send to your care five dollars, which u will please hand over to the treasurer of the Indian Mission Association, to be disbursed for the spiritual benefit of the red men of the forest I would be glad that I could do more, but I cannot at this time. I have set apart a certain portion of my fees, which I receive as clerk of McNairy County Court, for missionary purposes, say twenty-five cents on each marriage license that I issue, to be divided equally between foreign and domestic missions. This I expect to do so long as I am permitted to hold the office. At times I burn with missionary zeal. Oh, bow freely I could then bestow any thing of which I am possessed, if an agent of some missionary society were then to appear before me! At other times, (to use a familiar expression) when I am in the brush, the old antinomian principle (I say old, for I believe it is nearly as old as the world) of withholding more than is meet, draws its snaky folds around my heart. But when I feel, as I believe, the love of God burning in my soul, I feel benevolent; those folds, like Sampson's cords, become like burnt flax, and then it is that I have a spirit truly missionary. There is one thing which I would be glad to know. Can any person become a life member of any missionary society, according to its constitution, by paying so? If so, I would like to see the propriety shown. And is it not dangerous for wicked men to have a vote in matters of so much moment to the cause of God? Might we not fear the consequences of being so closely united with ungodly men? I would be glad that at some convenient time you would insert the article, if there be such in the constitution of any missionary society, in your valuable paper, with your comments annexed. I have not written to you in order that any part of this letter should be published; but I know of no safer hands into which to throw my mite, in order for it to be applied to the use I have mentioned. Oh, may the good Lord bless the little offering, and make it the means of some poor sinner's return from the errors of his way to Christ, the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

"I am, as ever, yours in Christ,
"A. A. SANDERS.
"PURDY, May 17, 1843."

"IN answer to our brother's inquiry respecting life membership in benevolent societies, it may be sufficient to say that the American and Foreign Bible Society grant life member ships for $30 in hand. Many other societies have a similar provision in their constitution, but not all requiring the same sum. We, however, regard such a provision as not only free from all danger, but as a matter of duty to God on the one hand, and of justice to those benevolent individua1 on the other, who not being members of the church, bestow their money for the spread of the gospel. It is an act of duty to God, because as all the gold and silver are his, it is their duty to receive it for his service, let the offering be made by whom it may. And it is an act of justice to those who bestow, that they should at least have a voice in electing the board and officers of the society, who alone have a right to dispose of the money they have given, and especially as all are excluded from these boards but members of the church.

"That no such danger as brother Sanders suggests can arise from such provisions in the constitutions of benevolent societies, is evident; first, because even the prince of darkness himself could lot stir up wicked men enough to give $30 each, whose numbers would exceed those of the church so as to take the direction of the means out of their hands; and secondly, because if such a thing should occur, still as none but members of the church could be elected members of the board, the funds would still be in their hands. But should it be suggested that a sufficient number of worldly men might get into these societies to change the constitution and make a board of their own sort, and thereby control the funds, then we remark that the danger would not consist in their having control of these funds, but in the fact that the church was less christian than the non-professing world, seeing that they done less to honor God and benefit mankind; and in that event we should want to get out of such a church and into such a world, and so we think every good man would. Our good brother need apprehend no danger from this quarter; in this matter the earth is only permitted to help the woman." – Banner and Pioneer.

WE have copied the above from the Banner and Pioneer, that the readers of the SIGNS may form some adequate idea of the craftiness whereby the New School Baptists, in common with their work-mongrel brotherhood of other denominations, lie in wait to deceive.

Mr. Sanders has no desire to conceal from his left hand the benevolence of his right hand; for a strict conformity to the directions given by Christ to his disciples would not answer the purpose of these worshipers of mammon. Sanders is the happy occupant of the fat office of clerk of the county court, and wishing, as we presume, to retain that office, publishes to the world that a portion of his fees are appropriated to sustain one of the numerous schemes of priestcraft for which the present times are so famous. Thus by giving five dollars, and sounding a trumpet as other hypocrites do, he may secure his re-election to that office. It is now distinctly understood that so long as Sanders holds the office, he will pay a bonus to the popular institutions of anti-christ. He may therefore with considerable safety calculate to enjoy the honor and emoluments of that office, until some one will offer to give to the religious speculators who are now becoming sufficiently potent to control the elections in many parts of the land, a greater percentage of the fees. This deep laid plan is commended by the editor of the Banner, who says in his introductory remarks, “We recommend others to adopt similar measures to those of brother Sanders for benevolent purposes.”

The query of Sanders, whether any person can become a life member of any missionary society by paying $30, and whether so close a union with ungodly men is not dangerous, has drawn from the editor such remarks as will, we doubt not, silence all conscientious scruples on the mind of Sanders. After admitting the fact that flattering titles are sold to all descriptions of characters who will pay the money, the editor professes to regard the measure as a duty to God on the one hand, and justice to the ungodly donors on the other, and free from all danger, &c. How little idea friend Buck has of what constitutes a duty to God and justice to ungodly men, may be learned by his decision on this subject. He does not pretend to show that God has anywhere required at our hand to set up this kind of merchandise in his name, and hence we see that what God has required of his creatures is not, with him, the rule of duty; nor does he show what just claim the ungodly have upon professors of religion, to be united with them in the traffic of flattering titles and high sounding encomiums for their precious gold and silver.

Mr. Buck says that “The prince of darkness himself could not stir up wicked men enough to give thirty dollars each, whose numbers would exceed those of the church, so as to take the direction of the measure out of their hands,” &c. Well, we conclude that Mr. Buck knows how much power Satan has in drawing members into those mission institutions about as well a any other man, and we have no doubt that he speaks advisedly when he concludes that if the devil can not persuade a sufficient number of men to join and pay their money, that his emissaries will find it somewhat difficult. But should the missionists beat the devil in his zeal and success in this modern mission mendicancy, and get the world to give mere money than what can be collected from the church, it will only, in the estimation of our friend Buck, prove that the devil and the ungodly, as he denominates them, will have claims upon the christian name superior to the claims of those who bear that name but withhold their pelf, as his rule of judgment is not the scriptures but the amount of money given.

MISSIONARY BOXES

WE copy the subjoined development of corrupted human nature from the Monthly Paper, published at Philadelphia, by the Baptist General Tract Society:

While the inventive genius of so many thousand of our mistaken, deluded and corrupted fellow men is kept upon the rack to find out new schemes of operation in the business of collecting the precious stuff on which they vainly suppose the salvation of souls and the conversion of the world is predicated, and on which they appear to imagine the church of God is built, and in which consists the bulwarks of her security, and the ground work of her prosperity, who can wonder that the schemes of the present times are so many, so novel and so corrupt.

In the wonderful march of mind, characteristic of the present day, those who have caught the infection, seem determined to outstrip everything that has been known or practiced by the Jews, Pagans or Papists, in making a science of divinity, and a mechanism of the regeneration of souls, and it is worthy of note, that every absurdity has to be palmed on the public by degrees, lest the people in view of the palpable incongruity of the project should say, Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?

The use of Missionary Boxes was found out at an early period in the rage of Missionism among the Baptists of America. We distinctly recollect the circumstance, published in an eastern Baptist periodical some eight or ten years ago, of a lady who placed a Missionary Box at her door for the purpose of soliciting donations in behalf of the perishing heathen, and in a very few weeks collected enough money in her box to purchase a splendid piano forte; but the circulating of missionary boxes among the poor of our land, to extort from suffering humanity the little comforts which may remain with them, has been reserved for the day in which we live. How truly did the prophet shy of such “Behold? Ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness.”

When Sunday Schools were first, introduced among us, they professed to be for the benefit of the poor, as charitable institutions, intended only for the benefit of the suffering and much neglected class of community; but what are they now become? Not only are they now viewed as nurseries to the church, auxilaries to religion, and indispensible to the political security of our government, but they are used as a connecting link, to unite the church and state, and in the following extracts the reader will see that they are now to be made a source of revenue to their pious originators and conductors. Missionary Boxes are to be circulated among the children of Sunday Schools, who are of course supposed to be poor and needy, and for whose aid thousands of pounds have been annually collected from the public, which the poor children never knew anything of or received any benefit from.

To palliate the gross impropriety of thus robbing the poor, the writer of the following note says she has often asked “the dear smiling donors if they had suffered hunger or deprivation in consequence of putting their pennies at the disposal of their blessed Lord!” Is it possible that Mrs. Gillett can be the wife of a professed Baptist minister, and living in the city of Philadelphia, and yet be so stupidly ignorant as to believe that the Lord had not the power to dispose of these pennies until she gulled them from those unsuspecting and misguided children, or that these pennies are more immediately at the disposal of the blessed Lord now than when in the hands of the poor children, from whom she has thus clandestinely wrenched them? Or does the lady imagine herself or Ezra Going to be the blessed Lord of these deluded children, and that putting their money at her or his disposal is placing it at the disposition of the Lord? In either case the inevitable conclusion is the same, and she is left to betray a lamentable want of information in regard to these things. Cakes and candies Mrs.. G. denounces as pernicious for children, especially when they cost pennies which might be put into her hands for the Lord hence this scheme to rob them of the means of procuring such pernicious things. Would it not be well for Mrs. G. to get up a Juvenile Anti-cake and Candy Society?

Some parents and guardians have made these boxes a kind of Lord’s treasury, we are told, where in addition to their usual contributions they put their mite! How very ingenious this trick of collecting what mites may remain in possession of those who have already contributed all they can afford, and all to teach the children what neither this lady, nor Ezra Going, nor any of their order themselves appear to believe, viz: that it is more blessed to give than to receive; for if they believe the doctrine they wish others to believe, why are they forever begging, and never allowing themselves the blessed luxury of giving?

SUNDAY SCHOOL MISSIONARY BOXES.

PHILADELPHIA, November 22, 1838.

“Received of Mrs. A. D. Gillett fifty dollars, for Pennsylvania Missions, it being half of the money collected in the San son Street Children’s Missionary Boxes up to this date.

EZRA GOING, Agent.

MR. EDITOR: - As a friendly notice was taken in your paper of our juvenile enterprise, I hope you will allow me to thank you, and to say, the above is one half the proceeds of thirty-four boxes, which have been out about six months only. More than one hundred have been sent out, most of which I presume will return in due time as richly laden as these have been.

While some of these funds have been given by the wealthy, yet some other has been gathered among the industrious poor. I have frequently asked the dear smiling donors as they presented me their box, anxious to know the value of its contents, if they had suffered hunger or any deprivation in consequence of putting their pennies at the disposal of their blessed Lord, instead of spending them for useless toys and pernicious cakes and candies. “None at all,” has been the prompt and sincere reply.

Some parents and guardians have made these boxes a kind of Lord’s treasury, where in addition to their usual contributions, they have “put in their mite,” and by example taught their children a divine lesson. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

That these little rills may join and enlarge the tide of holy benevolence and so increase human joy, is the prayer of yours sincerely.

MISSIONARY DOCTRINES.

THE following editorial remarks follow a lengthy extract copied into the "Signs of the Times," Vol. VI. page 70, from the journal of the Baptist missionary (Mr. Vinton) among the Karens, in which among other extravagant statements, Mr. Vinton says:

"I then gave them (the Karens) a short account of the efforts of the apostles and primitive christians, and of their all but universal conquest over the powers of darkness; that then, when the victory was all but won, the church folded her hands and went to sleep, and slept on for centuries, while Satan secured to himself the fairest portion of the possession that had been given to the Savior; and that now. she is just beginning to awake from her slumbers, and harness on the armor to go forth to the conquest of the World." - Missionary Magazine.

REMARKS.

GENTLE reader, is the doctrine held forth in the above extract in accordance with the scriptures of truth, with divine revelation, with christian experience, with the divine honor, or with the doctrine maintained at the expense of all things by the Baptists of all former ages, from the days of John the Baptist until the corrupt period in which we live? Is it the doctrine taught by the great Head of the church? "All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out' "And this is the Father's will which bath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." "No man can come to me except the Father which hath sent me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day." - John vi. 37, 39, 44. Or is it in accordance with the solemn declaration of our blessed Intercessor, in his appeal to the Father, “As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him”? “Those that thou gayest me I have kept, and none of them is lost but the son of perdition, that the scriptures might be fulfilled” ? - John xvii. 2. 12.

Blessed Savior, is it true that the devil has secured to himself the fairest portion of the possession which thy Father gave thee, and with which he promised thou shouldst be satisfied, when thy soul was poured out unto death? The very people whom by one offering thou hast perfected forever; (Heb. x. 14.) for whom thou hast given thyself, to redeem them from all iniquity, and to purify unto thyself a peculiar people, zealous of good works, (Titus ii. 14;) whom our God “Saved and called with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.” - 2 Tim. i. 9. The fairest portion of that people who were chosen in him before the foundation of the world; predestinated unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ, (not by Satan, as Mr. Vinton has it,) unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his. will, and whom the Eternal Spirit has quickened from their state of death in trespasses and sins, and saved by grace, through faith, and that not of themselves, but by the gift of God. For by grace are they saved, through faith, and that not of themselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast. Eph. i. 4; ii. 1, 8, 9.

Well might the heavens tremble, and the earth be horribly afraid, the saints who have hoped in the salvation of the Lord sink down in keen anguish and despair, while hell and death, devils and infernal ghosts, burst their eternal chains, their black domains would ring with endless yells of victory. But glory to God in the highest, the doctrines of the above extract are as false as the foul spirit from whence they eminated; Jesus has secured unto himself his entire possession of all that the Father has given him in the covenant of redemption, and hell shall rage in vain. They shall not be ashamed or confounded in a world without end; for Christ has given to them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of his hand. Their life is hid with Christ in God, so that when he who is their life shall appear, they appear with him in glory.

Their eternal destiny is immutably and eternally fixed, not to be slept away; their place of defence is the munition of rocks, the Eternal God is their refuge, and underneath are his everlasting arms.

Let all such Baptists as are wavering on the subject of missions read and duly examine the foregoing extract from Mr. Vinton's journal, compare them with Judson's letter to the American females, try them by the scriptures of truth, and then say how much money or influence they feel at liberty to give in support of the doctrines which they teach. Review the above extract; for Mr. V. declares that he has never before, in Karen, been able to present the truth with so much plainness and force! All prior attempts have failed so clearly and fully to express his sentiments. Witness his agony - for what? Why because that the natives are not reconciled to God. But is Mr. V. himself reconciled to God? By no means; for the Lord will not do what Mr. V. desires, and that for which he is in so much distress. But could Mr. V. know that God would do what he wants him to do, and that at Mr. V.'s time (speedily) his aching heart would cease to bleed; but until the Lord will lay aside his determinate counsel, and adopt that of Mr. V., he asks, he desires no rest. Could he know that God would speedily undertake the work of subjugating their (those Karens) souls to himself? - such are the terms on which Mr. V. would base a treaty of peace with the Lord. The Lord must at this late hour undertake something new, notwithstanding all God's works were finished from the foundation of the world. The wire workers of the Foreign Mission machinery have ever been representing that God had long since began this work; but now, if we credit the statement of Mr. V., after so many thousands of gold had been spent in the experiment, so many missionaries sent over, and so many proselytes made to their faith, Mr. V. has no assurance that God will ever so much as begin or undertake, i. e., let Mr. V. and his associates have the upper hold, and the Lord take the under hold of the business. All this time they have been working without divine aid or warrant, and without knowing the mind of God on the subject.

Is this man who pretends to be so solicitous that the Karens should be reconciled to God, himself reconciled, when he proclaims himself one thousand times more benevolent than Christ? Jesus died but once to save sinners, and there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin; but Mr. V. would willingly die one thousand deaths for the same purpose, if he tells the truth; and seems much dissatisfied because the Lord will not (as he knows of) do any more. And yet he professed to commit this work to Christ.

One wife, who is not on the Lord's side, has been waiting a number of months, (not for the church to break from the slumbers of centuries, or for the Holy Spirit to quicken her, but) for her husband to come out on the Lord's side. This expression alone shows how much Mr. V. knows about a work of grace; he makes it all to rest upon free will and human power.

The circumstance of his interrupting Ko Panlah, whose views of God and truth appear, by far, more correct and in accordance with the bible than those of his teacher; and who had arrived at the just conclusion that the reason why they had been suffered to exist for so long a time without the knowledge of a crucified Savior, was because God had withheld from them that knowledge, shows the overflowing corruption and blasphemy of his heart. He even dares to contradict the express declarations of our Lord Jesus Christ, in relation to the perfect security of his church, embracing all that possession which his Father has given him, and to represent the Lord as sending the fairest portion of his possession down to hell, not for their guilt, but for the guilt of the less fair and guilty part, which have gone. to heaven in a profound sleep.

If this sentiment be true, the church in glory will look far less glorious than when seen by John in his vision on the Isle of Patmos. The fairest portion must include the Head, for nobody can be fair or beautiful without a head. The Lord’s portion is his people, he has made them fair, and adorned them as a bride for her husband. But alas! if Mr. V. speaks truth, she is in hell, and just awaking from a nap of nearly two thousand years, and providing herself with munitions of war for the conquest of the world. We do not know what disposition Mr. V. intends to make of the world after conquering it, but we conjecture that he intends to substitute it in the stead, and send it to heaven as a kind of apology for the non-appearance of the fairest portion of Christ’s possession, which Christ has pledged himself to raise - up again at the last day. Be that however as it may, we are assured that heaven will never ratify such a change. God has chosen his people in Christ before the world began, and has redeemed them out of the world, and has offered his divine intercession for them, and not for the world; and after all, would be marvelous indeed if the world, out of which he has chosen and redeemed them, are finally saved, and the people chosen and redeemed, are gone down to hell, being by Satan secured to himself, while the church, with folded arms, was sleeping.

MISSIONARY DOCTRINES CONTINUED.

"WHEN the victory was all but won, the church folded her hands and went to sleep, and slept on for centuries; while Satan secured to himself the fairest portion of the possession that had been given to the Savior." - Vinton.

WE gave, in our last number, an extract from Mr. Vinton's journal, containing the words at the head of this article, and on the extract as copied by us we offered some remarks. With the remarks then made we would willingly let the doctrines of Vinton rest with those of Judson, as a lasting demonstration of the corruption and rottenness of the Burman mission, but for the fact that the conductors of that mission, glorying in their shame, are trumpeting the same abroad through their New School papers, with nearly as much enthusiasm as they did the blasphemies of Judson. We have read the same extract in the Gospel Witness (so-called) of New York, in the Cross and Journal of Ohio, and the Record of Philadelphia, without a single stricture from the conductors of those journals, which of course goes fully to endorse the doctrine as that which is countenanced and held by all the missionary advocates.

On the doctrine of the above extract, what we published in our last must suffice for the present; but we wish to look the admission which they have made full in the face. The history of the church from the apostolic age will furnish no example of what our missionary zealots are now engaged in, until within the short space of the few years past, in which they say the church is beginning to awake, &c.

Anti-effortism, alias anti-missionism, by the New School charged so exclusively on the Old School Baptists, (and by Mr. Vinton's version of the terms are perfectly appropriate, inasmuch as they are brought and used to describe those churches and individuals who stand opposed to modern missions,) is by themselves found to have been the prevailing ism in the church of Christ from the apostolic to the present age.

Some of the very periodicals which have virtually indorsed the declarations of Mr. V. have on former occasions denied the antiquity of the Old School Baptists, and have attempted to fix the period of their origin as late as thirty or forty years back; but now they see very clearly that this people have existed more than seventeen centuries, and that their existence has enabled old Satan to thwart the designs of heaven, make void the sure word of promise, the oath and counsel of the Lord, and wrest from the hands of the Savior the fairest portion of his possession.

By their own showing, we, the old flatfooted, iron-sided, hard-headed, slumbering Baptists, are thrown into the company of and identified with the true and only church of Christ for ages past.

We are certainly vain enough to think that our existence for the uninterrupted space of more than seventeen hundred years, demonstrated by our enemies themselves, gives us some claim to the distinctive appellation of Old School, or ground for some pretension to antiquity; may we not expect them by and by to leak out the fact that we have existed as the church of Christ, not only from the apostles' day, but also from the days of John the Baptist?

But if our opponents will "hold still a minute," as brother West would say, we will examine the bearing this admission must have on their claim to the character of christians, and of being engaged in the work of the Lord. They have yielded the fact, as we have shown, that the history of the church since the apostles fell asleep furnishes them with no example for that which they are now engaged in. Very well, their testimony thus far is correct;. but have they pointed us to any example in the apostolic age of the church for constituting Mission Societies, selling memberships, begging agents, mission boards, and of men, as missionaries, called by men, hired by men, directed by men, being sent out to wage war with the world, by imposing on heathen nations a system as far in the rear of Paganism, or Judaism, as Messrs. Vinton and Judson's doctrines are behind the views entertained by Ko Panlah, the Karen? They have not, nor can they produce any such example from the New Testament. If they can, we challenge it; if they will, we will then yield the point.

But once more. While they establish the antiquity of the Old School Baptists, their own origin bears even date with what they call the waking up of the church, which is now, as Mr. V. says, "just beginning."

When the New School advocates discuss the relative beauty of the effort and the anti-effort portions of the professed church of Christ, do they not uniformly give the decided preference to the former portion, and contend that they are the fairest? But Mr. Vinton says, (and who has a better opprtunity to know, being himself of that party,) while the anti-effort portion were asleep, Satan was wide awake, and has secured to himself the fairest (i. e., the effort) portion. If his conclusions are correct, he has fallen into the pit he prepared for the church, and the blow aimed at the steadfast adherents to the primitive faith, order and practice, has fallen on his own party, and he, like Balaam, the ancient hireling foreign missionary, (in the modern use or abuse of the term,) while assaying to curse Israel, for Balak's honors and emoluments, was, contrary to his own inclination, compelled to bless them altogether.

THE MISSION SPIRIT EVOKED.

From the Baptist Record.

'HONOR TO WHOM HONOR'

"I MAY here remark, that the accounts of those dear Baptist brethren, Fuller, Hyland, Carey, and others, as to the destitution of the East, laid the foundation of missions in America. Influenced by love to souls, they (four young men, Judson, Rice, Newel, and G. Hall,) were accustomed to pour out their hearts in prayer, at the back of a haystack, which was near to the college; and there called down a missionary spirit from heaven, which has proved the glory of our country." - E. N. KIRK.

REMARKS.

CERTAINLY nothing can be more just than to render honor to whom honor is due, and as Andrew Fuller and Co., have laid the foundation of missions in America, and as they instigated Judson, Rice, Newell and Hall to call down the missionary spirit, (or more properly to call it up) it is but justice that these gentlemen should have all the honor of the craft. We do think it most awfully presumptuous for men to insult the Divine Majesty, by ascribing to God, as being dictated by his spirit, that which, by their own showing, was founded by Fuller and his companions in iniquity, and is prosecuted by a spirit under the dictation and control of Judson and his fellows, which they called down behind the hay stack.

When Zion's King sent forth his champions to preach the everlasting gospel, he gave them distinctly to understand that, they should be subject to the government of the Holy Spirit; but in that case honor belonged to God, and his glory will he not give to another, nor his praise to graven images.

None were his counsellors, none his assistants in the grand work of calling, qualifying, sending forth or sustaining those whom he designated for the sacred work.

Is it not surprising that men who boast of their wisdom and erudition, should in one breath ascribe the missionary enterprise to Fuller, who denies the infallible efficacy of the blood of Christ to wash away all the sins of all for whom it was shed, and those of his sentiments, should in the next, as is not infrequently the case, ascribe the whole work to God. If the writer of the above extract, or the Baptist Publication Society who have given currency to its sentiments, are so ignorant of the character, sovereignty and omnipotence of the Eternal Spirit as to suppose that Judson, and others were able to call him down, from heaven, we ask, can greater darkness brood over those heathen lands which they contemplate the conversion of, than those sable shades that so completely enfold the minds of every son of Adam who is capable of endorsing the sentiments expressed by them?

MISSING MANUSCRIPTS.

Beloved Brother Beebe: - After so long a time I take the opportunity to address you a few lines. I am still upon the shores of time, an unchanging Old School Baptist, because I believe them spiritually right in the doctrine of God our Savior, and the only professing people on the face of the earth that implicitly take the word of God as the rule of faith and practice. Since first I commenced taking the "Signs of the Times," most of the brethren in the ministry then have received their discharge, and have gone home to reap in the harvest-field of perfect love the trophies of victorious grace, and have left me and a few of my old beloved brethren to battle on in this present evil world with the man of sin, the fighting of flesh, and opposition of science, falsely so called. Never was anti-christ more potent, never more aroused earth and hell, to develop their characteristics than now. The fullness of his development will soon be attained, and then shall the end come, when the Lord shall destroy him with the brightness of his coming and the glory of his appearing. It is ours to wait with patience, and trust alone in God. I greet our beloved brethren of the South, who have suffered and are suffering so dire-fully. I too have suffered, God knows how much. My poor heart is made glad and joyful to hear from them through the "Signs," and learn that they stand fast in the Lord. This is not our home; here we have no abiding city. Earth is not our inheritance, nor human governments our prop. Whoso leans upon it leans upon a broken staff that will pass away like the chaff from the summer threshing floor. But hope, saving hope, never faileth. The storm with its last fitful gust shall have passed away, and it abides still.

The communication on Revelation 11 which I sent you for publication has never appeared in the "Signs." Well, it was your privilege to print, or not, as you thought best: but what objection you could have to sending it back, I cannot tell. I also sent you another piece for publication, viz.: I was appointed by the Western Association of Iowa, last year, to write a corresponding letter to the California Association, which I did. It was accepted, and I was requested to sent it to brother Beebe for publication, which I did, but it has not appeared. The communication on Revelations has been so long ago that I am not particularly anxious now whether you send it to me or not.

I am sorry to have got so far in arrears for your paper, but, brother Beebe, I could not help it. I was broken up by thieves, robbers and murderers in Missouri, and have been disappointed since in collecting money due me two years ago. I feel thankful to you, brother Beebe, for your patience in waiting. I hope to do better for the future. The "Signs" I love to peruse. For thirty years they have been a family visitor, and I would feel worse to lose them than Micah did when they stole his gods. I enclose four dollars, which you will please credit on the label on my paper.

Yours in gospel bonds,
Elmore G. Terry.

Reply: - If brother Terry could spend a few weeks with us in our sanctum, count the number of letters constantly pouring in, many of them while we are absent, note the hasty manner in which we are compelled to examine and dispose of them, he would not be surprised that some possessing merit are overlooked and forgotten by us. Sometimes our correspondents request us to return their manuscripts, if we fail to publish them, or if we disapprove of them. Those who wish us to return their manuscript should so instruct us when they send them, as the accumulation of papers in our office would make it a very difficult task to overhaul barrels of old letters to find such as they wish us to return. It would be much easier for them to reserve a duplicate when they send the original.

We wish it to be distinctly understood that we cannot and do not hold ourselves obligated to return such letters as are sent us. Nor is it possible for us to write a review of such as we do not publish, pointing out what may seem to us objectionable in them. Many letters are from necessity laid aside, to which we have no particular objection. From the whole mass of communications placed in our hands, we deem it our duty and privilege to select such as in our judgment will give the greatest amount of edification and satisfaction to our readers. When we have plenty of space to spare, we have published the circulars and corresponding letters of associations, who do not publish them in their Minutes; and almost invariably insert in our columns the circulars and corresponding letters of such associations as have their Minutes printed at our office, before distributing the type; and these occupy about as much space in the "Signs" as we can spare for that purpose.

We recognize brother Terry as one of our oldest patrons, and an able writer, and would feel grieved to give him occasion to think we would neglect him from any lack on our part to appreciate him as a brother, a minister, a patron, or an able and talented writer; for we do esteem him in love for his work's sake, and deeply sympathize with him and others in the serious losses they have sustained by the devastating war which has so terribly distracted and distressed our country.

THE MOAT AND A BEAM.

(Luke vi. 41-45.)

Brother Peter Mowers, of Cobleskill, N. Y., Has requested us to preach through the SIGNS from Luke vi. 41-45; and although we do not feel prepared to sermonize in what we may write upon the subject, we feel inclined to offer some remarks, which we hope maybe edifying to brother Mowers, and to our readers generally.

The text as he recorded by Luke is, according to the version of Matthew vii. 3, embodied in what is called Christ's sermon on the mount, which was addressed exclusively to the disciples of our Lord. – Matt. v. 1, 2. Great multitudes, attracted by the fame of the miracles which cheese is wrought, and which was spread throughout Syria, followed him from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordon; but the discourse was not addressed to the multitudes, for it is written, "And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain: and when he was set, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth, and taught them." The instructions, exhortations, reproofs and admonitions been in there uttered were all dressed the disciples, apart from the multitudes, and should be regarded as peculiarly applicable to his disciples throughout all time. In the instructions given, our Lord solemn reward his disciples against attempting to instruct others in regard to those things of which they have themselves no reliable knowledge. To assume to be teachers of things of which we are ourselves profoundly ignorant, is like the blind leading the blind, exposing both teacher and pupil to a disastrous bull into the ditch, or into difficulties which the blind cannot see until involved in them. Assuming to know that of which we have not really been taught of the Lord, or to be wise above what is written is forbidden, and has a tendency to darken counsel of words without knowledge. If there were no such vain ambition in the fleshly nature of the children of God, no lofty aspirations to seem to be something more than we are, why are the solemn admonitions given to the disciples by the Master, and reiterated by his own apostles?

A censorious and pharisaical demeanor tour De our brethren, a quickness to detect faults and infirmities of others, and slow indeed to discover or confess our own, is open to the reproofs of him whose all-seeing eye looks into the dark recesses of our hearts. “And why beholdest thou the moat that is in thy brother’s eye, but perceive not that being that is in thine own eye?” The eye is a very tender organ, and a very small moat will sometimes cause great pain and inflammation, and so there are some very tender members in the church, which is the body of Christ, and it is undoubtedly right for those were blessed with clear sight to carefully remove the motes and allay the pain; but an occultist with a glaring been in his own eye, is thereby a totally unfit to operate upon the eye of another, and he is like those Pharisees who were very precise in tithing of mint and rue and all manner of herbs, and passed over judgment and the love of God. – Luke xi. 42. To make a brother and offender for a word, while we indulge in much greater departures from a law of the Lord, is pharisaical and hypocritical. To illustrate his point, permit us to support a case. A brother discovers a fault, or what he’d magnifies into a fault, in a brother, and flies into a passion, assumes to be grieved, when he is only angry, tells what he considers his brother’s fault to others, and does what he can do to produce a prejudice against the brother, pursues him with a vindictive, turbulent and persecuting spirit; the persecuted brother’s fault must be very great indeed, if it is not a trifling mote in comparison with the beam that blurs the eye of his accuser. “Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own mind, and then shall thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in my brother's eye."

We are not, however, to infer that, because we are bowed down under a sense of our own imperfections, we may suffer sin to rest on a brother, without making an attempt to admonish the brother; for a sense of our own imperfections is a necessary qualification for dealing faithfully with the erring, if we see and feel our own shortcomings, it isn't evidence that we can see clearly, and have not had been in our own eye. "If a brother be overtaken and a full, ye that our spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." – Gal. vi. 1. If we do not consider our own liability to temptation and faults, we're not in a proper frame to deal with the erring; the beam is in our own eye, and we would be more likely to point out our brother's eye and to relieve him of his mote.

We learn from this admonition the necessity of self-examination when we admonish others. See that we're meek and lilee in our own spirit, and that our desire is to restore, not to persecute, the erring. If we first cast out the beam that obscures our own site, we shall lay aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speaking, (1 Peter ii. 1); then shall we see clearly to pull the mole from brother's eye.

"A good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." The spirit of Christ that we receive in the new birth cannot commit sin, for his seed remain a th in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. – 1 John iii. 9. This spirit in the saints is compared to a good tree, and such as are called "Trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified." – Isa. lxi. 3. They cannot bring forth correct fruit; for "the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." – Gal. v. 22, 23. With these fruits abounding in us we shall see clearly, and be able to render valuable service to our brethren; but the old corrupt tree of flesh cannot produce such golden fruit, for, "Now the works [or fruits, or productions] of the flesh [that which is born of the flesh, and is flesh, is a corrupt tree, and its fruits] are manifest, which are these: Adultery fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings, and such like." – Gal. v. 19-21. Now when any of these fruits or works are manifest, it cannot be hard to discover which tree has borne them. The works of the flesh never grew on the good tree planted by the Lord, and made manifest by a heavenly birth, neither have the fruits of the Spirit grown on the fleshly tree; for the one can not bear good fruit, nor can the other bear correct fruit. "For every tree is known by his own fruit. For of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes." Only the fruits of the Spirit that dwelleth in those who are born from above can qualify us to labor successfully for the restoration of an erring brother, while the works of the flesh will blur as with the blinding being our eye, and disqualify us for usefulness in the house of God. "A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good." God has shined in and written his law in the new heart which he has given his children, and this treasure they have in their earthen vessels, from which they bring forth good things, for God working in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure. "And an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh." The old man, our fleshly nature, we are told, is corrupt, with its affections and lusts, and this corruption is manifest, as we have shown, in all the works of the flesh. But the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness, is born of incorruptible seed, by the Word of God, which live with and abide forever, and cannot, therefore, bring forth correct fruit.

MORAL SUASION OR NATURAL CONVICTION, VS. THE FAITH OF THE GOSPEL.

To those who are unacquainted with the real grounds of difference between the views of the Old School Baptists and those of the new order, some remarks on the above subject may be interesting. The subject of evangelical faith is frequently treated as though there existed no difference between the natural convictions of the mental powers of man, and that faith which the apostle says is "Of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead." - Col. ii. 12. In order rightly to understand this subject, we should inquire into the nature and origin of the two essentially different kinds of faith. That there is a kind of faith, common to intelligent beings, which is essentially different from the faith of the gospel, is clear both from scripture and observation. "Thou believest there is one God; thou doest well, the devils also believe and tremble" - James ii. 19. That devils are susceptible of that kind of conviction that compels them to yield to the force of truth, and believe that of which they are rationally convinced by testimony, is a sufficient demonstration that intelligent beings without spiritual life are capable of conviction, and may be led to believe that there is a God, a heaven and a hell, because they are unable to resist the testimony presented to their minds that such is the case. And because unregenerate men, and even children, are capable of such convictions, many have attempted to prove that genuine faith is a fruit of the natural mind, and a condition of life and salvation. Upon this false conclusion, all the machinery of the present age is brought to bear upon the intellectual powers of men, in order to bring them to believe certain things in regard to God and a future state. From their cradles to their tombs they are taught religion as they are taught earthly things, in the same natural and systematic manner that they are instructed in the arts and sciences of this world. The modern religious inventions, such as infant, Sabbath and theological schools, &c., are all based upon the same false and deceptive theory, and the general motto with arminians is Moral suasion. While we admit that natural men possess intellectual powers of mind sufficient to draw correct and legitimate conclusions from all given principles in nature, and to believe all such things as are, supported by such testimony as they deem sufficient, yet we contend, and by the eternal truth of heaven we prove, that their belief or disbelief in this manner can never change their nature, make one hair white or black, nor bring them one step towards God, holiness or heaven. Whatever this kind of natural faith may be, it certainly, as God is true, is not the faith of God's elect, is not that faith which is of the operation of God, is not the faith which is the fruit of the Spirit and the gift of God, and is in no wise connected with salvation, or devils possessing it might escape the vengeance of eternal fire.

As every stream must be of the same nature with the fountain whence it flows, so every kind of faith must in nature agree with the source from which it emanates. To trace the origin of natural faith (by which term we include all that the natural man is capable of possessing) to its primeval source, where is its origin? whence does it flow? As unregenerate men and even devils can and do possess it, it must have its origin in something short of grace. Our Lord Jesus has himself declared, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," (John iii. 6,) from which express declaration we prove that all that .a natural man is or can be is of the flesh. All his power and faculties, physical and mental, his soul, his body, and all that pertains to unregenerate man is born of the flesh, and consequently is flesh, and as in this state possessing no power or ability other than that which he possesses as a natural man; and by virtue of his natural birth of the flesh, he can be and is capable of reasoning and forming conclusions from given premises, can and does believe or disbelieve, according to the weight which testimony presented to his understanding may have on his mind, therefore all his belief or disbelief is earthly, sensual, and we may add, in language which God has inspired, devilish. If the arminian's own statement of the origin or his faith may be relied on, it is of the flesh for all arminians agree that man by nature possesses all power necessary to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, that faith is an act of the natural man, that he is endowed by nature with this power, and is required on pain of damnation to exercise it hence, from their own theory, their faith is altogether natural, and precisely of the kind which devils have. Unlike the faith of the gospel, which has God for its author and object, the faith of arminians is communicative, or perhaps we might better say contagious, for it can not only be taught by every man to his neighbor, and every man to his brother, by Sabbath Schools, tracts, &c., but even without the use of such popish inventions the contagion spreads like a pestilence wherever grace does not prevent. Do any accuse us of misrepresenting the popular views of the religionists on the subject of faith? We refer such for a farther confirmation of the correctness of our conclusions to the uniform practice of all the various branches of the anti-christian kingdom of his diabolical majesty. This natural faith is manifested by Catholics when they count their beads or say mass; by their firstborn harlot daughter, in reading prayer, and bringing her carnal offspring by rantism into the pale of what they call their church; by the balance of her brood in various ways, catechisms, six months' probations or apprenticeship, and by all the different modes by which they urge them into their churches and to subscribe their creeds. Nor are the new order of Baptists exceptions to these examples, for they have sufficiently aped the Catholic mother and her Protestant daughters, and what they have lacked in the sprinkling system of paedobaptists, they have made up by excelling all their arminian brotherhood in the invention of traditions with which to make void the commandments of God. In the doctrine that man possesses sufficient natural abilities to exercise faith, all the various orders of worldly religionists agree, and they regard genuine faith as being no more than that which they can persuade men into by reasoning, coaxing, wooing, beseeching, exciting and captivating.

Nor is it at all strange that they should thus regard faith, when they consider the gospel itself, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, only as a commodity which they can monopolize and export or import free from duty or tariff, according to the amount of capital they are able to invest in the enterprise. They talk of getting up revivals of religion, of making converts, of evangelizing the heathen and of converting the world to their faith, in as cool and calculating a manner as though they did not know that Isa. xlv. 22, John vi. 44 and Acts iv. 12 were passages of scripture.

From all that we have written, our readers may perceive that we believe what God our Savior has said, “Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.” - John iii. 3. And that all the excitement that can be produced upon the animal feelings or mental powers of natural men are abortive and vain; and although silly women, aye, and men too, may be captivated, and thousands may be led out of one false notion into another equally absurd by moral suasion, yet, until we find authority in the scriptures to believe that one heresy is more sacred, in the divine estimation, than another, or that one lie is less pernicious and abominable than another, we must maintain our conclusion, that all that emanates from the flesh is carnal, earthly and devilish, and that they that are in the flesh cannot please God. And

although man may possess any quantity of humanly devised and humanly communicated faith, still he remains a natural man, a child of wrath, an enemy to God, a despiser of truth, and will assuredly sink clown to the perdition of ungodly men with all his religion and faith, if he be not saved by a method as far superior to any ever taught by man as the heavens are higher than the earth, or as Christ is superior to Adam. That men may be persuaded by argument to abandon some vicious practices, and thereby become better citizens of the world, better husbands, fathers, sons, neighbors, &c., we freely admit, and all this may be done without one spark of grace. But because this may be done, we have no right to represent, as an inducement to such reformation, that such reformation will effect the final destiny of the reformed; for such is not the truth, and such a doctrine would set aside the Savior's blood and righteousness, as being indispensible to the salvation of a sinner: could we by labor or by art wash out the blackness of an Ethiopian, or change the spots of a leopard, this would not change their natures. The Ethiopian would remain an Ethiopian still, although a white Ethiopian, .and the leopard, though externally differing from his kindred leopards, would not become a lamb. The old pharisees were as busily engaged in their day, in this kind of superficially religionizing, as the modern pharisees now are; and our Lord charged them with being whited sepulchres, and of making clean the outside of the cup and platter, &c. Even if we had the power to regenerate dead sinners, and should put That power in requisition for that purpose, it would not constitute them, so regenerated, the sons of God nor heirs of glory; it would only make them our own sons, and the heirs of ourselves. Those to whom Christ has given power to become the sons of God, are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. John i. 13.

Joshua made no distinction between one system of idolatry and another, but gave those children of Israel to whom it seemed evil to serve the true God, their choice between the gods that their fathers served on the other side of he flood and the gods of the Amorites in whose land they dwelt. Joshua xxiv. 15. Not that Joshua did or would countenance idolatry in any way or to any extent, but rather that he would have them know that all was alike, and no god of human invention is preferable to another. The calf which Aaron made of the Egyptian trinkets was no better than the gods which Rachel stole from her father, and the gold and silver lavished on a greedy and insatiable missionary priesthood in this nineteenth century to which the salvation of sinners is ascribed, is no less idolatrous than it would be if it were moulded into the shape of a calf or in any other shape. To ascribe the work of God, such as the regeneration of souls or the preparation of men for the ministry of the gospel, or sustaining them in the work, is as abominable and idolatrous as to make a god in any other shape or of any other material, or to worship it in any other way. We may just as well be Catholics, Mormons or pagans, as to be anything else, if we be not born of God, so far as religion is concerned. "No lie is of the truth," although ungodly teachers are charged with handling the word of God deceitfully, and of turning the truth of God into a lie.

In distinction from all these views of faith, as held by the popular workmongers of all distinctive names and denominations, the Old school Baptists, (so called, not in reference to any school other than the school of Christ) hold that faith is the gift of God: and that the faith peculiar to the heirs of salvation, is the faith of Jesus Christ; that it is established in the hearts (not heads) of his people, by the operation of God; that it is the fruit of that Spirit by which they are regenerated. And as that which is born of the flesh is flesh, so also that which is born of the Spirit is spirit; and as we derive all our natural powers of body and mind from Adam, so we derive all our spiritual life and action from Christ. As a pure fountain cannot send forth corrupt streams, so neither can a corrupt fountain send forth pure waters. In short, what the Old Fashioned or primitive order of Baptists are, is what all orders of the Arminians oppose and reproach; and so long as the world shall continue to love its own doctrines and men, so long may we, of the old order, expect the New School Baptists and all other workmongrel orders to outvie us in worldly respectability, in numbers, and in worldly influence. It is perfectly in harmony with their faith to make their own converts and ministers, and if they want many or few to suit the quantity to their wishes. But not so with the church of God, she is true to her Head, Husband and Lord; she asks not for nor desires any sons or daughters of whom Christ is not the legitimate Father. She asks not for ornaments, other than those in which Jerusalem is adorned as a brkle for her Husband. And although in this world she has to labor and suffer reproach because she trusts in the living God, yet she esteems the reproaches which are heaped on her as being better than all the honors of the world, or treasures of Egypt.

We have now lying on our table, a sermon by T. G. Keen, before the ministerial meeting of Kentucky, and published by request of that New School body, in which our description of their views on this subject is sustained thus:

"The mind must be penetrated by the force of scriptural truth before a spirit of holiness can be diffused, or a principle of virtuous living implanted. Religious reflections must in the order of nature, precede religious feeling. One of the most predominant feelings of human nature is to overthrow the authority of God, and to stamp with folly and weakness every essential truth.

"There is no affinity between the faith of the gospel and the grosser feelings of the degenerate mind. The spirit of incredulity has been deeply imbedded in our fallen nature, and it is greatly strengthened by habitual culture. And it is an incontestible fact, that important results as the effect of any scheme, are not believed till the abstract cause is established by the most irrefragable proof. This is in a peculiar sense applicable to the reception or rejection of the bible. As well might we dream of some flaming meteor passing through the sky and illuminating the human mind, as to expect the triumph of christianity without its doctrines being fully established by the most conclusive testimony."

If by the spirit of holiness the Holy Ghost is meant, they deny the power of God to quicken a dead sinner without a preparatory work Performed by the flesh; and if such is not their meaning, it will be hard to interpret such jargon. We understand them to say and mean that we may as well look for some flaming meteor passing through the sky to enlighten dead sinners, as to look for the Holy Ghost to enlighten them without the intervention of those pious occultists to remove the mote, in whose eyes huge beams remain. At antipodes with this sentiment is the doctrine of Christ and the Apostles. See John vi. 63; 1 Cor. ii. 11.

MORE OF THE FRUITS.

IN primitive times of the Baptist church, the criterion by which the genuineness of a religious revival was demonstrated was according to Acts ii. 42. The converts continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers. But the revivalists of the New School have now hit upon a criterion much better suited to their purpose. Mr. Jacob Knapp, in reporting, through the Baptist Advertiser of New York, the result of his efforts at Albany, holds the following language:

"As one evidence of the genuineness of this work, it may be duty to say, that one of the converts, a member of the Green Street congregation, handed brother Hodge fifteen hundred dollars - five hundred for foreign missions, and five hundred for domestic missions, five hundred for the American and Foreign Bible Society; and on Saturday before I left I went out among the converts and members of Dr. Welch's church and congregation, and obtained five thousand dollars for the Literary and Theological Institutions of the State of New York. I am quite certain that in these times of great depression in money matters, nothing but the grace of God could have opened these earthly fountains, withered and killed the root of all evil, and caused the golden stream to flow so freely. Yours with much affection,

JACOB KNAPP."

It is a fact too obvious to be passed without notice, that the evidences required by those of the New School party, that a revival is genuine, does not embrace a single vestige of what was by the apostles and primitive church considered indispensible; and what they receive as conclusive testimony on this point is, as we will presently show, what the apostles and apostolic church attached no kind of importance to whatever. In the course of his letter, Mr. Knapp says: “More than one hundred have been baptized into the fellowship of the church of which Mr. Welch is pastor, and some thirty or more into the fellowship of the church under pastoral care of brother lodge. Many have united with the churches of other denominations, and many more are without the pale of any church.” Now if these revived sinners had been quickened by the Holy Spirit, instead of being revived by Mr. Knapp, they would have been undoubtedly converted from the error of their ways and into the apostles’ doctrine. Such a conversion would, in our opinion, never have inclined them to a connection with Mr. Welch’s church, or that of Mr. Hodge; they would rather have sought for the Zion of God with their faces thitherward. But allowing (what we in conscience cannot do) that these two churches were standing in the apostles’ doctrine; the fact that many of the converts made joined other denominations, shows that their conversions did not bring them into anything like a unity of faith. The same efforts that made converts for Dr. Welch’s church and for the other nominally Baptist church in Albany, also furnished materials Which could be as conveniently worked into Presbyterians and Methodists as into that sort of Baptists. It would be an outrageous misrepresentation of the apostles’ doctrine and fellowship, to say that the former was held and the latter enjoyed by all those denominations among whom Mr. Knapp’s converts are scattered. But Mr. Knapp counts them all, the ring, streaked and the speckled, together with all the balance, as Jacob’s cattle; whether they united with the Baptists or other denominations seemed to be a matter of no importance. It should never be forgotten by the saints, that all such as are not in the apostles’ doctrine, are out of the apostles’ fellowship. Hence, John says: “If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive them not into your house ;“ and Paul says: “Though we, or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.” And again: “Mark them which cause divisions and offences among you, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them.” But these are antiquated landmarks with New School Baptists, quite obsolete. Mr. Knapp has tested his converts by a new standard, and triumphantly reports them genuine, viz: They are excessively liberal in their donations. Well, liberality, if properly directed is good in itself; but even then it is of itself no evidence of a change of heart. According to Mr. Knapp’s criterion, it would not be difficult to prove that Simon Magus was a true convert to the faith; he was as flush with his cash, perhaps, as the Baltimore and Albany converts were; and some where in tho writings of an old Israelitish prophet we read of men who under very similar revival spirits were wont to lavish gold out of the bag for religious purposes, and yet the anti-benevolent Isaiah denounced these liberal souls as idolaters. Another remarkable instance of liberality is recorded of a pious old matron who wholly dedicated eleven hundred shekels of silver unto the Lord, from the hand of her son who had stolen it, to make a molten image and a graven image. - See Judges xvii. 2, 3.

Many other examples are mentioned in the scriptures, such as the women divesting themselves of jewels, to make the golden calf; and we are told in the temporary triumph of anti-christ in the latter days, they should be quite profuse in liberalities, sending gifts to one another. But, as we promised to notice, such evidences of the genuineness of revivals and conversions, would not answer in the apostolic age of the Baptist church, and this pledge we redeem by referring the reader to the treatment which Simon Magus received from one Simon, whose surname was Peter, who very impolitely bid his money perish with him.

We have said liberality properly directed is in itself good; but we do not mean what the worshipers of mammon call liberality, for the day draws near when the vile person shall no more be called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful. - Isa. xxxii. 5. Money lavished out of the bag, wholly consecrated to the Lord, to accomplish what he has forbidden, to make such molten or graven images as shall divert the heart and eye from a dependence on God for all that the New School contemplate doing with this money, viz: sustaining the Foreign and Domestic Mission Societies, to supercede the necessity of God's sending forth and sustaining a ministry of the gospel among the nations of the earth. The appropriation of five thousand dollars for the Hamilton abomination, &c., is all idolatry and utterly unworthy the appellation of liberality. That liberality which the spirit of the gospel approves, is to give bread to the hungry, and raiment to the naked, to visit and relieve the sick, distressed and wretched of our race, whether friends or foes. But, is this description of liberality popular with the New School? Let their own statements tell. It was announced by one of their agents in Philadelphia, a few years ago, that he had accepted from a poor man in the interior of Pennsylvania, who had a large family, his last cow, which was his chief dependence for the support of his helpless family, the avails of which he had thrown into the "Lord's Treasury," as they profanely call their mammon bank. Instances are by no means few where instead of relieving the wants of suffering humanity, they have, like their ancient brethren, robbed the widow and the fatherless, subverted whole houses, led captive silly women, (ah! and men too,) for filthy lucre's sake.

MORE ON ASSOCIATIONS

Remarks on Elder Blakeslee & Ausmus Letter

It is not our desire or intention, either by special or common pleadings, to encourage a controversy on the subject of Associations, as, to our mind, there are many other subjects at this peculiarly trying time of vastly greater importance to the peace, comfort and edification of the people of God, which claim our columns. Especially should we regret to enter the list with a veteran of the cross whom we so highly esteem as our brother Blakeslee. Indeed, had he confined his remarks to the issue, as stated and defined by himself in the closing portion of his article, there would probably have been no room for controversy, but the principal part of his letter is confined to the extravagant proceedings of two New School Baptist associations, which probably all but New School Baptists would blush to be concerned in. Now, in justice to the Old School Baptists, it should be known that no such high-handed proceedings have ever been tolerated among them.

In our reply to brother Ausmus we stated that an association of churches maybe anything the associated parties choose to make of them. We admit that brother Blakeslee has given two sad examples of the prostitution of the name, but we cannot perceive that he has even attempted to show that all associations of churches are unscriptural. He says the question at issue is not whether they have been productive of more good than evil, neither is it, we presume, whether there have been instances in which they have been perverted to be the most outrageous instruments of tyranny and oppression. We presume that the question of brother Ausmus related only to associations of churches as they are recognized by the Old School Baptists. Two questions seem to us to be involved: first, Do the Scriptures warrant any association of gospel churches for any purpose whatever? Second, If they do, are ours such as the Scriptures sanction? If, by a careful and prayerful searching of the Scriptures, we find that the primitive churches did associate together, then we have clearly authority for them by apostolic example, and however much wicked men may pervert them, the example of the primitive churches cannot be thereby invalidated. The pattern and example of primitive saints associating in churches is admitted by brother Blakeslee, although it is known to him that there are very many religious organizations called churches whose practice is as grossly antichristian as that of the two associations instanced by him.

The primitive Christians and churches either did or did not, under the direction of the apostles, associate together. We assume that they did, as individual Christians, associate in church relation, and, as churches, so far as to recognize, correspond, and, so far as practicable, unite together for social devotion and for mutual advice and edification, while none were allowed to lord it over God's heritage. Without any kind of association there could be no union, sympathy or identity; but we have palpable evidence that the apostolic churches did maintain a correspondence with each other, and their members met together in such harmony for the worship of God whenever they found opportunity, without regard to what particular branches of the church they belonged. This is evident from the fact that Timothy and Titus, though pastors (or bishops) of particular churches had a charge to ordain elders and attend to other services in sister churches. All the churches of Galatia were addressed as one community, or association of churches, in one epistle written to them by Paul. Messengers were sometimes sent from one church, or churches, to another church of the same faith and order. It would be difficult to find an instance where Christians or churches of the primitive faith and order ever refused to associate together when favored with opportunity because they were members of different branches of the church of Christ. It is not our impression that the churches of the apostles' day were as formal in their distinct organization as they are now, but where two or three were gathered together in Christ's name, there Christ himself was in their midst; and if, as at Pentecost, the number were increased to thousands, they were still of one heart and one mind. Hence we read of "the church in thy house," as well as the church in a city or nation.

None of the branches of the church of Christ can any more be independent of the other branches than any one member of a natural body can be independent of its fellow-members. The hand cannot say to the foot, I have no need of thee, nor the eye to the ear. Christ says, "I am the vine, ye are the branches." "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me." This figure seems to represent the perfect vine as embracing all the branches which have grown out of it, and all alike invigorated and made fruitful by their common relation to the whole vine. A still stronger figure is used by the apostle, I Cor. 12:12,13: "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit." The same apostle also in Ephesians 4 dwells largely on the vital and inseparable unity and fellowship of all the saints at Ephesus, and all the faithful in Christ Jesus, whether they may be: There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all;" and in the twenty-fifth verse he adds, "For we are members one of another." Now can such identity and vital union exist without association, without harmony of action? Can one member be independent, or have no need of all the other members? Can the foot travel on and leave all or any of its fellow-members behind? Can all these members, which make up the perfect and complete body of Christ, being many, keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and yet hold no correspondence or association together? We presume brother Blakeslee will not assume that they can. But still the inquiry returns, Do all these Scriptures justify the association of churches in the manner in which they are held by the Old School Baptists of our day? The affirmative or negative response must depend on how they are held or practiced by the Old School Baptists. It is more than possible that some of our Old School Baptist associations may practice some things which are not justified by the law of Christ. We would all do well to look to this. Brother Blakeslee found in the New School Baptist associations which he has referred to, legislative, judicial and executive" powers assumed, none of which have we ever found in any of our Old School Baptist associations. Neither the churches, nor even the apostles, were ever invested with legislative power. Christ has made all the laws his kingdom can ever require. The apostles are enthroned in the church to judge the twelve tribes, but not to make any new laws; nor has the church any judicial or executive power beyond that of strict obedience to the laws of Christ as adjudged and defined by the inspired apostles. In obedience to Christ's laws, as expounded by the apostles, the church, and every member thereof, whether individually or associated, are required to withhold that fellowship from the hidden works of darkness, and to withdraw from every brother that walks disorderly. But the rule of order by which the extension or suspension of fellowship is to be regulated is the law of Christ. Those unassociated churches in the north and northwestern part of this State are only unassociated in form; that is, they reject the name and formalities of associations, because, as we presume, they became so disgusted with the abominations which they have witnessed in the associations in their vicinity that they are jealous of all formal associations; but they are in reality associated in a form of their own, which they consider less objectionable. It is common with them to hold yearly meetings, at which brethren and sisters and Elders come together for social worship and mutual correspondence, and, for aught we could perceive, they really associate freely by meeting and greeting each other in the love and fellowship of the gospel, and they appear to be as fond of associating in their way as those who organize for conducting a more general correspondence with the churches and associations scattered abroad. Our ministering brethren from that vicinity also occasionally visit our associations and associate with us, and we hope enjoy the seasons with us. Now we do not wish to be understood as advocating any of the excesses or abominations which prevail among the New School order, which are complained of by brother Blakeslee, but we wish to discriminate between a Christian and an antichristian association. There is something social in the very spirit of Christianity which should be cherished by all who can appreciate it. "Let brotherly love continue." "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together." These injunctions are not restricted to organized branches of the church of God, but they are addressed to the whole brotherhood, and we believe if ever there was a time when they that fear the Lord should meet frequently and speak often one to another, that time is now. Some have objected to associations because they drop from their connection such churches and associations as they believe have departed from the faith. But do not the unassociated churches do the same? And are not the brethren individually required to do the same? "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth." When churches depart manifestly from the faith and order on which our fellowship is based, we are bound, individually and collectively, to withhold from them our fellowship, or recognition, until they return to the order of the house of God. Indeed, we are greatly mistaken if we have not witnessed great evils growing out of the oft reiterated cry of the independence of churches. How far is a church independent? It is simply this: A church of Christ in gospel order, governed only by the word and spirit of the gospel, has authority to discipline her own members without interference from any other organized body, court or council on earth, and her decisions are entitled to be respected by all other churches. But churches, as well as individuals and associations, are liable to err, both in the spirit and letter, and in such cases she has no right to drag other churches or individuals into any disorder or heresy whatever; and any church who feels a consciousness that she has acted in the fear of the Lord, been governed in her actions by the divine rule, will rather court than shun investigation. She will frankly say, Come and behold our order; for if she is governed by the spirit of the gospel she will desire to secure the confidence and fellowship of all her sister churches. We always regard it as a suspicious circumstance when churches, ministers or other individual members put themselves upon their dignity and bid defiance to their sister churches under the plea of independence. It is virtually saying, We regard not your approbation; we do not appreciate your fellowship or care for your correspondence. Certainly such is not the way pointed out in the divine rule for keeping "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." "For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God." (John 3:20,2 1) This rule bears the sacred seal of the eternal King, and may be relied on with implicit confidence.

Again, in conclusion, we wish to say that our object in this article is not to disagree with the views of brother Blakeslee, for we as decidedly disapprove of the ungodly course which he condemns as he does, but our design is, while we repudiate and condemn the wrong, to discriminate between the right and the wrong, and we trust that he will understand and appreciate our motive. We cannot resist the conviction, from an experience of fifty-two years, that a general meeting of the Elders, brethren and sisters of churches of the same faith and order once a year, or oftener, if convenient, is both lawful and expedient. The primitive churches and members did meet as frequently as possible for mutual edification, without any restriction on account of distinct organization into separate branches, and every expression of admonition recorded, to our understanding, tended to encourage, if not to absolutely enjoin such gatherings, as both duty and privilege. If churches are to isolate themselves from each other, pay no regard to the order nor seek the general welfare of the whole body, what is to become of that sympathy, concert and identity which is to distinguish all the members of Christ as one body, animated by one life, fed at one table, on the same food, having but one and the same interest, and all bound to the same destiny? Why should a single branch of the church wish to isolate herself from her fellow-branches and eat her morsel alone? The very spirit of vital Christianity calls for association. "Come and hear, all ye that fear God," whether belonging locally to this or that branch. All who fear the Lord and obey the voice of his servant, are members of one Christ, governed by one Head, constituting but one body, and members one of another in union so close, and sympathy so vital, that if one member suffers all the body feels the pain. We do not argue that for such association any distinct organization or written constitution is indispensable, only so far as may be useful to preserve harmony and good order. The yearly meetings in some sections, and conferences, or corresponding meetings, in other sections of the country, may secure all that is desirable, but those who are partial to the one form should be slow to censure their brethren who see cause to promote the same object substantially in another form, unless such form shall be manifestly subversive of the order of the gospel. Not only the organized associations, but all other forms of meetings are liable to abuses, and it becomes the saints to watch diligently, and see that all things be done decently and in order. Let us prove all things and hold fast that which is good.

MR. STEVENS - TOO FAST.

In his number of the Cross and Journal of the 5th inst., Mr Stevens has published and commented upon the Minutes of the Scioto Association of Old School Baptists; and among many things too wonderful for his comprehension, found in the said Minutes, he says:

”It is exceedingly singular that in their letter of correspondence, they speak of adhering to “old Baptist principles,” when nothing can be more incontestibly a plain matter of fact, than that they have trampled old Baptist principles in the dust. The missionary principle is among the old Baptist principles. The most conclusive proof of this has been given in our columns?”

Now is this true? Has Mr. S. given the most conclusive testimony through his paper, that the Scioto Association, or the Old School Baptists, have trampled old Baptist principles in the dust? Pray, what, does he understand by old Baptist principles? Or what has he proven? Why, he has brought forward some statements; but on what authority he has not informed us, that certain Baptists in Wales, in 1689, resolved to raise funds to assist the churches that were not able to maintain a minister, that their ministers might be encouraged to devote their time exclusively to the work of the ministry. But will Mr. S. dare to assert that the Old School Baptists have trampled such principles as these in the duet? This is a gross misrepresentation. We deny the implication. The Old School Baptists have never, to our knowledge, objected to assist the churches in sustaining those among them whom God has called to the gospel ministry. If this *conclusive proof*proves anything, it proves what Old School Baptists have never denied. Where then is the cause for puffing? But again. He tells us that in 1653, delegates of churches met in Wales, and collections were made and a fund raised, to send out missionaries! Should we admit this testimony, it would prove nothing in favor of Mission Societies. Those in Wales met and acted as delegates of the churches; not as members of Mission Societies where their memberships had been purchased with money.

If indeed the churches in Wales delegated away to certain men their power, should such a circumstance be quoted as a uniform practice of the primitive church of God? By no means. We challenge Mr. S., or any other champion of new measures, to show from the New Testament that Christ has ever indued his church with any power to delegate to others. Hence, if the statement be true, it only proves a blemish on the Welsh Baptists of 1653, and cannot be admitted to answer the purpose of Mr. S. As well might we attempt to prove that the primitive church enforced their sentiments on the world by the edge of the sword, from the circumstance of Peter's using a sword, when he emote off the ear of a servant of the high priest.

Once more. Mr. S. has not room in his Cross to quote the "well known testimonies in proof," &c., from the three oldest associations (we were not aware of the existence of so many oldest associations) in the United States. But suppose he had room according to his strength, what would he, what could he prove? Why, perhaps he might prove that, notwithstanding their general steadfastness in the faith and order of the gospel, they had occasionally stepped aside from the divinely authorized rule; but this would by no means establish his position. If he feels disposed to contest our claim to the distinction of Old School, or Primitive Baptists, he must go back so far as to show examples of Mission Societies in the apostolic age of the church; nothing short of this will answer. Almost any error in faith and practice may be proven to have existed at soms period of the church; but to establish their claim to antiquity, they must give us something from the scriptures of truth. What might have been done in Wales during the dark ages of Papal superstition, or even what might be extorted from the history of Mr. Stevens' three oldest associations in the United States, will only be sufficient to satisfy those who are predisposed to leave the New Testament as an all sufficient rule, and seek a precedent from the foibles of earlier transgressors.

“MY KINGDOM IS NOT OF THIS WORLD.”

THUS spake the Son of God when, mantled in the flesh, he stood arraigned at the bar of Pilate; and when, if there had been anything in the elements of this world which could contribute to the defence or benefit of his kingdom, they must have been called forth into action. All the interests of the kingdom which he claimed as his own, centered in him, and the destiny of that kingdom, for weal or woe, was at that important moment hinged upon the result of what was at that time progressing. None of the princes of this world knew him; he had not made a revelation of what he was, even to those who sat empowered to deliver him to death. He had not labored in his ministry to make himself familiar to the crowned heads of the nations of the earth; he had proposed no treaties or terms of alliance with them; nor had he called on them, or any of them, to propose terms for his acceptance; for the nature of his kingdom was so radically different from every kingdom under heaven, that it was not possible that an alliance could be entered into that could subserve the true interests of either party. his kingdom truly was destined to encounter the violence, enmity, wrath, strife, and persecution of kingdoms and men, both in her King, and in the subjects of her government. The powers which should oppose him in person and in his people, were not such as he was compelled to succumb to for want of power to resist, for he reminded Pilate that he would not have had any power if it had not been given him; and on another occasion he declared that he was able to call on his Father, who would instantly honor his requisition for more than twelve legions of angels – a force sufficient to overwhelm all earthly powers engaged against him; hut how in that case, could the scriptures be fulfilled? Not an intimation was made of raising up an earthly force to resist the assaults of the enemies of his kingdom, even if a force had been requisite, he would have called them from the heavenly world. We may well conclude, that if in that most trying hour, when his holy soul was pressed within him, he had nothing to ask of the rulers of this world, there never could a period arrive when the powers of earthly princes should be required to defend him or his cause. To those who tempted him with their questions concerning tribute money, he said, Render unto Cæsar the things which belong to Cæsar, and unto God the things which belong to God; thus clearly intimating that the governments were not only distinct from each other, but that the distinction should be perpetual; and that the requisitions of Cæsar, or of the governments of the nations, had to do with men, as citizens of the world, and that their obligation to earthly magistrates and rulers was not relaxed nor abolished by the administration of his laws. And again, that the things of God were not to be rendered to Cæsar, but unto God.

Things of a civil nature, relating to the natural rights of men, were to be settled by God's own providential appointment, by human legislation; but the things aside from a respect for and obedience to earthly potentates, in natural matters, belonging to God, such as matters of faith, of conscience, of religion, were not things over which the kings of the earth had any supervision or power, and things in which his subjects were not at liberty, under any circumstances, to submit to the dictation or legislation of any other than God himself.

The kingdom of Jesus is not of this world, in its origin, elements, provisions, policy, protection, government, or destiny. Its origin is heaven – it is a heavenly kingdom. The King is the Lord from heaven; he said, I proceeded forth and came out from the Father; and again, "What and if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before, &c. The subjects of his kingdom are of the same origin; for, “Both he that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified, are all of one, for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren;” and he said, “Thine they were, and thou gavest them me.” “According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world,” &c. The laws for the regulation of this heavenly kingdom are not of earthly enactment. Christ, the anointed of the Father, is the sole Legislator, and he, by his Spirit, writes his law upon, and sets it up in the hearts of his children. The elements, or component parts, viewed separately or collectively, are all of God, and every plant that the heavenly Father has not planted shall be rooted up. The provisions on which this kingdom is sustained, were given us in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world, and being prior to, could not be of the world. Grace, mercy, peace, righteousness, and truth, with all things else necessary for the consummation of the everlasting and unchanging decree of God, were treasured up in the Head of the church before the world began; and all the provisions of his spiritual house on which his poor are fed, were brought down from the abounding and overflowing fountain from which every good and perfect gift cometh. And he will abundantly bless her provisions and fill her poor with bread.

The policy of this kingdom is from above, “For our conversation is in heaven,” and it is therefore as becometh the children of God. All earthly religions have to depend on human policy, human wisdom, and humanely devised means: but not so with the kingdom which no man can see except he be born again.

The protection of that kingdom is of him who is a wall of fire round about it, and the glory in its midst. All anti-christian religious establishments desire the arm of human government – regal power, and human means, for their protection; but not so with tie kingdom of Jesus Christ, – the eternal God is the refuge of his people, and underneath them are the everlasting arms.

All provision on which the subjects of the kingdom of our Lord are fed, comforted, instructed, and secured, are spiritual, and therefore cannot emanate from any other than a spiritual fountain. Although the world, the flesh and Satan have volunteered, like the aliens about Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah, to furnish God's people with food, the order of the government forbids the traffic with them; and it is impossible that the children of the kingdom should be fed with any other food than that which God has graciously provided, and abundantly blessed.

Should the government of the kingdom of our Redeemer be to any extent divided with angels or men, whatsoever part or portion these should administer, must necessarily detract so much from the power and glory of Christ. "The government shall be upon his shoulder; and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." So stands the record of the Holy One. The subjects of his government are forbidden to call any man master, or father, as their Master and spiritual Progenitor is in heaven, and nothing can he born of the flesh but flesh; so that without being born again no man can see the kingdom of God. A legislature of unregenerate men who cannot see the kingdom, would be very poorly qualified to legislate for a kingdom which is to them absolutely invisible; and if there were none but regenerated men seated in legislation, they being by the new birth qualified to see the kingdom of God, would to a man, know by the same illuminating work of the Spirit, that they could do nothing to aid in the legislative or executive departments of the Messiah's kingdom.

The destiny of the kingdom of which we write, differs essentially from that of all other kingdoms. The best systems of human government are destined to crumble to the ground. In the providence of God, empires are founded, kingdoms and republics are raised up, they reach their climax, and then decline, and finally cease to be reckoned among the things that be; but the kingdom of Jesus is an everlasting kingdom, and a dominion that shall never end. It shall never be changed, superseded, or transferred to other hands. The mountains shall depart, the hills shall be removed, the earth and sea shall pass away, and all the elements of this world shall be dissolved; bat the kingdom of our God shall survive them all, and flourish in eternal bloom. How presumptuous, then, for monarchs of the earth, whose transient glory is as a withering flower, or human legislatures, which God shall obliterate, to prepare the way of the rising empire of his Son, to reach forth the guilt-polluted fingers of their power, to point out the course in which God requires his children to move.

Seeing, then, that we look for such things – seeing that we have received a kingdom which is not of this world, which cannot be moved – let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear; for our God is a consuming fire.

THE NATIONAL BAPTISTS, AND THEIR IDOLS.

"But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." II Tim.3:13.

A striking illustration and verification of the above declaration has been placed in our hands by a friend. A pamphlet of nearly one hundred pages, published by the American Baptist Publication Society, 530 Arch Street, Philadelphia. The title is, "The First National Baptist Sunday School Convention of the United States, under the auspices of the American Baptist Publication Society, St. Louis, Nov. 2-4, 1868." The persistent aspiration of the New School Baptists for a church and state connection is clearly visible in their efforts to become national.

Don't forget that they publish this as the first National Baptist S.S. Convention; for it is highly probable that before many who read this report shall finish their course on earth, the successors of this aspiring party will stoutly affirm that National Baptist Sunday School Conventions were common in the days when the apostles were here in the flesh. While with one breath they boast of progression and improvement, and bitterly denounce those who remain firmly on apostolic ground, with the next they claim that they are the simon-pure Old School or Primitive Baptists themselves, and consider it uncharitable and unkind for us to doubt their veritable antiquity. Well does the writer of this article remember when the first Sunday School Union was formed in the city of New York, and when the first schools were patronized by the Baptist churches of that city, the solemn protestations of their advocates that nothing of a religious, sectarian, or political tendency was ever to grow out of them. The only object, professedly, was to collect from the streets poor neglected children, and teach them to read. This and nothing more, they declared, was intended. The little bantling was however regarded by a few with considerable suspicion, but they were denounced as a crabbed set who were opposed to everything that was good and benevolent. The foster parents and nurses of the pet protected that it was perfectly innocent and harmless, that it had neither horns, teeth, nor claws, and only heartless cowards were afraid of it. But the bantling grew very rapidly, and in a very few years it was with great pomp and ceremony received into the "pales of the Baptist church," and christened, and dignified by the imposing cognomen, "The Nursery of the Church," from which the church was to supply herself with members in after ages. The Sunday School Union was a mongrel affair, and wore a coat of many colors, and soon assumed a national character. "The American Sunday School Union" was so ingeniously constructed, that with very little shifting of its gearing it could manufacture from the raw material any sort of converts, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, or New School Baptists, in almost any quantity. As this creature of means; this child of many fathers, has now in process of time developed some of its huge proportions, the harmony of the Union of its paternity has been interrupted by sectarian jealousy, and each religious sect who owned stock in the great speculation have become ambitious to run a machine of their own.

This National Baptist Sunday School Convention was composed of delegates from twenty-eight states, and as they put on their National sectarian habiliments, looked imposingly magnificent and grand, but little inferior to the Ecumenical Council, now in session with the Roman Pontiff, for nearly the same purpose.

No longer hampered with the antiquated doctrine of salvation by grace alone, which has subjected the people of God to cruel persecutions, prisons, tortures, and death, they arise like a rocket from the earth to blaze in the air. They were greeted at their Convention by the "reverend" Doctors of other denominations, and by magistrates and rulers of the earth.

For specimens of the doctrines, purposes, and expectations now held and promulgated by this new fledged National establishment, we will copy a few of their own declarations, as published in their pamphlet by the American Baptist Publication Society.

On page 13, it is stated that "the objective point for the Sunday School work is that children need a Savior. To bring them to Christ is the primary aim of the Sunday School worker."

This declaration supposes that Christ is stationed in some locality, ready and willing to do any work we may employ him to do. He cannot get to the children, nor can the children get to him; but we can supply what is deficient. The children need a Savior, and here we are, and we have the ability to bring them to him, or place them within the limits of salvation, and this is the first, the primary work of the Sunday School worker, who work this Sunday School machine for the transportation of children to Christ, and so prevent their damnation. On page 14. "No other aim can so infuse the souls of Sunday School workers with the spirit of earnestness and consecration to Christ as this. This work of saving souls is more than enthusiasm of humanity." &c.

The eternal God declares that he is the Savior, and there is none else. And as inspired apostle testifies that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. Yet these presumptuous pretenders have their souls infused with the notion that the work of saving souls is committed to Sunday School workers. Now suppose for a moment that this were so, and that these workers, as they call themselves, could and should save any on whom they work, would such be saved by grace, or by works? Paul declares that if it be by works, then it is no more by grace. It cannot possibly be of both. How then? "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast." On page 15, they again say, "As Sunday School workers, our primary aim therefore should be the salvation of the souls of all we teach. But as Baptist Sunday School workers, we have another aim. I have said the first aim was to bring the children to Christ. But, brethren, when this is done, our aim should be to make these converted children Baptists." The convention seems to think it would be labor lost for National Baptist Sunday School workers to convert the children, and save their souls, and bring them to Christ, that it will not do to entrust them to his care, for the other denominations might catch them; they say, We must make them Baptists; and we infer that they must still go a step or two farther, and make them National Baptists, and Sunday School workers. What would be gained to convert them, and save their souls, and bring them to Christ, if they are to be left to his care? They are already in his care.

On page 22, they say, "Give us but this plighting of hands and hearts in view of the cross, and we have the earnest of the day when the children, early trained, and early saved, shall flock as doves to their windows. When the great spiritual temple raised upon the ruins of Anti-christ shall stand forth in all its beautiful proportions, ready for the Headstone, which shall be brought forth with 'shoutings of Grace, Grace unto it.' The consummation of these high aims depends upon individual consecration to the work." How magnanimously generous, on the part of this National institution, when they by working have converted the children, and saved their souls, and brought them to Christ, and these workers with plighted hands and hearts, in view of the cross, have early trained, and early saved the children, and when they shall have got the spiritual temple builded, not on Christ the true foundation, but upon the ruins, or rubbish of anti-christ, and ready for the Headstone, to allow that stone to crown the building with shoutings of Grace, when the apostle declares, as we have shown, that "if it be of works, it is no more of grace." Why not shout the praise to the workers who have converted the children, saved their souls, and brought them to Christ? Surely the laborer is worthy of his pay.

On page 25, this passage occurs: "Let us remember that our work as Sunday School teachers is a failure, if our scholars are not saved." This strips the object of Sunday Schools of all the false pretences which were urged fifty years ago, of teaching to read, and to become more intelligent and useful citizens. Unless we can convert and save them, and bring them to Jesus, and make them Baptists, and National Baptists, all our work is a failure.

In the address of Rev. E.A. Dickinson, page 25, he says, "Brethren, let me urge you, as I would seek to urge myself, to greater earnestness in the work of saving little children. I would urge it by all the joys that come to us in this world from saving little children." And this same speaker in his concluding remarks, on page 26, says, "I heard of a Sunday School Superintendent that had been out looking up little ones and bringing them into the Sunday School, when one after another was converted. One day he was sent for to see a little child. The little boy said to him, 'I want to thank you, the last thing before I leave this world. When I go to heaven, I am going to tell Jesus it was you that put me in the way to heaven – it was you who saved me, and I am going to look out for you when you get up there. I will meet you, and take you by the hand, and carry you to Jesus, and say, Lord Jesus, here is the man that put me in the way to heaven.' Oh, I tell you, that Superintendent went away with his heart almost bursting with joy at the thought of meeting that dear little fellow up at the pearly gate! If we are faithful – if christian workers, from the North and South, and East and West, are faithful in this work – laboring to save little children, when you get up yonder at the shining gate you will be surprised; for they will come from every direction. Every one will want to take you by the hand – and they will say, 'Come, I want to carry you to Jesus.' They will say, 'Lord Jesus, here is the man, and here is the woman, that put me in the way to heaven.'"

Not a word of objection was made to this abominable blasphemy, but the full approval of the whole was expressed thus: "The Convention joined Mr. Doane in singing the work song."

These extravagant expressions are not to be regarded as the ravings only of the mad fanatic who uttered them, but as the delusion and heresy of the whole National Baptist Sunday School Convention of the United States, fully endorsed and published to the world by the American Baptist Publication Society. Let us examine this expose of New Schoolism. Our Lord Jesus has warned his disciples, saying, "Take heed that no man deceive you. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many." Matt. 25:4,5. Is the Jesus whom the Convention has described the same which is described in the scriptures as "The Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace," whose name sent down from heaven was to signify that he shall save his people from their sins? Is it that Jesus who as the Foundation of God hath this seal, "The Lord knoweth them that are his?" That Shepherd who says he knows his sheep, and calleth his own sheep by name? &c. If Jesus has saved his people from their sins, whose people are they who are saved by "Sunday School workers?" If it be true that Jesus is the Lord, and knows all his, what Jesus is this described by the Convention, who has to be informed of and introduced to them after they have been raised to heaven by the Sunday School machine? We hesitate not to declare that the Jesus whom they have portrayed on their walls has no more resemblance to Jesus Christ our Savior, than had the golden calf which Aaron made, to the God which brought the children of Israel up out of Egypt. Nor is the heaven which they have painted any more like the paradise of God, than is the paradise of Mahomet like the throne of God and the Lamb. Nor does their cherished views of salvation bear the slightest resemblance to God's method of salvation as set forth in the inspired scriptures and revealed by the Holy Spirit to the faith of God's elect. Yet man will drink in such delusion with greediness, because they love darkness more than light. But the apostle John explains the mystery: "They are of the world; therefore speak they of the world, and the world heareth them. We are of God; he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error." I John 4:5,6.

But we will copy a few more passages from this pamphlet, in which our readers shall learn from their own statements what is designed and anticipated to be effected both religiously and politically. On page 36 they assert:

"1. The Sunday School is the moulder of public opinion. 2. It is the conservator of public morals.

The Sunday School may be made the moulder of public opinion, a tremendous and powerful influence in controlling all right motives and securing all good results. You can reach, by striking early, the minds of those who are to grow up and control the next community, morally, politically and financially."

Ah! Yes, that lets out the secret. This august Convention is thirsting for moral, political, and financial dominion over the next community, and the Sunday Schools, by actual experiment has demonstrated that by striking early, while the children are young, while their immature judgment and plastic minds are like the young nestlings, ready with open beak to receive whatever the mother bird may choose to drop into their mouths. Such was the theory and philosophy of their old mother Rome, to catechize and drill the young, and by infant sprinkling and other traps and fetters, bring them into their ecclesiastic pales, and subjugate them morally, politically, and, above all things, financially to their priestly dominion. Here they have the lever, but they must strike early, and spring the trap before the game is conscious of the snare; for, "Just as the twig is bent, the tree inclines." Morally they aim to bend the pupils to their standard of morality; politically, to unite the church and state, and legislate for the chartering such religious institutions as the "National Baptist Sunday School Convention," and finally inspire the image of the model beast with political power to proscribe, persecute, and put to death all who may refuse to receive their mark, or image, or the number of their name. And financially they must be drilled to supply these daughters of the horse-leach with all the funds they want.

Page 37. The "Rev. J.F. Elder" says, "The Sunday School becomes the conservator of public morals … I believe that the world is growing better. At all events, we are so far controlling public opinion and public morals, that vice is slinking back into the dark corners, and putting itself under the cover of night." Is this so? What man or child of ordinary intelligence does not know better? What an insult to common sense. In what respect is the world being improved, except that the people of the world are more easily deceived and hood-winked by modern priestcraft than at any previous time for many ages past? Does his reverence ever read the records of current events in our daily newspapers, or does he mean to lie outright? Are murders, suicides, thefts, incendiaries, rapes, adulteries, wars and tumults, less frequent than they were fifty years ago? Are there any sufficiently verdent to believe that the world is, morally, politically, or in any other particular really growing better? Quite the reverse is unquestionably the truth. In all classes of community, from the halls of legislation, and the rulers of the people, down to the humblest positions, all kinds of the most degrading iniquities alarmingly prevail. And in no class of the whole community is this degeneracy more apparent than with those who are encircled in the folds of this religious viper, called the "National Baptist Sunday School Institution." Subsequent to its inauguration, the Baptist church, which previously was harmonious, and in fellowship from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the far west, have not only been rent asunder, but those who went out from our fellowship have from the advent of their modern idols waxed worse and worse, until their members, and communicants of the same table, have been found on bloody fields of carnage, dealing death to each other, with National Baptist Chaplains on either side the lines hounding on their brethren to deeds of cruelty and violence that might make demons blush, and invoking God to speed their several parties. Is it in this the Convention counts on improvement? Do you say the Sunday Schools and kindred institutions patronized by "National Baptists" are not responsible for the late war that has called for the sacrifice of a million of the lives of our youth, and indescribable distress to our country? We are confident it has been the principal cause of the late devastating war, and so deeply involved, that without their influence, of which they boast, the war would not have been. We boldly assert, and challenge successful contradiction, that since the inauguration of Sunday Schools, Mission Societies, and other unscriptural institutions, for the professed object of evangelizing the world, and saving men, all the astounding crimes to which we have alluded have multiplied and kept even pace with the increasing advancement of these institutions. Basil Manly, D.D., on page 46, says, “A Sunday School in every church will promote the early conversion of children.” Just as human reason said more than three thousand years ago, the substitution of Hagar for Sarah, would promote the early advent of Abraham’s promised seed. As the Sunday Schools will convert children into nominal church members – into hypocrites, on the same principle as did the bond woman in the place of Sarah, promote the early production of mocking Ishmaelites.

On the same page he says, “Now the experience of half a century testifies conclusively that Sunday Schools do promote early conversions.” If this be so, that is, if Sunday Schools really promote, and accomplish genuine conversions, may not such converts be told that these Sunday Schools be their gods which brought them out of Egypt? We admit that they do convert them early from bad to worse.

On page 48 it is asserted that, “The extension of Sunday Schools will, moreover, improve the character as well as tend to increase the number of our ministry.” That the National Baptist ministry are sadly in need of improvement, we will not deny; but we would entreat, Spare us from an increase of their number, for they are already about as numerous and annoying as were the frogs in the days of Moses. But how Sunday School extension will improve their character, we cannot see, unless increasing the cause of their degeneracy will diminish the effect.

On page 50, “Rev. S.B. Page” said, “Here are twenty-eight states represented. I have thought of the words of our great”

– apostle Paul? O, no! – "I have thought of the words of our great Wayland, which he introduced into a discourse he delivered before the American Sunday School Union, thirty years ago. As he stood up before the vast assembly, he said, Here is a great moral lever in the hands of the church that is to revolutionize the world." The great Redeemer and Head over all things to his church, said his kingdom was not of this world, and commanded his disciples to come out and be separate from the world. If he had intended that they should use the American Sunday School Union as a lever to pry up and revolutionize the world, why should that lever be now abandoned, and a "National Baptist" lever substituted? Did Wayland prophesy falsely, or has the Lord changed his mind – laid aside his first plan and adopted the improved lever? But would it not be strange, if he had intended to put such a powerful instrument into the hands of the church, for the purpose of revolutionizing the world, that nothing was said by him, nor by his apostles, about a Sabbath School? That his church should have been left for eighteen hundred years to suppose that besides God there was no Savior, and that all the revolutions that should ever convulse the world were to be directed by his providence and accomplished by his power? Surely the Jesus of whom they speak is one of those false Christs whom our Lord said should come, and the gospel of which they speak is that other gospel which Paul says is not another, but there are some who would pervert the gospel of Christ; and the church which they describe is the same predicted in the word that should sit upon a scarlet colored beast, and have written upon her the names of blasphemy.

Perhaps we have already wearied the readers of the SIGNS with quotations from the pamphlet, in which these "raging waves of the sea" are suffered to foam out their own shame; but before we close these animadversions, we wish to say, this National Baptist Sunday School Lever, which has for its primary aim the salvation of souls, and to bring them to Christ, and to make National Baptists of them, and to improve the ministry of the Nationals, and to increase their number, and then to revolutionize this little mundane ball, and then, incidentally, to provide a multitude of little boys in heaven, to tell Jesus what wonderful exploits they were performing here on earth, and watch for the arrival of their saviors, who have put them in the way to heaven, and be ready to take them by the hand and introduce them to Jesus, and tell Jesus all about them; this is the party who through John M. Peck, and J.R. Graves, claim that they are the genuine Old School Baptists, and that we who continue on the old apostolic platform are the new lights, who have departed from the original faith and order of the primitive church. But the same confusion is in their language that is recorded of their prototype, the builders of Babel in the land of Shinar. Gen. 11:1-9. While they denounce us as a new sect who have no claim to antiquity, who have not existed more than about forty years, in almost the same breath they charge us with being centuries behind the times, and of the progressive spirit of the age. While J.R. Graves, and his party, in the Memphis "Baptist," say that we have stolen the names of Old School, or Primitive, the National Baptist Sunday School Convention have published to the world, in their pamphlet, page 31, "The Sunday School People denominate the opposition, antediluvians, fossils, old fogies, whose motto is, The thing that hath been – when we were young – is the thing that shall be, world without end."

We are content to bear the derision of all who have it in their hearts to deride us, while we solemnly avow our firm and unwavering belief that the faith, order, laws and institutions established in the church of Christ at her organization on the day of Pentecost, are still, without the least addition or diminution, amendment or alteration, and throughout all time, shall be the faith and order of the church of Christ, and that no religious organization, sect or denomination, have any right to claim that they are the church of God, only so far as they continue in that same faith and order, steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers. All who have ever professed that faith and have departed from it, are apostates, to whom the disciples of the Lord Jesus are forbidden to give countenance or fellowship. Let them deride us as antediluvians, fossils, or old fogies; for we choose rather to suffer afflictions with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; and we esteem the reproaches of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.

Should any who read this article have any doubts as to the accuracy of our quotations, they can, we presume, satisfy themselves by sending for a copy of the pamphlet; let them apply for it to the "American Baptist Publication Society, 530 Arch Street, Philadelphia."

THE NATURE OF ALL THE SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST?

Monroe Co., Miss.
May 20, 1870.

DEAR BROTHER BEEBE: - Your paper is a source of comfort and instruction to me, and I cannot see how I am to do without it. If you will send me authority to receive subscriptions, I will do what I have time and ability to do to secure patronage.

You will much oblige me too, by instructing me upon the following subjects, either through the "Signs of the Times," or privately.

Is corporeal death any part of the penalty of the violated law? If not, was Christ's physical death any part of the atonement? The reason I ask your views upon the questions is, they are questions of controversy here, and I desire to know the truth.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, yours in hope of life,

W.C. Smith.

REPLY. We should cautiously avoid vain speculations in all our researches after a knowledge of spiritual and divine things. No rules of human reason, science or philosophy, however luminous and useful when applied to the things of nature, can afford a single ray of light upon the things of the Spirit of God, and it is therefore that the natural man, however brilliant in intellect or erudition, cannot know the things of the Spirit; because they are spiritually discerned. It certainly is not given to us to sit in judgment over the sufferings which Christ endured when bearing our sins in his own body on the cross, and to decide which of all his sufferings were the most essential or efficacious. Nor does it well become us to say that any of them might have been omitted. God has spoken in vision to his Holy One, and said, "The enemy shall not exact upon him; nor the son of wickedness afflict him." Psa. 89:22. Beyond that measure of suffering which eternal truth and justice required, neither the malice of men, nor rage of devils could exact. In weight and measure, time and place, his enemies with wicked hands could do no more than God's hand and counsel had before determined should be done. They would have done more if they could; they would have broken his bones, and they would have prevented his resurrection, but they could not exact upon him; for the remainder of their wrath God restrained.

Corporeal death was and is unquestionably a part of the penalty of the divine law. Sin is the transgression of the law, and by the transgression of one man sin entered, any death by sin, or; in the words of the apostle, "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. 5:21. That this death penalty includes the death of the body, or corporeal death, is settled by the sentence from the mouth of God. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. 3:19. Whatever else was included in the penalty, as consigning man, as a convicted sinner, to death, without the hope of resurrection or deliverance from death, short of the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, certainly involved corporeal death, or the mortality of the body. We do not say, nor believe that corporeal sufferings abstractly considered could satisfy the demands of the law of God, or atone for the transgressions of any who have sinned. If every member of the human family should endure all the corporeal agony which our Redeemer suffered physically when on the cross, it could not abate their guilt nor lessen their condemnation. No human sacrifice or sufferings, nor even the torments of damnation, if forevermore endured, could purge us from guilt, or in the least degree atone for our transgressions. Bat with all this premised, it still is true that "Without the shedding of blood there could be no remission of sins." All the sufferings of the dear Redeemer were indispensable to the accomplishment of the salvation of his people. This truth is established by his own words. "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken. Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" "Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures. And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day." Luke 24:25, 26, 45, 46. "These things," must include all things which he suffered in mind or body, in soul or in spirit, in the garden or on the cross, in the world or in the grave, physically or mentally, in living any in dying; all, all were required for our salvation. Nor could the powers of hell extend his sufferings beyond the exact requirements of eternal justice. That our blessed Savior, while in the flesh, did suffer corporeally, cannot be doubted, in taking on him our infirmities, he could suffer hunger, thirst, and physical pain. The piercing thorns which tore his temples, the cruel scourging in the hall of Pilate, the ponderous weight of the cross that crushed him down, and the writhing agony of his crucifixion – can it be possible that there was no corporeal or bodily sufferings in all these? Who then shall dare to say that this suffering was uncalled for by the inexorable demands of that holy law which his people had transgressed, and which he came to fulfill? "Surely," may his redeemed say, "Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." Isa. 53:4,5.

Let us plunge still deeper into the consideration of this subject. We do not contend that human sufferings, whether in body or in spirit, if they were only human, however intense, could have any redeeming power or efficacy, merely as such; but what was the nature of all the sufferings of Christ? To answer this enquiry correctly we must show that he, "who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." Phil. 2:6-8. Could our Lord have endured the death of the cross without corporeal sufferings, or could he have suffered that corporeal death in obedience to the law, if the law had not demanded it? "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death." Heb.2:9. Could angels, without corporeal bodies, have suffered death? Or could Christ, without a corporeal body, have been put to death in the flesh? Or could he have become obedient unto death, without dying? The scriptures not only testify of Jesus that he suffered in the flesh, and bore our sins in his own body on the tree, and that he was put to death in the flesh, and that the divine law required all this, but we are also informed of his sufferings in his soul and in his spirit. It was written in the law and in the prophets, which he came into the world to fulfill, that he should pour out his soul "unto death." And when the appointed time was fulfilled, he came as it was written of him in the volume of the book, and was heard to say, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." "Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour; but for this cause came I unto this hour." John 12:27.

“He groaned in spirit.” John 11:33. “He was troubled in spirit.” John 13:21. And finally at his death he cried, “Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and having said thus, he gave up the ghost,” or spirit. Luke 23:46. All his sufferings of soul, body and spirit, are grouped together by our Lord himself, in the expressive interrogative, “Ought not Christ to have suffered these things,” &c. Which, if any of them all, might have been omitted, and yet the great purpose of all have been secured?

But the question may arise, How could the sufferings of the spotless Lamb of God, who knew no sin, who was holy, harmless, and separate from sinners, meet the demands which law and justice held against guilty sinners? The heavens and earth may be astonished in the contemplation of this enquiry. The mystery is wrapped in the great mystery of godliness, wherein, “God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.” The All Creating Word which was with God, was made flesh, and dwelt among us. And to be made flesh he must needs be made under the law, which all flesh had transgressed. And to be made of a woman under the law he must be made sin, for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. “For verily he took not on him the nature of angels,” for angels were pure celestial beings, without corporeal substance. “But he took on him the seed of Abraham.” These were in the flesh, under the law, in guilt and condemnation. And in taking on him the seed of Abraham, “The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of them all.” “For this cause shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall be joined to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh.” Perfectly identified with the seed of Abraham, in the flesh, the law recognizes him as a subject, and he acknowledges the law’s dominion over him, and as he is one flesh with the seed of Abraham, he is legally held responsible for all the sins of that seed. The spirit that confesses that Christ is come in the flesh, not only admits that he was born of the virgin, and sojourned in the flesh, but it confesseth that he has come in the flesh of Abraham, legally identified with the legitimate seed of Abraham. “For if ye be Christ’s, then are ye Abraham’s seed, and heirs according to promise.” In the flesh of Abraham their father, Christ sojourned under the law with his members, and in that identity with them fulfilled every jot and tittle of the law, and finally met all the penal demand of that law, bearing all the sins of his people in his own body on the cross. In, and as the seed of Abraham, he finished transgression, made an end of sin, slumbered in the tomb, and in due time arose from the dead. When he died for that seed, then were they all dead, legally, effectually, and to all intents and purposes. And when he arose from the dead, all that seed was quickened together with him, and they were raised up together, and made to sit together in heavenly places in him. The old relationship in which they stood to the law and to its curse, expired when Jesus cried with a loud voice, “It is finished,” and gave up the ghost. Raised up together with him, the church is delivered from guilt and wrath, and purged from all uncleanness, and thoroughly cleansed by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost which he has shed on his members abundantly. We do not mean that all the seed whom Christ redeemed were at that time born again, experimentally; for millions of them had not, at that time, been either born of the flesh, or of the Spirit. But we do say, as our firm conviction on the subject, that in the death of Christ upon the cross, the relationship of that people to the law, and to the curse of the law, was so completely and effectually dissolved, that there remained no more condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus. That when Jesus died, the wrath and condemning power of that law under which he suffered was completely exhausted on him, and when Jesus arose from the dead for their justification, all that seed for whom he died and arose, were as fully justified in him as they will be when they ascend to their final glory. And when in the fullness of time each member of the body of Christ shall be personally called, the same blood which freely flowed from Jesus' bleeding veins, when he was crucified, will be experimentally applied to them for the remission of sins; and that the same life and immortality that quickened and raised up the crucified body or Christ, will experimentally quicken every one of them. Suppose I have executed a bond and mortgage on my house and lot, and my friend without my knowledge has canceled and destroyed that bond, though I may not be apprised of it until I am expecting to be turned out of house and home, still that bond is dead, and just as void of force as though I were fully aware of it. How was it in our experience? Jesus, as our Resurrection and our Life, had his eye on us, but we were strangers to him, and enemies by wicked works. We saw and felt our wretchedness, and felt our helpless poverty. But how little did we think that that very Jesus whom we had persecuted had hushed for us the thunders of the divine law, almost two thousand years before we were born. But the joyful assurance was no less welcome because that our redemption was sealed so long ago.

In conclusion: The atonement on which we rely for salvation, is based upon the one sacrifice which Christ through the eternal Spirit has made unto God, when he as a Lamb without spot or blemish gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. And in him we therefore have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, and are freely justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.

We thank brother Smith for his kind proposition to extend our circulation, and not only authorize, but earnestly request

NEHEMIAH 4:2.

Dear Brother Beebe: - Please give your views, through the "Signs", on Nehemiah 4:2, and especially this clause: "What do these feeble Jews?" The reason of my asking your views on that passage is the way in which it was brought to my mind. I awoke from my sleep one morning, and the first thought that came to my mind was, What do these feeble Jews? I knew it was Scripture, but where it was I did not know, neither what it was speaking of; neither did I remember of ever noticing it more than any other passage. I soon sought it out. It is a dark passage to my mind, and I shall be much obliged if you will give your views on it.

P. Barnes.

Reply: - We have neither the time, space, nor ability to enter fully into the subject presented for our consideration. The city of Jerusalem was typical of the church and kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. The desolation of that city by the Babylonish army, when her inhabitants were carried away into captivity, their temple demolished, and their walls and gates thrown down, and the few who remained within her precincts intermingled unlawfully with Ashdod, Moab, and Ammon, and in league with Sanballat, Tobiah, and with the armies of Samaria, the book of the law of their God lost among the rubbish, and the chambers of the temple desecrated with the household stuff of Tobiah, shows what desolation and confusion should come upon any portion of the church of Christ when the law of the Lord is disregarded, and unlawful alliances are formed with the aliens.

Nehemiah was doubtless in many respects a type of our Lord Jesus Christ, and may also represent those whom God has from time to time raised up to labor in building up the waste places of Zion. While Sanballat and all his associates represent the advocates of error against whom the faithful servants of the Lord have to contend.

The words of Sanballat, on which brother Barnes desires us to comment were evidently uttered in derision, maliciously, and with a design to discourage the workmen, and hinder the progress of the work; as were also the words of Tobiah, the Ammorite, who said, “Even that which they builded, if a fox go up he shall even break down their wall.”

The very spirit of their taunting falls thickly on those of the present day who labor faithfully in building up the walls of Zion, who urge a faithful and undeviating adherence to the laws and institutions of our Lord Jesus Christ, and protest against any affinity with other religious bodies.

How often have our adversaries, during the last forty years, spoken in the same taunting manner, of the comparatively few Old School Baptists who refuse to devote to their use the chambers of the consecrated house of our God for storing their household stuff. How frequently has the spirit of their language concerning us been, “What do these feeble Jews?” Feeble in numbers when compared with the multitude of their adversaries; and still more feeble in their confidence in the flesh. Having none of the elements of what their enemies regard as strength. The principal wealth, literature, State patronage, worldly honors, popular doctrines and carnal attractions on which all the numerous branches of anti-christ rely for support. As Jews, who are not so outwardly, and whose circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, whose praise is not of men, but of God; they claim to be “the circumcision which worship God in the spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh.” In the eyes of their enemies they are feeble indeed; and it is astonishing to their enemies how it is that without Mission Societies, or Sabbath Schools, or protracted meetings, or modern revivalists to supply them with converts, Theological Schools to supply them with preachers, they are not utterly consumed. Trusting only in the Lord, our opponents cannot see how our existence has been thus far continued; and still their cry is that “If a fox go up on our walls, it will throw them down.” It is true we have a dread of foxes, not however from fear of their throwing down our wall, but because of their depredations on our vines; for our vines have tender grapes. Feeble as Nehemiah and his band of faithful companions were in the estimation of their adversaries, the Lord was their strength; in him they trusted, and his arm was stretched out for their protection; and in the church of God they that trust in the Lord shall be like Mount Zion that cannot be moved. “God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved; God shall help her, and that right early.”

THE NEW BIRTH.

"Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." - John iii. 3.
"It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing." - John vi. 63.

HAVING in our preceding numbers briefly touched upon those subjects which are calculated to show the necessity of a radical change being wrought in those totally depraved beings who are, and were, "ordained to eternal life," in order to prepare them for the knowledge, love and enjoyment of spiritual things, we have now to treat upon the sovereign, irresistible, and, in all cases, effectual work of the Holy Ghost in quickening the elect of God.

The absolute necessity of the new-birth is established by the declaration of our Lord Jesus Christ which we have placed at the head of this article. "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." "Marvel not (said the Master,) that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." The very laws of our existence, as well as the analogy of the figure of a birth, employed to shew the nature of this radical change, forbids the idea of its being wrought by the subject on whom it is wrought. There is nothing in nature that possesses power of itself to produce any radical change in itself; hence, although man is a changable being in many respects, yet he remains man still. The thoughts of his heart are evil, and that continually; therefore he is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be; but even if this were not the case universally in nature, yet it must be admitted that if the elect were their own agents in this spiritual birth, then this work could not possibly bear the least analogy to the natural birth, from which the figure is taken, and in which the child which is born has not the least agency, but is altogether passive. But could the analogy of our Lord's figure (birth,) be preserved, and yet the sinner be an active agent in his own regeneration and quickening, this would be no radical change, nor would it give to him a place among the sons of God; it would constitute him his own son, and of course an heir to the inheritance of his own corrupt, degenerate nature, and to all his estate of sin and misery. It would constitute him his own father, and give him a place in the generation next succeeding; but being begotten by himself he must of necessity be begotten in his own image and likeness, &c. But we find all these arminians absurdities concerning the agency of the creature in regeneration put to silence by the word and testimony of God. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing." On this divine authority we ground our evidence that the regeneration and quickening of the elect of God is the work of the Holy Ghost. We will now consider that in the work of quickening the elect of God,

The Holy Ghost is Sovereign.

The sovereignty of the Holy Ghost in the regeneration and spiritual birth of the elect is abundantly shown by our Lord in these words: "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." By the figure here employed, the subject is reduced to the capacity of the weakest child of God. Where does the wind blow? where it listeth; and it is even so with the Spirit. If the Holy Ghost has (as many pretend to believe and say.) listed or engaged in the quickening conversion, or regeneration of all mankind, it follows by the immutable truth of God that there it will blow; i. e., be effectual; then it follows that all mankind will assuredly be saved; the atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ would then be nullified, inasmuch as sinners uninterested in that atonement can and will be quickened by the Holy Ghost, and the word falsified, which declares that the wicked shall be cast into hell with all the nations that forget God. How shocking would be the consequence; yea, what a terrible tornado would be the result, should the mighty rushing wind list anti blow at the same time from every point of the compass; yet not so shocking as the chaotic situation into which the scriptures of truth would be thrown, if it could be proved that the Holy Ghost was otherwise than sovereign in its operation on the heart, in the new birth, or by proving that he had undertaken the regeneration of all mankind. When the fierce north wind, blowing all before it, bends its course onward to the south, what human means can be employed to change the direction of its course, and cause it to blow from south to north? Surely no rational intelligence can be so stupid as to undertake the task. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," in spite of all the exertions of a means-using generation; it is sovereign in its course; none can change it, nor effectually resist it. Who will dare to say that the natural wind is more powerful or more sovereign than the Holy Ghost? The Holy Ghost has listed in the work of quickening all the elect of God. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth," &c. Not all the powers that can be, can alter the course of the divine Spirit from the elect of God to the reprobate part of mankind. As it has listed, so it does, and so it will continue to quicken every one that is born of the Spirit, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.

Again, the Spirit in this work is sovereign, as it relates to the individual on whom it operates. He speaks the word, and it stands fast; he commands, and it is done. Not as some would blasphemously represent the Spirit, in the attitude of a beggar, or a supplicant before the sinner's heart, wooing, beseeching, and striving to get the sinner's consent, and in many, or any cases, getting discouraged and abandoning the undertaking. Would this be blowing where it listed? Surely not. They can possess no adequate idea of the Spirit, or of its work, who suppose that the number of the quickened shall be in proportion to the amount of means employed by mankind, or that protracted meetings, anxious benches, submission chairs, benevolent religious societies, (so called,) or any other human inventions, can change the sovereign course of the Eternal Spirit from any of those on whom it has listed, or engaged to apply the atoning blood of Jesus experimentally, or add one to the number of those originally "ordained to eternal life." "Predestinated to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will." If, then, we admit the sovereignty of the work of the Holy Ghost in the new birth, why talk about the use of means to produce it? If it depends on the performance of conditions, or the use of means on our part, then the Holy Ghost ceases to be a sovereign in the work, and all must turn at last upon the pivot of works, and our bible must be forced to read, It is of him that willeth, and of him that runneth, and not of God that sheweth mercy. Could any thing be more absurd? Away with these yea and nay systems of the present day, which, like the Baptist Repository, will on one page tell us that regeneration is the sovereign work of the Omnipotent God, and anon, insert upon the other that souls may be rescued from a burning hell by the efforts of men and the use of money, but –

The Holy Ghost is Irresistible.

Can any thing be more preposterous than to say that the Holy Ghost is God, Omnipotent, &c., and yet that he may be so resisted or opposed in his work, as to fail in the accomplishment of his designs? If so, the term omnipotent has lost its meaning.

By the Spirit's irresistible work, we would not be understood to mean that it works in unison with the feelings and disposition of the human heart; no, "the natural mind is enmity against God," says the apostle; hence all the powers of human nature are arrayed in opposition to the Spirit's work, in vain attempts to resist the Holy Ghost. The strong man armed, keeps the palace until a stronger comes; he then becomes subdued, and his goods are spoiled. Saul's last breath was slaughter against the saints, and persecution against Christ. Paul's first breath was prayer, and submission to the irresistible power by which at mid-day he was brought to the ground. But by the term, we mean that it shall accomplish all that it has undertaken, and that there is no power in heaven, earth or hell, that can effectually resist the Holy Ghost. For example, while Arminians, Deists and devils, by all their united efforts stand in opposition to the method of God's saving grace, and the work of the adorable Spirit, he that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, God will have them in derision. He will still move on his undisturbed purpose and grace; none shall let, none shall hinder; "the wrath of man shall praise him, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain." That the Spirit is irresistible in this work, we call to witness the experience of (not those mushroom converts, of human means,) but all such as have passed from death unto life, and know the Lord Jesus, and the power of his resurrection. The child of God will tell us, I was an enemy to God by wicked works; I was in love with sin, an enemy to holiness; there was no fear of God before my eyes. In short, I was dead in trespasses and sins; but about midday, O king, a light shone around me, and I heard a voice saying unto me, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Yes, says the poor soul,, I was suddenly arrested, an awful trembling shook my frame, I felt myself undone, my sins in all their magnitude rushed in order before my afrighted eyes; loud peals of thunder from Mount Sinai caused me to tremble exceedingly, and quake, while vivid flashes of divine wrath taught me the dreadful reality, I am a sinner. There is a hell, a burning lake; I feel it this moment in my very soul. Whither, O whither shall I flee from the wrath of God? If up to heaven I direct my course, God is there. I dread to meet him. O ye rocks and mountains, shew pity and fall upon me; hide, O hide me from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. In this condition, the poor wreteh will not require knives or lancets, anxious benches nor arminian task-masters, to persuade him to "agonize." We risk nothing when we say that such a soul will testify that the Spirit's work upon the heart is irresistible. The Spirit having thus quickened the man,, the vital principle implanted is manifested by a struggle for deliverance, for light, for freedom; but all in vain he prays; the heavens are as brass, the earth is as the dust; his prayers are shut out. He flies to the law, but

"Justice cries with frowning face,
This mountain is no hiding place;
He reads; the promise meets his eye,
But cannot reach his case."

Thus burdened with guilt, and pressed down with wo, he sinks, despairs and dies. Here let us leave him one moment, (for we cannot help him; his case is desperate; no eye can pity, no arm can relieve him,) while we enquire, Dear reader, if the quickened sinner be thus helpless, thus destitute of power, if he that is made alive by the quickening power of the Holy Ghost, and slain by the law, can do nothing, what canst thou do? What can that poor soul do who has never been quickened, nor made to feel one spark of any thing more than totally depraved human nature? Now let us look back, and enquire what has become of that poor soul we left in the valley of death. Behold he is raised from the dead! The same irresistible Spirit which brought Jesus again from the dead, has raised him up. He is a new creature; old things are done away. He is no longer an arminian, no longer a work-monger;

he is stripped of his filthy rags; he is clothed, and in his right mind. Lo, he sits at Jesus' feet: his feet are placed upon a rock, his goings are established, and a new song is in his month. He no longer sings, Do, do, do, but he sings, It is done, it is finished. "The Lord has taken me out of an horrible pit," &c. But whence this glorious change? He that brought to the birth, gave strength to bring forth. Hence the soul was, and is delivered; the Spirit applied the cleansing blood of the Lamb; and he is washed and made clean; the Spirit gave him eyes, and he saw Jesus; the Spirit gave him faith, and he embraced him as his Savior, his Lord and his God.

The work of the Spirit is, in all cases, effectual.

If this position be not correct, there must be some case or cases where the work of the Spirit has proved ineffectual. We call for such a case to be produced. Where has the Spirit ever wrought ineffectually in any case? Such an example, we bless God, cannot be found; and if there could, it would make all heaven shudder; for the very instant that the Holy Ghost fails to accomplish any thing which it has undertaken to do, that moment he ceases to be God, ceases to be omnipotent, immutable and perfect. If there is any thing which the Holy Ghost cannot effectually perform, we speak with reverence, he cannot be omnipotent. But he was omnipotent once, when he spake the world into existence; hence there must have been a change, and he is no longer immutable. That change must be for the better or for the worse; if for the better, he was once imperfect; for nothing can be perfect if it can admit of improvement; and if by an improvement he is proved once to have been imperfect, then his truth falls prostrate at once; for he has declared that he is the Lord that changeth not. But if the change be for the worse, (since for the better it cannot be,) then it amounts to the same thing. Hence we say that if one single instance can be produced in which it can be established that the Holy Ghost has worked ineffectually in attempting the quickening of a soul, i. e., failed to effect its design, this would make all heaven shudder.

Again, let us admit what has been proved, and what we cannot deny, viz., that it is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing; and then if we prove that the Spirit's work has been ineffectual in any one case, the same arguments will also prove the Spirit's work ineffectual in every case; for human nature is in all cases precisely the same; all are on a level as to moral holiness, or unholiness; all are alike depraved and sold under sin; all are alike without strength in themselves. The unavoidable consequence then is, if the Spirit's exertion fails in one case, it fails in all; for the same cause under the same circumstances must invariably produce the same effects. How dreadful then would be the reflection that one poor soul for whom Christ died, and in whose heart the Eternal Spirit had wrought a work of grace, had failed to realize those blessings which was by the Spirit intended, seeing by this awful catastrophe the whole plan of salvation must inevitably fall through, and not a soul be saved. But once more; if it can be established that the work of the Spirit has been effectual in the case of Paul, Peter, James or John, or any other individual, the point is forever established, and we fearlessly bid defiance to all earth and hell to controvert or gainsay our position.

But laying aside all our arguments, and reasoning on the subject, we will be able to establish this point by the positive declaration of the word of God. "For as the Father raised up the dead and quickened them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." - John v. 24. But we enquire, Whom will the Son quicken by his Spirit? He has left his will on record in these words, viz: "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given, me be with me where I am," &c. - John xvii. 24. And in regard to the efficacy of this quickening power, the apostle was confident, and so are we, of this very thing, that he who began the good work will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ, And the blessed Master has said, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."

THE NEW BIRTH

Elder Beebe: There is one thing that I am lost in; that is the subject of the New Birth. I believe you and the other writers in the “Signs of the Times” understand that there is nothing that belongs to a person in a state of nature that receives a change. I believe that all are alike born in a state of condemnation, and if not delivered from that condemnation they must forever perish. Now, if both are alike, that is, the righteous and the wicked, they have something that will exist after the death of the body, and if it be not changed, what becomes of it?

Here is the point on which I am perplexed. Now will you please write me a letter and give me some light, if I have eyes to see and a heart to understand? Don’t do as you did before - promise and never perform.

Hiram Winchel.

Reply: In the multitude of pressing cares devolving on us, we had forgotten that we had promised to write brother Winchel on the subject of the New Birth, and we confess it was wrong for us to make such promise; but having made it, it was wrong to forget or fail to fulfill it. It would require the knowledge, wisdom and the inspiration of the apostle, and the patience of Job to meet all the queries and settle all the doubts that may be suggested by the thousands of our readers on all the deep mysteries of the kingdom of Christ, in which we profess ourself to have but a very limited understanding. We hope our brother will pardon our seeming neglect. He understands us and others to hold that there is nothing changed in us by the new birth. That is not our position. Every thing is in some sense changed, but no part of our old carnal or fleshly nature is born over again or made spiritual. A birth is that which brings forth into manifestation something that was never manifested or born before. All that is born of the flesh is flesh, and all that is born of the spirit is spirit. Now if our flesh were born again of the spirit, it would become spirit or spiritual; would live on spiritual food, but could no longer live on the fruits of the earth. The new birth is of incorruptible seed by the word of God which lives forever. But our fleshly nature is just what it was before; it requires the same earthly food and medicine; is as subject to disease and natural death as it was before. The new birth brings forth in the children of God a spiritual life that they never had before, which can only live on the bread which cometh down from God. It is a new life implanted in them. It is Christ in you the hope of glory. But still the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit which is born of the spirit is life because of righteousness. It is Christ in you; but it does not so change your fleshly nature as to fashion and make it like Christ's glorious body; nor will such a change take place until the resurrection. If the new birth, instead of the resurrection, should make our bodies spiritual, they could not die or be sown a natural body and raised a spiritual body. Pardon and justification are not the effect of the new birth; they result from the blood and righteousness of Christ. The new birth implants in us that life and light by which we are made to see, feel, know, and understand that we are freely justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. The new birth qualifies those who are born of the spirit to understand the things of the spirit so far as they are revealed to them by the Holy Ghost. But the reasoning powers of our old depraved nature are still left in the dark, for the natural man (or the old man, which is born of the flesh) receiveth not the things of the spirit of God, for they are spiritually, and only spiritually, discerned. "The light shineth in darkness, but the darkness comprehendeth it not." That which we find in us which is born of the flesh is of the earth earthly, and will remain so until delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God in the resurrection, when our mortality shall be swallowed up of life. This is called the old man, the outer man, the carnal man, etc. But that life which is born of God and implanted in our hearts by the Holy Ghost is “after God,” (not after Adam) “created in righteousness and true holiness;” It is therefore called *the new man,*the spiritual man, and the inner man, which cannot be corrupted because it is born of incorruptible seed; it cannot sin because it is born of God, and that incorruptible seed remaineth and abideth in him. In his flesh, or old man, Paul could find no good thing; in his spiritual life, or new man, John could find no bad thing; no sin. These two natures, Paul says, are contrary the one to the other. With the one he served the law of God; but with the other the law of sin. Trace your own personal experience, dear brother, and if you do not find these things in you, we shall have judged you wrongfully. But we are persuaded that you will find the flesh warring against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. What else can be meant by the Christian’s warfare?

Do you enquire, If then the body and soul, which were born of the flesh, are not by the new birth born over again and made spiritual, holy and immortal, what change has this new birth effected in the sinner that is born again? We will endeavor to show that a wonderful change is effected. That man was a boasting Pharisee, he is now a trembling Publican. He could confidently venture near the burning throne to tell the Lord how good and pious and benevolent he was; but now he stands afar off and smites upon his breast, afraid to look up, lest his guilt-stricken eyes should meet the all-seeing eye of a sin-avenging God. This we think is something of a change. But has his nature become changed from natural to spiritual? Ask you, and he will reply, The law is holy, and good, and just, and spiritual, but I, alas! am carnal, sold under sin. I was alive without the law once, but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. My legal hopes, my self-righteousness, and my free moral agency all gave up the ghost together. The dead sinner is quickened, for life is implanted in his heart. God, who commanded light to shine out of darkness, has shined in his heart, to give him the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. He is crucified with Christ, nevertheless he lives. Yet not he, (his body, or nature, the old man, is dead because of sin) but Christ liveth in him, and the life which he now lives in the flesh he lives by the faith of the Son of God, who hath loved him, and given himself for him. What does the new born, heaven born sinner find to be changed? Ask him, and he will say: "One thing I know, that whereas I was once blind, now I see." He was once under the power of darkness, but he is now translated into God's marvelous light. He has eyes now to see, for God has blessed his eyes, and God has shined in his heart, and God has enlightened his understanding. What else that indicates a change? The things that he once loved he now loathes and hates, and what he once hated he now loves with all his heart. He has, in short, become a new creature. Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us unto himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given unto us the word of reconciliation. His mouth that was full of cursing and bitterness now breaks forth in unknown joys and sings surprising grace. Once he thought that God could not in justice condemn him to everlasting woe and misery; now he is amazed that God can be just, and justify the ungodly. Once he was living without hope and without God in the world; now he has both, for Christ is in him the hope of glory. Is not this a very great change? Well, from whence does it proceed; from the old man, mended up and made spiritual? No, not a particle of it. The works or fruits of the flesh are precisely what they were before; but the fruits of the spirit, which is born of the spirit, are being developed, which are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law. These are very opposite to the fruits or works of the flesh, and they all proceed from the new implantation, for the flesh profiteth nothing. If the flesh were regenerated and changed from flesh to spirit, (and if it were born of the spirit it is spirit) would it not bear the fruits of the spirit? If the tree were made good, would not its fruit be good? Christ settles this question: "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit." How is it with you, brother Winchel, does your fleshly nature bring forth good fruit? Has it ever brought forth good fruit? We know your answer. Well then, the point is settled; the tree is evil, and cannot bring forth good fruit. Again, if our earthly nature which was born of the flesh, or any part of it, were born of the Spirit, or any part of it were born over again, regenerated and made holy or spiritual, why is it unsafe to walk after it? "For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh." "So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God." "But ye are not in the flesh but in the spirit, if so be that the spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life, because of righteousness." Therefore brethren we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh. "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live (Romans 8)." Can we read these solemn warnings given by the holy apostles to those who were already born again, charging them to mortify, repress and shun the leadings of their flesh, and still contend that the flesh by the new birth has become so changed and pure that it would be safe and proper to be led by it?

We think we have proved that if that which was born of the flesh has been born again of the spirit, it has become spirit, and its fruits must be, cannot possibly be otherwise than holy. Yet we are told by the authority of God himself that if we live after the flesh we shall die. And this warning is given only to those who were the subjects of both births. We apprehend the difficulty with some arises from a traditional notion of some imaginary distinction between a man and his soul. We admit a distinction between the soul and the body of man, but can conceive of none between the man and his soul. Take the soul from the body and that body ceases to be a man. Even should his animal vitality remain, without his soul he would not be a man; only an animal, like other animals that have no souls. In the creation the body was formed and existed as a body, but it was not a man, in the full sense of the word, until God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul. That soul was a man, and that man was a living soul. And as the progenitor and seminal head of the human race, the first Adam was made a living soul, so from him descended by natural generation all the souls and bodies of mankind. No birth of the flesh ever brought forth a man without a soul; yet Christ has said that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit. For the second Adam, who is the Lord from heaven, as the spiritual progenitor of his people, was made a Quickening Spirit, and by that birth we are partakers of the divine nature. These two natures, in conflict one with the other, from the time of the new birth will struggle in the same person until that which is born of corruptible seed shall fill up the measure of his days on earth and then return to dust; but that nature which is born of incorruptible seed shall return to God from whom it came. The soul of the believer, with this divine life implanted in it, as soon as released from the earthly element, shall throw off all its bondage of corruption and leave all that is vile behind, and by virtue of the immortal life of God in it, shall enter the state of immortal bliss, and mingle with the spirits of just men made perfect. And at the final resurrection of the just, the bodies also of all the saints shall be quickened by the spirit of immortality, the first fruits of which they received when born again; and in that immortal life shall they be perfectly conformed to the image of the Son of God, and bear that heavenly image as they have when here in the flesh borne the image of the earthly Adam. "But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you (Romans 8:11)." This change has not yet come. It is astonishing that any of our well informed brethren should think this change had already taken place, when "we ourselves which have the first fruits of the spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit: the redemption of our body (Romans 8:23)." The spirit in the Christian which is born of God is called the spirit of adoption, wherewith the saints are sealed in their persons, soul and body, until the day of redemption. And it is called the spirit of promise, and why is it so called? What has it promised? It seals the promise that every one who is a subject of the new birth shall be raised up at the last day, perfectly holy, spiritual, and perfectly happy. It does not seal to us any assurance that we now, either in soul or body, are what we shall be, for it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but it seals the glorious promise to us, and us to it, that when he who is our life shall appear, we shall be like him. And what more do we want? "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness (Psalm 17:15)."

If brother Winchel, or any other brother, regards our views on this subject as heresy, we will not dispute with them; or if they believe that in soul, or body, or spirit, they have as yet attained the mark of their high calling, we will request them to compare notes with one who could not run so fast, and whose desire and prayer better suits the condition of some of us slow travelers. Paul desired above all things that he might know Christ and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, and be made conformable unto his death. “If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect, but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended.” (Not quite so fast, Paul, as some in our day.) “But this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Philippians 3:10-14).”

We commenced this article for a private communication to brother Winchel, but having written more lengthily than we had intended, and hoping that the subject may not be barren or unprofitable to others, we publish it in connection with his last appeal to us. And we do sincerely hope that what we have written may be satisfactory, and that it may be edifying and comforting to all who have been perplexed upon the subject.

THE NEW BIRTH

Brother Beebe: If one so unworthy as I may call you brother, I have examined your reply in No. 16, on 2 Cor. v. 17. The questions were, Is any part of the Adamic man born again? If so, what part is born again? Now, if I understand you, it is the whole man, or that which is born of God, is the life which came from God, and that life is the new man, which keeps this Adamic man in subjection to some extent. Now, the question that I want you to answer is this. Is man composed of soul, spirit, and body in his Adamic nature? And do the soul and spirit partake of the divine nature of God in the new or second birth? Do the soul and spirit die when the body dies? And if so, what do you do with these passages? viz: "Fear not him that killeth the body, but hath not power to kill the soul; but fear him that can destroy both soul and body in hell." Matt. x. 28. "And I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish." John x. 28, and Rev. vi. 9, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God and for the testimony which they held," and xx. 4, "And I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, And they lived and reigned with Christ," etc. 1 John iii. 19, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot commit sin, because he is born of God." 1 Peter i. 23. "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever."

This does clearly show two births; the first a corruptible, the second an incorruptible; and that which was born first was born second - not something else born again. Again. Luke xxiii. 43, "And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, Today shalt thou be with me in paradise." And Luke xvi. 22,23, "And it came to pass that the beggar died and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom; the rich man died also, and was buried, and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment." Now, if some part of the Adamic man does not live when the body is dead, what do these passages mean? Again, Luke xxiv. 27, "But they were terrified and afrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit;" but Jesus said, "Handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Again, Phil. i. 23, "For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better." 2 Cor. v. 8, "We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord."

Now, from these passages, I do understand that man has a soul or spirit that does live when this body dies, and that the soul or spirit is that which is born again. And from your editorial and brother T. P. Dudley's communications, I understand you to deny that man has a soul or spirit that lives when this body dies. And I do desire your views on these points, and you will oblige many dear brethren by giving them so plainly that all may understand how you hold these passages, as there seems to be some misunderstanding here among the brethren in regard to your views. We ought to have no secrets in the plan of salvation, and we ought always to make our views as plain as our sense will allow. And now, my dear brother, if any part of the Adamic man is quickened into life, tell us what you think it is. Paul said, "If the Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Now if the wicked have no souls or spirits, how are they raised from their graves?

Now, my brother, I have been a member of the Baptist church over forty years, and have been trying to preach Jesus, and him crucified, for the last twenty years, and I have not followed the opinions of men. I was a member when the Campbellite doctrine, the mission doctrine, and the Parkerite doctrine, and the non-resurrection doctrine arose and I have not followed them. Jesus is all my hope for salvation. If grace was not given me in Christ Jesus before the world began, I am lost forever. The doctrine of Election and Predestination is a glorious theme.

Now, brother Beebe, I hope the good Lord is gathering his sheep and lambs into the fold. Since February I have baptized eight willing converts in Elk Fork church, and there are three other churches in this county, and there have been several additions in them. We have five ordained ministers in this county, and one more to be ordained in October; then we shall have six ordained and one licensed minister, and five churches in this county. This Association is called Deep Water Association. I will send you a Minute when printed, I have been taking the Signs, more or less, for fifteen years. A sincere enquirer after truth, and yours with respect.

MARTIN WHITE

Reply to Elder Martin White on the New Birth: Composition of Man, Resurrection of the Dead - Born Saints and Sinners, etc. We regret exceedingly the want of ability to make our communications intelligible to all our brethren; and after laboring from time to time, when called on, to express our views on the subject of the new and spiritual birth, that any of our readers should require to be informed that we believe man in his natural and also in his regenerate state possesses a soul, spirit, and body, and that the bodies of all the race of Adam shall be raised up out of the graves according to the scriptures, and we should utterly despair of ever being able to make ourself understood, if it were not that we have the assurance that our brethren in Christ do generally understand our position, with but few exceptions, and those few, so far as we can learn, are harrassed by those who make it their business to pervert what we say, and so confuse the minds of all who are to any extent under their influence. The primitive disciples, and even the holy apostles with all their heavenly inspiration, had to encounter the same influences, and their writings were so construed by pretended friends, but inveterate enemies, as to represent them as saying, “Let us sin that grace may abound,” or teach that the resurrection of the dead were already past. We do not impugn the motives of our brother White, for he seems to present his enquiries in a brotherly and christian spirit; but still we are truly astonished at some of the conclusions he has drawn from our former essays on the subject of the new birth; and more than all that he should infer from anything we have published during the fifteen years in which he has read our paper that we differ in regard to the natural organization of the Adamic man, as embracing soul, spirit, and body, and that the souls or spirits of all men must survive the dissolution of the body, and exist in happiness or misery forever.

Were we to express our views fully on every question and passage of scripture presented by brother White, we should require a large volume to contain them, in the most condensed form in which it is possible for us to present them. But this we presume he does not wish nor expect. We will attend to the most prominent of them, in the order in which he has stated them.

First - Is man composed of soul, spirit, and body in his Adamic nature?

Answer – Yes.

Second - Do the soul and spirit of man partake of the divine nature of God in the new or second birth?

Answer - Yes; and so does the body or flesh; but neither the soul, spirit or body of the Adamic man, becomes the divine nature, nor ceases to be the Adamic nature, until the death of the body. Peter says: "According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue; whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature." etc. 2 Peter i. 2, 3. All the nature we have developed in us before the new birth is human nature - earthly, corrupt, depraved, and in which we were children of wrath, even as others. - Eph. ii. 3. In the natural, earthly body, soul and spirit, God implants the spirit of his Son; but this implantation does not make our human, earthly and depraved soul, body and spirit, the spirit of the Son of God; or we should no longer be mortal; for "Christ dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." But inasmuch as we receive that life and spirit which is Christ, we are partakers of Christ, or, in other words, of the divine nature. We understand that it takes the body, soul and spirit to constitute the man; but we have neither space nor ability to define any of these component and indispensible elements of which man is composed. But that all three are named as participants of what we understand the divine nature to be, is fully expressed in the following scriptures: "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who hath loved me, and given himself for me." - Gal. ii. 20. This text proves that the body or flesh of Paul, and of the saints, was and are recipients and participants of the divine nature of Christ, and, beyond all controversy, not until we are subjects of the new birth, but at and from the time of the new birth. That the soul and spirit also participates in this divine nature appears, from the exclamation of Mary, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Savior." - Luke i. 46, 47. "The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." - Romans viii. 16.

Third - Do the soul and spirit die when the body dies?

Answer - "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." - Eccl. xii. 7. The soul or spirit of man, according to our understanding of the scripture, cannot cease to exist; when the body dies, the soul or spirit is separated from the body, and as the body goes to the earth, so the soul goeth to God who gave it, to be disposed of in happiness or woe, according to the destiny by him appointed. Nor do we believe there is any suspension of the existence or vitality of the soul and spirit. The spirits of just men are made perfect, and immediately after they leave the body are with God, and enjoy his presence. God is the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob; yet he is not the God of the dead, but of the living. - Matt. xxii. 32. "Today shalt thou be with me in paradise." - Luke xxiii. 43.

Fourth - If so, what do you do with these passages? We could not reconcile the doctrine of the non-existence of souls and spirits with the passages referred to by our brother; and it is highly probable that, as far as we understand their sacred import, we use them the same as brother White does. We have not time to consider them separately, nor is it necessary in this place, as we both evidently regard them as proof that the spirits, or souls of men, continue to live when the fleshly bodies are in their graves.

Fifth - Brother White quotes 1 Peter i. 23, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever." And then adds, "This does clearly show two births; the first a corruptible, the second an incorruptible, and that which was born first, was born second; not something else born again.

Answer - This conclusion is not quite so clear to our dull comprehension. That two births are implied, the one of a corruptible and the other of incorruptible seed, and that the saints are the subjects of both, we fully believe; but that that which was born first is born second, does not accord with our reading of the scriptures. First, because it is not so stated by Peter in the text, for he is evidently contrasting the two births. The one which is of corruptible seed is of the flesh, and goes to corruption, as he illustrates, "All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord (by which the incorruptible birth is effected) endureth forever." Now if that which is born of corruptible seed is afterward born of incorruptible seed, how could it then go to corruption like the grass or, like the flower of grass? Second, to our mind it conflicts with the words of Jesus to Nicodemus, John iii. 6, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." What is a birth? It is evidently a bringing forth something which had a prior existence in a seminal head or progenitor. What was brought forth from our earthly progenitor is of a corruptible seed, is earthly, and, like grass, must wither and go back to the earth. But that which is born of the Spirit is not flesh, but it is spirit. And although the man who is born of the flesh, and is redeemed from the earth, is the recipient of that life which is born of God, and of that spirit, which is born of the Spirit, yet the one is not a reproduction of the other, nor is the spirit which is born of the Spirit of God made out of the flesh that was born of the flesh. Otherwise Nicodemus was right in supposing that the production of the fleshly birth must go again into the womb and be born. A fleshly birth does not bring forth spirit, nor does a spiritual birth bring forth flesh. The one is born of God, the other of the flesh. Every Christian has in his own experience all that we contend for on this subject. His fleshly corruptible nature which was conceived in sin, shapen in iniquity and going astray from the womb, speaking lies, which now makes him groan, being burdened, and in which (unless his differs widely from what Paul was) there dwelleth no good thing; and the implantation of life and immortality, which, after God is created in righteousness and true holiness, which is called the new man. This new or inner man, is born of God, but the old or outward man, is born of the flesh. In the latter we serve the law of sin; but in the former we delight in the law of God. That which is born of the flesh, and is flesh, contains no good thing. That which is born of God, cannot commit sin, "because his seed (which is incorruptible by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever) remaineth in him and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." - 1 John iii. 9. We appeal to brother White, and to every saint on earth. Are your soul, body and spirit so born over again that in them you cannot, do not, commit sin? If they are really born of God, they cannot, neither can anything that is born of incorruptible seed be corrupted, or that which is born of the spirit die. Every Christian knows that there is a nature in him which is sinful, vile, and polluted. Each has a vile body which is to be changed and fashioned like the glorious body of our risen and glorious Redeemer: but every saint on earth knows that that change has not yet taken place in him; but like Job he can sometimes say in the spirit, "All the days of my appointed time I will wait till my change come." If all that was born of the flesh is born over again, of incorruptible seed by the word of the Lord which liveth and abideth forever, no part of us can die, nor sin, nor see corruption. Where or whence would there be any warfare in the Christian, if our whole nature were regenerated and born of God. What conflict could there be "Twixt reigning grace, and striving sin?" Let those who see and feel, and mourn no sinful passions, no vile affections, no doubts or fears, or unbelief, no wanderings from the pathway of holiness - those who are as holy and spiritual as they ever expect or desire to be, claim that their bodies, souls, and spirits are already born of incorruptible seed; but such poor wandering sinful and sinning souls as the writer of this article, must, like Cowper's stricken deer, withdraw from the whole herd of such righteous ones, and seek society with those who are of broken hearts and contrite spirits; and standing afar off from all such, smite upon his breast and cry, "God be merciful to me, a sinner."

Sixth - "And from your, and brother T. P. Dudley's communications, I understand you to deny that man has a soul or spirit that lives when this body dies."

Answer - Elder T. P. Dudley is of age, he can speak for himself. If he holds any such sentiments, we have never inferred it from any communication of his, nor anything like it. We presume this is a misapprehension of his views altogether. But as for ourself, if by any fair rule of construction, our language in any communication we have ever made, publicly or privately, in the pulpit or through the press, a denial of the continued existence of the soul and spirit of both saint and sinner, after the decease of the body, can be justly inferred, we will confess that we have not sense enough to write intelligibly, or to make ourself understood on this important subject; for we certainly have never designed to convey any such idea in any communication we have ever made. But we candidly believe if brother White will review our files for the number of years he has been a reader of them, he will find us frequently avowing our full conviction that the soul and spirit lives on when the body dies, and that the bodies also shall all be raised from the dead at the appointed hour, and in their resurrection, but not before, the bodies of the saints shall be clothed with incorruption and immortality. The conflict between sin and holiness will attend us only to the end of our mortal pilgrimage; the warfare of the flesh and spirit will cease when the body dies. The soul or spirit, or angel of every saint, will instantly bask in the fulness of eternal glory in the unclouded presence of the unveiled glory of God and the Lamb, as soon as the body dies. And the wicked also will instantly feel the weight of their awful doom as soon as their mortal bodies die. The life given us in Christ Jesus, and implanted in us by the new birth, is eternal life and cannot die; the soul and spirit of the saints in possession of it will go immediately to heaven. All that was earthly, sensual or vile in them will die with the body; all that does not die with the body, as we understand the subject, will be fully qualified to enjoy the unsullied glory of the supreme God, and mingle in the rapturous melody of glorified spirits in heaven.

As to the doctrines of the Campbellites, the Parkerites, the non-resurrectionists, or the modern missionists, we have no connection with nor fellowship for them. With brother White we can truly say that Christ and him crucified is enough for us. With our Bible in hand, the Holy Spirit to open its sacred treasures to our heart, - let these be ours, and we will cheerfully renounce all things else. We are glad to hear of the stately doings of our dear Redeemer in the churches in the vicinity of our dear brother White; and may it be his happy lot to lead many more of the precious lambs of Christ into the baptismal waters, if it be the pleasure of the Lord.

THE NEW BIRTH

JOHN 3:7 “Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again.”

At the conclusion of our article on “Regeneration,” in No. 17 of the current volume, we proposed to give a more full expression in a subsequent number on the subject of the New Birth. This we have felt inclined to do in order to correct the impression entertained by some of our readers that we have changed our views on this vitally important subject.

The very emphatic manner of our Lord’s declaration to Nicodemus forbids the thought that any one of all the race of Adam can ever see the kingdom of God except he be qualified for such perfection by a spiritual birth. Our natural birth capacities us only for a knowledge of natural things, but cannot qualify us for an understanding of things beyond the sphere of nature. If it were possible for the natural faculties and perceptive power of a natural man to be so improved by education, moral, intellectual or religious culture as to enable him to see the kingdom of God, or comprehend, receive or know the things of the Spirit of God, our Lord would not have thus positively declared its utter impossibility. Nor would the Holy Ghost, by the inspired apostle, have corroborated the testimony, as in I Corinthians 2:14. “But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.”

By a natural man we understand is intended a man that is born of the flesh, or an earthly man, possessing all the natural elements and properties of a man. Adam, both before and after his transgression, was a natural man. The qualifying adjective is used in a scriptural sense to distinguish a man who is made of the dust of the ground, and inspired with vitality and intelligence, from a spiritual man who is born of the Spirit. The distinction between the natural man and the spiritual is fully set forth in the two distinct headships, from whom the two distinct natures are derived. These two distinct progenitive heads are called, as such, the first and the second Adam: the one of the earth earthy, the other is the Lord from heaven. The first was made a living soul; the second Adam is a quickening Spirit. From the first or natural Adam emanates all our natural or earthly being; from the second Adam emanates all that spiritual, holy, heavenly and eternal life in which we are manifested as the sons or children of God. As our natural life, or natural man, or nature, descended from the earthly Adam by natural generation, and was developed by a natural birth wherein we were born of the flesh, even so our spiritual, eternal life is developed and brought into manifestation by a spiritual birth. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. As we were totally ignorant and unconscious of all that was transpiring in this world in the development of the things of nature until we were born of the flesh, so that it could in truth be said of us, Except we were born of the flesh we could not see or know the things of nature. So it is most positively declared of all who are born of the flesh that, “Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God.”

If, without a natural birth, we could not come into this world nor see the things of this world, must it not follow that a birth of the Spirit is an indispensable prerequisite to capacitate us to either see or know the things of the kingdom which is purely a spiritual kingdom, which flesh and blood cannot inherit? Then, let us not marvel that Jesus has said, “Ye must be born again.”

As neither spiritual life or spiritual capacity can be born of the flesh, so neither can natural life and natural capacity be born of the Spirit. No amount of spiritual gifts can change, enlarge or perpetuate our natural man, or shield the earthly man from hunger, thirst, disease or death. Neither can any development of our natural powers, either physical or mental, contribute in the smallest degree to our spiritual life, perception or enjoyment. That nature in the Christian which is born of the flesh must, as well after the new birth as before, subsist on the productions of the same earth out of which our mortal bodies were fashioned; and that spiritual life or nature which is born of God must subsist on bread that cometh down from heaven, from whence that life proceeded. If spiritual consolation would sustain our earthly nature, Stephen would not have died in the full and rapturous view of the opened heavens, and of his exalted Savior; and if earthly comforts could sustain our spiritual nature, no child of God would ever despond while abounding in wealth and luxury.

In contemplating the gospel doctrine of the new and spiritual birth, we should not confound the birth either with redemption or remission of sins. As transgressors of the divine law, we could not possibly be saved from sin and wrath without redemption; but even redemption by the blood of Christ, and the forgiveness of all our sins, would not supply the place of being born again. Redemption has met the demands of eternal justice, borne the pains and penalties which are due to our transgressions and so secured for us the remission of our sins. All this was accomplished for us, if we are interested in it, many centuries ago; but still, until we were born again we could not see the kingdom of God, or feel the joys of his salvation, or know anything about the things of the Spirit of God. If it were even possible for us to put away from us all our transgressions, and perfectly obey the holy law of God, that would free us from condemnation, but could by no means make us any more spiritual than we were in Adam before sin entered into the world. For we are expressly informed that the first Adam was not spiritual, but natural; but the second Adam is spiritual.

It is true, if we were not sinners we could not leave this present world, for the sting of death is sin; we could not be sinners if we were not subjects of God's government, for sin is a transgression of the law, and where there is no law, there can be no transgression. Hence we are told, "The strength of sin is the law." Nothing short of the redemption that is in Christ Jesus could deliver us from the power or strength of sin but a power fully equal to that of sin; and that must be equal to the law which is the strength of sin, therefore if we are saved, we may well exclaim in the inspired language of the apostle, "Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Redemption has removed the insuperable impediment which forbid our exemption from everlasting wrath, abolished death, opened the everlasting doors which were closed upon us, and bade the everlasting gates of life and immortality be lifted up, and thus brought immortality to light through the gospel. All this belongs to our redemption, but to qualify the redeemed of the Lord to come to the heavenly Jerusalem, and see the kingdom of God, and to behold the King in his beauty, and feel the power of the resurrection of the Son of God, and to enter into his resurrection life and immortality, we must be born again.

The question has been repeatedly asked and urged, "What is it that must be born again?" We would not dare attempt to improve on the words of our Lord: "Except a man be born again." The man that has been born of the flesh and is flesh cannot see the kingdom of God except he be born again. This is necessary, not to make him a man, nor to change him from a man to an angel, but to bestow on him a new spiritual, immortal and eternal life, which he never before had, and which he could never have without being born of the Spirit, as he had been before born of the flesh. That man who was chosen in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world, and consequently before he was manifestly the subject of any birth, before he was born either of the flesh or of the Spirit.

We think it will not be disputed by any intelligent Christian that all the children of God were personally elected or chosen of God, in Christ Jesus, before the foundation of the world, according to Ephesians 1:4. If this be admitted, it must follow that they all had a personal identity and existence as members of the mystical body of Christ before Adam's dust was fashioned to a man, and therefore prior to their first or second birth. The developments of time have demonstrated to us that it was the purpose of God that every one of his elect should, in the fullness of the dispensations of times, be born first of the flesh, and then be born again of the Spirit. Both of these births were ordained and provided for by the wisdom and decree of God, not to give them being or identity, for these they had in Christ before the world began. By the first birth they were to be developed in their earthly and fleshly nature in common with the whole natural posterity of the earthly Adam. This first birth was necessary that they might see and know the things of nature; for except they were born of the flesh, they could never have known the things of the flesh. "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man that is in him?"

In the stupendous mystery of the hidden counsel and purpose of God, this fleshly birth and identification of God's elect with the family of mankind was indispensable to the development of the great eternal purpose which God had purposed in himself before the world began, that in the first Adam they should all die, and in Christ they should all be made alive. If we admit that God has saved us and called us according to his own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, then we cannot consistently deny that that purpose and grace provided for our being born of the flesh, and identified with all the rest of Adam's posterity, and with them sink into death by the transgression of Adam, and be quickened from the dead, and raised up from condemnation and wrath, be washed, cleansed and purified, and freely justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.

Whether brethren can agree with us that the absolute purpose and immutable decree of God embraced our fallen state and condition, as well as our salvation from sin, death and hell, through his dear Son, or whether they regard our fallen condition as an after thought, occasioned by some unavoidable failure of his purpose, if it be admitted that our redemption from sin and death was predestinated, we must also, and unavoidably (we think) admit the indispensable necessity for the fleshly birth of all the children of God which were from everlasting identified and personally chosen unto salvation in our Lord Jesus Christ. By our natural birth then we enter into, and become a part of this world, are capacitated to see it, and to sojourn in it until, like a hireling, we shall have fulfilled our allotted number of days; but our first, or fleshly birth, while it capacitates us for knowledge of the things of nature, can supply us with no capacity for any thing beyond the bounds of this world; and hence the necessity that we should be born again in order that we may see the kingdom of God, and know the things of the Spirit of God.

In being born again, then, this man, who was chosen of God in Christ before the foundation of the world, and was born of the flesh since the foundation of the world, must, at some period still later than his fleshly birth, be born again, or he cannot see the kingdom of God; he must be born of water and of the Spirit, or he cannot inherit the kingdom of God.

As our first or natural birth belongs to, and results from, natural generation, so our being born again belongs to, and results from, regeneration. The seminal life of all the posterity of Adam was created in him in the day when they were created. So the spiritual eternal life of the generation of our Lord Jesus Christ was given and secured to all the children of God in Christ when he was given to be the Head over all things to his church. The words of our Lord which we have placed at the head of this article were addressed to one who was already born of the flesh; and they are applicable to such only as are born of the flesh. A birth can only develop, or bring forth into manifestation, the same nature of which it is generated and born. “That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.” The first birth brings forth that life, flesh and nature in which we were created in the earthly Adam; but the second birth brings forth into manifestation that life, spirit and immortality which was given to us in Christ Jesus, as the second Adam, and the Lord from heaven.

Having thus briefly considered the subject doctrinally, we will now offer some remarks on the personal experience of this birth by the children of God, and point out some of the prominent evidences by which we know that we have experienced it, if indeed we are of that happy number. These evidences are discovered by comparing and contrasting the state, condition, capacities, elements and exercises of those who are, with those of them who are not, born again; as also by the peculiar exercises produced by the birth, while under the quickening operation of the Spirit in our passage from death unto life.

Before we were born again, we were dead in trespasses and sins, wherein we walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience; among whom we all had our conversation, in the lusts of the flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh, and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath even as others (Ephesians 2:1-3); in the full possession of all the elements of a carnal, depraved and sinning nature, and totally destitute of any spiritual life or knowledge. The carnal mind, which was all the mind we had, was enmity against God. Our selfish depraved propensities, with every imagination of our hearts, were evil, and only evil continually. Possessing at the same time exalted views of our own imaginary virtues, and of our ability to commend ourselves to the favor of God, and to secure for ourselves an inheritance of glory by our own works. Held under chains of darkness and strong delusion, believing lies, and sporting with our own deceivings. Every ray of divine truth shut out from our mind, and our mind totally incapable of receiving, appreciating, or even desiring a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus; hating that truth, and hating all who love or contend for it. Condemned already, and the wrath of God abiding on us, yet boasting of our goodness, and holding that God was obliged in justice to view things as we viewed them, and to save us on such terms as we proposed. In love with sin, at enmity against holiness, at war with heaven, and in league with hell. Calling light darkness, and darkness light; truth error, and error truth; and altogether ignorant of our real condition.

In this wretched state we all were by nature, and nothing belonging to, or emanating from our earthly birth could by any possibility comprehend or know the condition we were in.

By the new birth, a new life is implanted in us, and that life is light. The nature of that light is to make manifest the things which by the power of darkness had been concealed from us before. Quickened by Christ, the Second Adam, who is a quickening spirit, we are made to see and feel our sinfulness, and our lost and helpless condition. We are alarmed to find that we are much worse than we had ever before supposed. The law enters, and sin revives; the purity as well as the inflexible severity of the divine law appears, and the same light which reveals this also shows us the enormity of our guilt, the justice of our condemnation, and the impossibility of salvation by the law. All our boasted abilities to save ourselves was withered and vain. Lost, helpless and despairing, our legal hopes yield up the ghost. The commandment came, sin revived, and I died. The incorruptible seed, by the word of God is deposited in our heart, and all that is felt of conviction and despair are but the legitimate consequence. The light of life now begotten in us reveals a holy God, a righteous law, and a poor guilt-stricken, helpless, and despairing sinner, justly sinking into everlasting perdition.

All this is, however, the effect of life. All this is a struggling for deliverance. As the birth into liberty draws near, the conflict becomes the more intense. “God, be merciful to me, a sinner,” is now uttered in the most terrible earnestness, as quivering under the unsheathed flaming sword, which justice has raised to strike the decisive blow; when lo! the birth reveals the Almighty Savior, who has died for our offenses, and arisen for our justification. The fiery sword was quenched in his blood. “Surely he has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows, and the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed.”

Lo! Now the guilt is all removed, the terror is gone, the darkness vanquished by bursting light and refulgent glory. God’s method of saving sinners now appears, and the sinner is born again.

This is the birth, and that which is born is spirit. It is not flesh. It is born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. Being begotten and born of God, it manifests not only a new life, but a new relationship. The life which is manifested by this birth is not a revision of our Adamic life, but it is the life of the Father, by whom it is begotten; and it is the vitality of that which is born; hence in this new and heavenly birth, we are made partakers of the divine nature.

Christ, who is our life, is formed in us, and his sonship, his heirship, his inheritance of glory and immortality is born in us, and we are one with him, even as he is one with the Father. From this heaven-born spirit flows all the fruits of the Spirit which testify that we are born of God. As we have shown what are the works of the flesh which characterize the fleshly birth; so the new and heavenly birth is demonstrated by all the fruits of the Spirit of Christ which is given to us. Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, temperance, brotherly kindness, charity, etc., are some of the living fruits of this heaven-born child, this new man, which after God (not after Adam) is created in righteousness and true holiness. Now in the man who is born again two natures appear. The one is born of the flesh, and is flesh, full of lust, and in opposition to holiness, warring against the spirit, and constantly performing the works of the flesh, as described by Paul in Galatians 5:19,20. The other is born of God, and yields the fruits of the Spirit, as described above.

A conflict between the old man and the new, between that which is born of the flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit, a love for holiness, and hatred of sin; a love to God, and loathing of self; a love for the truth and aversion to error; a love to the saints, and desire to be in company and communion with them; an appreciation of the beauty of the ordinances of Christ, baptism and the Lord's Supper; a veneration for the order and laws of the kingdom of Christ, and a desire to walk in them, with a deep sense of our own unworthiness, an ardent desire for the peace of Jerusalem, and prosperity of the church of God, with a relish for the doctrine of the gospel, and willingness to suffer reproach for defending it.

These are all scriptural, and therefore reliable evidences that those who possess them are born of God, and heirs of immortal glory, and joint heirs with Christ to an inheritance which is incorruptible, and undefiled, and that cannot fade away.

As our earthly nature which is born of the flesh is depraved and sinful, nothing pure and heavenly can proceed from it; and so that life which is born of God is pure and heavenly, no evil can proceed from it. "It cannot sin, because it is born of God."

The conclusion is inevitable, that all that is unholy and sinful in us is of the flesh which is born of the flesh; and all that is spiritual, pure and heavenly in us is born of God; born of incorruptible seed, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever. No man can therefore glory in the flesh; for in our flesh dwelleth no good thing. He that glorieth must glory in the Lord, in that which God hath done for us. Every spiritual emotion, aspiration or thought is of that spirit which is born of the Spirit, by which we are qualified to see the kingdom of God.

"Then give all the glory to his holy name,
To him all the glory belongs;
Be ours the high theme, still to sound forth his fame,
And crown him in each of our songs."

THE NEW BIRTH

(A reply to Elder John R. Martin)

Elder Martin will, we trust, pardon our delay in replying to his inquiries. His letter had been filed with others, and overlooked until the present time. We will try to make our views more clear and intelligible to him, and to others who have failed to understand us on the vitally important subject of the new birth.

Our esteemed brother repeats the words which we used in our reply to sister Phillips in the Signs for Sept. 15th, 1876, namely, "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit; it never did belong to any other family, for it is born of God, and never was defiled with sin; it is born of incorruptible seed – and was never corrupted – being born of God; it was not purchased, redeemed nor adopted." Having quoted these words of ours, brother Martin asks, if the soul or spirit were never defiled with sin, were never corrupted, what necessity there was of being born again? Answer. The soul and body and spirit that were and are born of the flesh, were in that birth born of corruptible seed; they were not only corruptible, but actually became corrupted, defiled, sinful and depraved, and necessitated to be redeemed, washed, cleansed, purified and born again, in order to see the kingdom of God. But what we contend for is, that the spiritual life which is given to us in the new birth, is not born of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but is born of God. And the scriptures testify that "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." – 1 John iii. 9.

We were trying to show that all in us which is born of the flesh is flesh, and all flesh is born of corruptible seed, has become corrupt, depraved and sinful. But all that is born of God is born of incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. – 1 Peter i. 23. Our first or natural birth, which was of corruptible seed, developed or brought forth that life, in soul, body and spirit, which God gave us in common with all mankind in the earthly Adam. In him we all die: death has passed upon us all, for that all have sinned. If our natural birth constituted us children of God, it would also constitute all mankind children of God, and then we could see no need of a second birth to make us manifest as the children of God. But Jesus our Lord says, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." Our fleshly nature was not produced by being born of the Spirit, nor was our spiritual life produced by a fleshly birth; for all men are born of the flesh, but all men have not the Spirit of God.

We presume that brother Martin believes as we do, that God gave us our natural life in common with all the human race in the earthly Adam, and that except we were born of the flesh we could not see this natural world or be manifested in it. And that he gave us spiritual, incorruptible, eternal life in Jesus Christ, who is the second Adam, and the Lord from heaven, and that a spiritual birth was indispensable to bring us forth in that spiritual life. None of our brethren, it is presumed, will contend that our spiritual, incorruptible and eternal life is born of the flesh, or descended to us by generation from the earthly Adam; or that our natural, mortal life or earthly body is the production of the new and spiritual birth. Now we hold that this natural man that is born of the flesh is a sinner, conceived in sin and shapen in iniquity. It is this earthly nature that is under the law, and that has transgressed the law and fallen under the curse, and which must be redeemed, washed from pollution and guilt by the blood of Christ, and then be born again, not of a corruptible seed, but of incorrupible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever.

This Adamic man, born of corruptible seed, who has sinned, must be redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, and born again of a pure and incorruptible seed, or he cannot see the kingdom of God; for that life which la born of corruptive seed is corrupt and sinful. But we hold that eternal life which is given us in the new birth, being of incorruptible seed, is not susceptible of corruption or pollution; therefore it was not redeemed, for it was never defiled with guilt, and it cannot sin, because it is born of God, and his incorruptible seed remains in him, and he, or it, cannot sin, because it is born of God, and therefore of a seed that cannot be corrupted. This life is Christ in us, the hope of glory. "For, for me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." "When he who is our life shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory." "This life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us." – 1 John i. 2. "Which God bath given us in his Son." – 1 John v. 11, 12. And which is hid with Christ in God. – Col. iii. 3.

This life, we have said, was never bought nor sold, was never condemned by the law, never needed redemption; but those of Adam's race who are by grace the recipients of it, were by nature children of wrath, even as others. This life in us is born of the Spirit, and is spirit; but it is not the spirit of the flesh, which is vile, but it is the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, and which shall also quicken our mortal bodies in the final resurrection, when these mortal bodies shall put on immortality, and these corruptibles shall put on incorruption, and the saying shall be brought to pass, that death is swallowed up of life. We who have received this spirit still do groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our bodies. – Rom. viii. 23.

"Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.” – 1 Cor. xv. 50. Why? Because it is born of incorruptible seed, and this earthly relationship which we now bear in our flesh, and in all our mortal powers and elements, must be dissolved by death; and when quickened in the resurrection by the Spirit which now dwells in all who are born again, they will bear the image of the heavenly Adam, as in our fleshly nature we now bear the image of the earthly Adam. Then when these vile bodies are changed, they shall be presented in glory as the children, not of the earthy Adam, but as the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. – Luke xx. 36.

We have tried to males ourself understood by brother Martin, and by all who read our views. We do hold that our body, soul and spirit, as born of the flesh, of corruptible seed, was corrupted, depraved, and justly condemned by the righteous law of God, did and do belong to another family than that of God, by nature were afar off, but are made nigh by the blood of Christ, and that in their new and heavenly birth they receive an incorruptible life, which is and always was pure and holy; and although we are still in these vile bodies, in which there dwells no good thing, we have the blessed assurance that our God will change our vile bodies, and raise them up from the dead by his Spirit which now (by the new birth) dwells in us. This mortal must put on immortality; it has not yet put it on, although we have received the spirit of adoption, as the earnest of our immortal inheritance, and the full assurance that these bodies, with all the corruptible elements to them pertaining, shall be sown as natural bodies, in death; but they shall be raised from the dead as spiritual, immortal bodies, in the likeness of the risen and glorious body of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We cannot claim that anything in or about us that is sinful, depraved or mortal is born of God, or is of an incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever;

nor that anything in or about us that is pure, spiritual, incorruptible or immortal is born of the flesh in us, as our daily experience as well as the scriptures fully demonstrate, is flesh, and all that we receive in the new birth is spiritual, and that these two elements are contrary one to the other; in the flesh dwells no good thing, in the Spirit there dwells no evil thing. The flesh wars against the spirit, and the spirit wars against the flesh; and this warfare will continue until the earthly house of our tabernacle shall be dissolved, and we shall be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven. – 2 Cor. v. 1-5.

In conclusion, suffer a few words on 2 Cor. v. 17: "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is (or as in the margin, let him be) a new creature; old things are passed away, behold all things are become new. And all things are of God," &c. In the context we are told, "That if one died for all, then were all dead." And that he (Christ) died for all, (all his people, or members,) that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again. Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more. That is, from the time of Christ's resurrection and ascension to glory, we know him only as he is revealed to us by his Spirit. As he was put to death in the flesh, which was our flesh, which he took on him for the suffering of death, and he was quickened by the Spirit; all those for whom he died were baptized into his death, and raised with him from under the law, and unto and into newness of life. When he was known in the flesh, he was recognized as in our law place; but now being raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, he is no more known as the man of sorrow, nor under the law, nor subject to death, as death bath no more dominion over him. He destroyed death, and him that had the power of death, and brought life and immortality to light through -the gospel. To know him after the flesh would be to know him under the law, for in being made flesh he was made under the law; but he has suffered for us in the flesh, and now is known to us in the newness of resurrection life, by the power of an endless life, in all the glory which he had with the Father before the world began. Now if any man be in him, he also is known in the fellowship of the Spirit, as crucified with him, raised up from the condemnation of the law, and a partaker of his resurrection life. The recognition of the saints is not on the ground of any fleshly excellence. The body is dead because of sin; but the spirit of life because of righteousness. The unity of the saints is in a unity of the Spirit. If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his; but as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. Our flesh is still mortal, corruptible, and under the irrevocable sentence, "Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return." Hence it is said, "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above," &c. "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory. Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth," &c. "For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience. – But now ye also put off all these, anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communications out of your mouth. Lie not one to another, seeing ye have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free ;but Christ is all in all." – Col. iii. 1-11. "For as the body is one, and bath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free, and have been all made to drink into one Spirit." 1 Cor. xii. 12,13.

From all these scriptures we see that it is not our perishable, corruptible bodies which are in Christ, but our life which is hid with him in God; and we see that our fleshly natures have not became new, but are dead because of sin. And all things which have become new to us are of God; none of them are of the earthy Adam, of the flesh, nor of the earth. To be in or present with Christ, is to be absent from the flesh, "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord. (For we walk by faith, not by sight.) We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord. Wherefore we labor, that whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him." 2 Cor. v. 6-9. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." "So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwells in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead, because of sin; but the Spirit is life, because of righteousness." – Romans viii. 1,8-10. So then to be in Christ is not that our carnal nature is in him, but all the gifts of the Spirit, by which we are recognized as the members of his spiritual body, and which things to us are new, and of God, and which we have received in the unspeakable gift of God's dear Son. Old things, such as the law, with all its carnal ordinances, its cursings, and its thunderings, are passed away; and while abiding in him, we walk not after the flesh, as formerly, but after the Spirit. Not in the oldness of the letter, but in the newness of the Spirit.

We submit these explanations of our views to the consideration of our beloved brother Martin, and to all who are of the household of faith. So far as they are sustained by the scriptures, and opened to our understanding by the Spirit, may they be received; and wherein they are not so sustained, may the Lord enable us all to detect all that is wrong, and to receive with joy all that is approved, and may his great name be magnified forevermore.

THE NEW CREATION.

WE are requested by friends in Kentucky to give our views of Psalm cii. 18, Isa. lxv. 17, to the end of the chapter, and Psalm cxxxix. 15 and 16.

The first passage in the order presented is Psalm cii. 18: "This shall be written for the generation to come; and the people which shall be created shall praise the Lord." The other passages appear also to refer to the same subject, and shall be noticed briefly in their order. To us it is evident that the Psalms were prophetic as well as devotional, and hence our Lord included them with the law and the prophets when he said, "All that is written in the law, and in the Psalms, concerning me, must be fulfilled - "and many portions of the Psalms have been expounded to us in the New Testament as having a prophetic allusion to the coming of Christ, his sufferings and death, and also of the glory that should follow. In this Psalm we trace, not only the individual experience of the children of God, the trials and straits they are sometimes called to bear, but also the state of God's people, first, unto the legal dispensation withering like the grass, and declining like the shadow. The law under which Israel existed stopped every mouth, and presented every man guilty before God. But the royal prophet and sweet singer is indulged with a prophetic view of the declining shadows of the former heavens, and the expiration of the legal covenant is its own limitation, when the Shiloh should come, and the sceptre depart from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet; when the enduring kingdom of Christ should be revealed at the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. "Thou shalt arise." His body could not be left in the grave, nor his soul under the vengeance of the law. He must arise from the dead, and be exalted a Prince and a Savior, to give repentance to Israel and the remission of sins, "and have mercy upon Zion." The law could show no mercy; mercy was unknown to the law; its rigid demands were, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," and the people of God could not be delivered from its condemnation independently of Christ's resurrection for their justification. The salvation of Abel and all the Old Testament saints was as firmly predicated upon the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, as is that of the saints of the present dispensation. Hence the mercy looked for by the Psalmist was connected with the rising of our Lord, and that at the time, yea, the set time to favor Zion. The time was never found in a legal covenant, but in him who is, and was, and is to be the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. Connected with the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, and the establishment of his kingdom, the Gentiles were to participate in the joys of his salvation. "So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth thy glory." But when? At the set time to favor Zion: on the third day from his crucifixion, "When the Lord shall build up Zion, and appear in his glory." Then the medium of intercourse with heaven, of communion with God should be developed, and God would "Regard the prayer of the destitute," which was what the law could not do; the prayer of the destitute could receive no commiseration or regard by the law; if we come to the law we must bring an offering, but the poor, destitute, perishing and despairing soul finds mercy and grace in the gospel.

"This shall be written for the generation to come," viz: the things embraced in the foregoing verses concerning the declining shadows and receding elements of the old dispensation, the resurrection of Christ from the dead, the deliverance of Zion from bondage, the medium of access to the throne of mercy, the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles, the building up of the church and everlasting kingdom of Christ, &c. This is what should be, and what was written by an order from the God of Jacob, by the spirit of inspiration, and written too for the generation to come; the generation of which ancient Israel was a type. "A seed shall serve him, an d it shall be counted to the Lord for a generation." "A chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people," &c. A generation of sons; born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. For them the records of the Old Testament were kept, and the things that were written aforetime were written for their instruction and consolation. "And the people which shall be created shall praise the Lord."

It is quite probable that the difficulty with our inquiring friends is in relation to the new creation. It is certain from the positive testimony of the scriptures, that the natural creation was complete when God ceased from all the works thereof; and rested on the seventh day. We cannot therefore consistently think the expression in this text can allude to any new creation in a natural sense; but rather to the spiritual creation, which in distinction from the natural and the typical creation, or origination of them is called new. The gospel tent is in the New Testament particularly designated as a new order. First, It is not of this world; therefore it is not a part of the natural creation, or creation of nature; Even the flesh and blood of the saints do not inherit the kingdom of God: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Whatever we may anticipate in the glorious resurrection of the bodies of the saints, when their mortals shall put on immortality, certainly that will be no new or natural creation; but it will be what it is called, a resurrection. Neither could the bringing into visible existence the gospel church be embraced in the creation, or origination of the typical heavens and earth; for the gospel church is as distinct from the typical as Christ is distinct from Aaron.

The development of this new creation presented what John saw, (Rev. xxi. 1-5:) "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more." This new heaven and earth was no new revision of the old, for the old had passed away. The law and the prophets were until John: at that time he came unto whom the gathering of the people should be, and whose substance was not hidden from God, and the members of whose mystical body were all written in God's book, and in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there were none of them developed to us. Out of the old receding heavens, the Jewish nation, John saw the holy city, the New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride for her husband. The church had her origin in God: "Both he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren." Again, Jesus said, "I go to my Father and to your Father; to my God and to your God" and also that he proceeded forth and came out from God. Certainly the setting up of the head from everlasting, embraced the spiritual life of the whole body which that head represented, with all its members. The church, in her vital union with Christ, who in regard to his Sonship and Headship descended from God out of the eternal heaven, and whose body descended from God out of the typical heaven, (for it is evident that the Lord sprang out of Judah) must also have proceeded from God out of heaven in both these respects; as having her origin in Christ as the beginning of the creation of God, and the First Born of every creature. "Prepared as a bride for her husband." When the friend of the bridegroom standing without rejoiced because of the bridegroom's voice, he was acting by divine authority in making ready a people prepared of the Lord; and these were the lost sheep of the house of Israel. These came to John's baptism from Judea, Jerusalem and the regions round about Jordan; consequently they came also out of the typical heaven which was then dissolving. At the development of this New Jerusalem, "A great voice out of heaven" proclaimed, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shell be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God. The tabernacle in the wilderness was evidently a figure of the gospel church, its formation strictly according to the pattern showed Moses in the mount; its use, its furniture, the ark, the mercy seat, the fruitful rod, the golden pot, the manna, the tables of the law, the cherubim of glory, the candlesticks, the shew bread, and all in any wise pertaining to that building was emblematic of the church which God ordained to develop as the anti-type of the tabernacle. "But Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands; that is to say, not of this building' Not of the typical tabernacle which was made with hands, but the real substance which the type referred to, and which was made without hands. Here the church of Christ is evidently brought to view as the tabernacle which God had pitched and not man, and emphatically called The Tabernacle of God. This church brought to view among the Gentiles was attended with the announcement that the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, &c.

And he that set upon the throne. Christ, who now sits upon his holy hill Zion. That king from whose presence the old heavens and earth fled away, said, "Behold I make all things new." The absolute production of anything by the immediate power and wisdom of God, without the 'least aid from men or angels, is properly a creation; and hence this divine development is called by the Psalmist a creation, and those to be developed as a people that should be created, whose spiritual creation was not in Adam, but in the Lord from heaven: for they are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath fore-ordained that they shall walk in them. Henceforth, therefore, "If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature; old things are passed away, and all things are become new."

It is not left with this new creation to say whether they will or will not praise the Lord, but it is positively decreed they shall praise the Lord. Hence all the provisions of grace are made by Jehovah, that they shall be to the praise of the glory of God.

THE NEW CREATION

(Concluded)

WE come now to offer some remarks on Isaiah lxv. 17-25, which is the next scripture in the order proposed for consideration. However clearly this portion of the scriptures may describe, to our more enlightened brethren, what they call the millennium, or one thousand years' personal reign of the Messiah, either before or after the conflagration of the earth, we are unable to perceive that these scriptures relate to any such period. To us these scriptures seem to speak of the dissolution of the legal or typical heavens, and the introduction, rise and progress of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. At the commencement of this chapter, Jehovah speaks of the calling of the Gentiles, a nation which were not called by his name as were the Jews, and a people that had not sought after him. He had spread out his hands all the day, (or throughout the dispensation of the old covenant,) to a rebellious people, to national Israel; a people that provoked him to anger continually, which remained among the graves, and lodged in the monuments. This was and is peculiarly the case with the carnal Jews. The graves where Ezekiel saw them in his vision of the dry bones, and lodge in the monuments, or legal rites, ordinances and ceremonies which were figurative of good things to come, but which are now abolished. The day of their retribution is announced; but "As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it; so, saith the Lord, 'will I do for my servants' sake, that I may not destroy them all. And I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob, and out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains; and mine elect shall inherit it, and my servants shall dwell there." This language appears to us to relate to the separation which took place when the Redeemer set up his kingdom. As the new wine is in the cluster, so God had a spiritual people in the family of Israel; and for what that nation contained it was preserved until the execution of the word of the Lord, until his seed was brought out of Jacob, and the Inheritor (Christ) was brought out of Judah; (for it is said that our Lord sprang out of Judah) then was the name of carnal Israel left for a curse, and the spiritual people called by another name, even a name which is better than that of sons or daughters. In connection with these declarations of our God, he says, "For behold I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind." Can a doubt remain that this new created heaven is the church of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that its constituent members embraced that seed which came out of Jacob, as a remnant according to the election of grace? In this new heaven, the Inheritor of God's mountain is the Sun and Fountain of all spiritual light, whose cheering rays are reflected through all the inferior lights with which he has bespangled the new heaven which he has made. The stars which he has marshaled, and whose revolutions he governs, are such as John saw in the right hand of One like unto the Son of man. The clouds that constitute this spiritual firmament are those that the prophet Zechariah said the Lord would make "bright clouds" in the time of the latter rains, and anti-typical of that cloud which led Israel through the wilderness, and those out of which his doctrine should distill as the dew, and come down as the rain; as the small rain upon the herb, and as showers upon the grass. "The former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind." The gospel church is in all respects distinct from the old Jewish order, so that those who inhabit the heavenly Jerusalem, come not unto the mount that might be touched; but unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the First Born, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than the blood of Abel. The former shall be erased from memory, completely abrogated, rolled together and laid aside.

"But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create, for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." This prediction was not applicable to that Jerusalem which was destroyed, and which was defined in the apostle's allegory as Hagar, the bond-woman, cast out, disowned, and not permitted to participate in the divine inheritance with the children of the free-woman. This spiritual heaven is not only the creation, but also the formation of our God: "This people have I formed for myself, they shall shew forth my praise." Time and space would fail us to notice particularly every expression in the prediction. This new heaven is the New Jerusalem, the holy city, the perfection of beauty out of which God has shined, and the inhabitants are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. By their offspring we are not, however, to understand their natural or fleshly offspring, but their spiritual children, such as Peter spake of in his discourse on the day of pentecost, saying, For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and unto all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call; or in other words, "The generation to come, and the people which shall be created."

The third and last passage on which we are requested to remark is Psalm cxxxix. 15, 16: "My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them." In this psalm we understand David to be a lively figure of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to personate him in connection with his mystical body, particularly in the text under consideration.

"My substance was not hid from thee." The substance of which David's natural body was composed, and all the members of his body were undoubtedly present to the omniscient eye of his Creator, before they were brought into development. But understanding, as we do, this figure to relate to the body of Christ, we derive still greater beauty and instruction from the passage. Substance is frequently spoken of in the scriptures meaning property, and certainly the seed of the blessed were his property. "The Lord's portion is his people, and Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." But in this case, by substance we are to understand that of which his body is composed; and it is expressly declared in the record of truth that the church is his body, and members in particular. In its application to the church of the Redeemer, this subject harmonizes with the general tenor of the word; for as it is here declared that his substance was not hid from God, when he was curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth, so it is declared that "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And if he knows them now, he always knew them, for there is no mutability in him. He knew them well when he created them in Christ Jesus before the world was made. He knew them when he chose them in him before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. He also knew them when he curiously wrought them, in their existence in Adam, or in the lowest parts of the earth. He knew them well when in their embryo state he saw them embodied in the family of ancient Israel, as the new wine in the cluster. Before this nation was born in one day; before John the Baptist came preaching in the wilderness; before the gospel kingdom was set up. Yet being unperfect. It was in embryo, but destined to perfection. Viewed as existing in the Adamic nature and under the law, degraded with pollution and sin, in the lowest parts of the earth; even in this state the eyes of God were upon his people.

"He saw them ruined in the fall,
Yet loved them notwithstanding all;
He saved them from their lost estate;
His loving kindness, O how great!"

"But God who is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace are ye saved,) and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus; that in the ages to come he might shew the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus." - Eph. ii. 4-7.

"And in thy book all my members were written." In the book of life, in the volume of God's decrees, in that book that was sealed, and on which there were none found worthy to look or able to open, until the Lion of the tribe of Judah appeared, who has broken the seals and disclosed the contents. "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me. In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, Lo, I come, (in the volume of the book it is written of me,) to do thy will, O God." - Heb. x. 5-7. What was written concerning Christ in God's book, was written in reference to his body, and that body was known in all its members, and all were written there. Nothing was left upon uncertainty, nothing was left to depend on contingencies or fortuitous events; all the members being definitely known, were accurately defined in the rec6rd of eternity.

Which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them. Not only did the fixed purpose and recorded decrees of God embrace all the election of grace as members of Christ's body, of his flesh and of his bones, but the precise fashion of that body was determined, the precise place which every member should occupy in the body. This was necessary to prevent confusion if all the members were an eye, where would be the hearing "and if all were an ear, where would be the seeing."

In the vision of the prophet, bone came to its bone, and in the development of that perfect body described in the eternal promise of Jehovah, the building is fitly framed together: "Holding the head, from which all the body by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God." - Col. ii. 19. As the pattern of the tabernacle was with God in the Mount, even so the form, connection, symmetry, and fashion of the church as the body of our Lord Jesus was in continuance with the Lord, when as yet no part of that church or body was brought forth into distinct church order. The harmony of such a body as that of the church of Christ required that its curiously wrought workmanship should be the result of infinite wisdom, and almighty power and grace. Were the members of the church of God thrown together, as the arminian doctrine of this world would represent, leaving men to put their powers in requisition, and by force or fraud to huddle together as many as they have power or art sufficient for, how confused would be the body, made up of such chance materials. But not so the perfect body of our adorable Redeemer. In continuance it was fashioned, and of that fashion, form and pattern, it must be, or it cannot answer the design of God.

We do not read that the fashion was commenced, but continued - implying that although in God's immutable mind there is no beginning; yet all his thoughts are firmly settled and unchangeably fixed, so that whatever is the result of his will, is and ever must be in continuance. No unforeseen events can possibly alter the purpose, or cause the Lord to forego his purpose, or in the very smallest degree to alter the arrangement of the plan or fashion of the body. Not even so much alteration can be admitted as to place one sinner in the situation which God designed for another, any more than we could have an eye placed in a perfect body, where a nose should be, or a hand where a foot should be. When the mother of Zebedee's children requested that her two sons should occupy some particular places in the body, she was informed that the arrangement was already and unchangeably made. It is not mine to give, said Jesus, but it shall be given to those for whom it is prepared of my Father. "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ; for by one spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles; whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit; for the body is not one member, but many; if the foot shall say, because I am not the head, I am not of the body, is it therefore not of the body? But now hath God set the members, every one of them in the body as it hath pleased him." - 1 Cor. xii. 19 16 and 18. If, therefore, every member of the church of God is set in the body of Christ, precisely as it hath (in the past tense, for in continuance this body was fashioned when as yet there was none of the members developed) pleased him, then nothing has been left for the members, the world, nor the devil to arrange; nor shall they be suffered to derange this body, by disposing of the gifts of God for him differently from his eternal design. It is his province, not ours, to set them. He does not require of us to make an ear of a hand, nor an arm of a leg, nor a foot of an eye, nor a minister of a deacon, nor a deacon of an apostle, nor an apostle of an elder, for he has set the members every one of them in the body as it hath pleased him.

Whether it has pleased us or not, is not the important thing; God's own pleasure has been consulted, and his counsel shall stand and he will do all his pleasure. "Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets, and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come into the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." - Ephesians iv. 8-13.

NEW SCHOOL COURTESY.

"But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for as concerning this sect, we know that everywhere it is spoken against." – Acts xxviii. 22.

As a specimen of the manner in which the apostolic Baptists are spoken of by all the harlot daughters, of her who sat upon the scarlet colored beast, (Rev. xvii. 3,) we present our readers with the following choice scrap from the puritanic columns of the New York Observer, by that paper credited to "Correspondence of New York Examiner:"

HARD-SHELL BAPTISTS IN GEORGIA. – In ecclesiastical matters the Baptists predominate. You will find their churches everywhere. There are, however, not a few irregular churches which call themselves Baptists, that are a disgrace and a reproach. The antimission element in them is strong, and their predestination ideas are awful. They practice feet washing which is an ordinance with them. Their church buildings are generally erected in the woods, and most commonly are without windows or doors. Their preachers are of the "wang-doodle" sort, and play on the "harp of a thousand strings." We call them "Hard-Shells." – Correspondence N. Y. Examiner.

The above squib having encountered the scrutiny of the Examiner and the observation of the official Observer, must express the sentiments and feelings of the popular religionists of our day towards the church of God which he has purchased with his own blood. It is seldom that we notice the ravings of these fanatics, but now while they are exulting in their late revival, their world-wide union, their unbounded love and charity, their "Evangelical Alliances," it may be worth our while to "show up" from their own journals, that while they with trumpet tongue proclaim their union and fellowship for almost everything else, their ranking venom remains unabated towards those who preach and practice only what is authorized by the King of Zion, and was preached and practiced by the apostles and primitive church of the Most High God.

Their extensive vocabulary of slurring epithets has been hard run to find sufficiently reproachful invectives by which to express the excessive hatred they feel toward that sect against which they can all unite in pouring out their most malignant contempt.

Should the reader inquire what there is in this hated sect that so excites all other religious sects as to draw down their united and consolidated maledictions, the answer may be found in the extract which we have copied from their papers. Let us attend for a moment to their complaints.

First. Our shells are too hard. The precise meaning of our learned and pious assailants by these terms, may require the aid of one of their theological dictionaries to define; but as our soul has not come into their secret, and as we have no access to their lexicons, we will only give what seems to us to be most probably intended. There is no other sect in Christendom against whom all other sects in all ages subsequently to the setting up of the kingdom of our Redeemer, have been so constantly at war, have fought so hard, and have so unitedly concentrated all their efforts and with so little success as against them. Doctor Mosheim in his Ecclesiastical History, was honored among them with a passing notice, as a sect against which all other religious sects had concentrated all their powers, but had failed to exterminate them; and their origin, the Doctor says, is lost in the remote depths of antiquity. Is it strange then that they should complain of our invincible shells? They have found it hard to "kick against the pricks." God has appointed salvation for walls and bulwarks. The gates of hell cannot prevail against this sect, for the God of Jeshurun rides upon the heavens in her help, and in his excellency on the sky. The eternal God is her refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms, and her enemies shall, by the decree of God, be found liars unto her, and she shall tread on their high places. Empires have arisen and fallen, thrones have sprung up and crumbled back to dust, ages have rolled on, generations have passed, and yet

"Bullwarks of mighty grace defend
The city where we dwell;
Her walls of strong salvation made,
Defy the assaults of hell."

We are not surprised then that in their stupid ignorance of Zion's impregnable battlements, her enemies should call her hard shelled. Their battering-rams can make no breach in her walls, nor can all their fawning, flattering seductions cause her to yield. Not one of her stakes shall ever be removed, nor shall one of her cords ever be broken.

"From age to age she has defied
The utmost rage of earth and hell."

But another complaint is that they are not a few. This is probably what troubles them more than the invincibility of their shells. All the Arminian workmongers have been long and confidently predicting and praying for their utter extinction, we could now refer to scores of predictions in which they have prophesied that in a few years all of them would be gone. One of their champions in this country predicted more than twenty-five years ago, in his public preaching, that he would live to preach the funeral sermon of the last one of them. But the poor infatuated man did not know how very short that sermon would have to be, even if he should live so long; for quicker than the lightning's flash the earth shall pass away when the last of that sect shall be called home to his mansion in the skies. "Now a few." Ah, that is the trouble! We have not numbered Israel, but from the statistics of our enemies a few years ago they reported upwards of twenty thousand of our order in Georgia, and we believe at this time there is nearer fifty thousand than twenty thousand of our order in that State, who have now bowed their knees to the missionary Baal, and nearly as man in several other of our southern and south-western States. This is truly appalling to our enemies. "Terrible as an army with banners."

"Irregular churches!" Wherein are they irregular? Because their shells are hard, and their enemies cannot soften them; or is it because they do not, cannot, will not, be reckoned with the nations? Irregular because they will not unite in the schemes of modern priestcraft, because they continue steadfast in the apostle's doctrine and fellowship, because they contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints? Irregular because they stand aloof from and have no fellowship for the numerous voluntary religions, unscriptural associations or societies for evangelizing the heathen and converting the world, making war against the Arminian mother and her whole brood of institutions?

There is an anti-mission element, too, which disturbs the enemy. But can the Examiner or the Observer tell us of any mission element of the apostolic church in the days of the apostles, that is not retained in that church which they denounce as hard shell, irregular, a disgrace, and a reproach? We know of none. In what respect are they a disgrace and a reproach? Are they immoral in their walk and deportment? Will the Examiner or Observer dare charge them with licentiousness, or that they are behind any other sect on earth for honesty, sobriety, Bible benevolence, and a strict conformity to the laws and institutions which Christ has given to his church? We have traveled in Georgia, and have there been told by disinterested citizens who disliked their doctrine, that there were none in that state whose credit stood so fair as that of the church which these papers would stigmatize as hard shells, irregular, &c.

"The anti-mission element in them is strong." So strong that all the carnal reasoning, flattery or frowning of the missionary stock-jobbers cannot overcome it; so strong when considered in connection with their "awful predestination ideas," that it is impossible to make them believe that the eternal destiny of untold millions of the human family hangs on the amount of dollars and dimes collected by the mission societies and mission agency of modern antichrist. If their predestination ideas could be shaken, and these hard shelled Baptists made to believe the doctrines of free will, free agency and human power; that salvation is of him that willeth and of him that runneth, and not of God who sheweth mercy; and that the new birth is of blood and of the will of the flesh, and of the will of man, and not of the will of God, then perhaps their shells might be softened, and become sufficiently mellow to allow them to turn away from the truth, and be turned unto fables.

"They practice feet washing." O horrible! Who would have thought it? In this nineteenth century, in which the fashionable religion of the world swaggers forth in golden slippers, that a sect could be found so antiquated in their faith and order as to believe the Bible doctrine of predestination, and even obey the precept and follow the example of the Son of God, in washing the saint's feet. But cannot these Georgia Baptist be enlightened on those subjects? Are their shells so adamantine that they cannot feel the force of the argument that predestination belonged to a former age, and that none but the poor, despised followers of the Nazarene, who do not count their own lives dear unto them, and who have no aspirations for the applause of the religious world, think of paying the least respect to the words of him who, when he had washed his disciples' feet, said, If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet?

And still another grievous fault is found in them: "Their church buildings are generally erected in the woods, and most commonly are without windows or doors." If these old "hard shells" had a little more ambition for show, would they not erect their church buildings with windows and doors, with towering domes and cloud-piercing spires, in the cities, villages and public places, so that they might stand at the corners of the street to pray where they might be seen of men?

In Georgia the meetings are generally very large; we have seen several thousand persons present at their stated monthly meetings, and for the benefit of shade for horses and mules, also for the accommodation of the immense congregations, who frequently are compelled to leave the house and resort to a preaching-stand in the grove, they have found the woods preferable to other localities for their meetings. But one thing the correspondent of the Examiner omitted to mention, which is the well known fact, that all other religious professors also usually erect their houses in the woods, and they, too, are many of them without windows or doors. Windows and doors are of but little utility in that warm climate where, if they had them, it would afford more comfort to the audience to have them open. We hope, under all the considerations, that the Old Hard Shell Baptists have not committed an unpardonable sin in erecting their meeting houses in the woods, or in failing to make them more costly and splendid. So far as we could learn, their houses were generally paid for honestly, and without so much begging, conniving and swindling as has characterized some of those who ridicule them.

Last, but not least, their preachers are not generally manufactured to order at theological schools; hence they are to be ridiculed as of "the wang-doodle sort." By the very classic term "wang-doodle" we presume is meant that the preachers of the Old Baptist order are not graduates from charity schools of divinity, but generally, like those in the primitive church, called and qualified by the great Head of the church, from the fishing boats, from the farm or work-shop, whose speech and whose preaching is not in the wisdom of this world which cometh to naught, that the faith of their hearers should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. "Wang-doodle," as their preaching may be in the uncircumcised ears of will-worshipers, God has chosen them to bring to naught the wisdom of this world. Their preaching of Christ crucified is foolishness to them that perish; a stumbling-block to the Jew, and "wang-doodle" or foolishness to the Greek; but unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, it is Christ, the power and wisdom of God.

"They play on the 'harp of a thousand strings.'" There may be more truth in this assertion than our revilers intended. If by the harp, the gospel of the grace of God be intended, God has made his ministers skillful musicians to touch the strings of that heavenly harp in a manner that has frequently awakened the liveliest sensations of joy in the hearts of all who know the joyful sound. The gospel of God our Savior has many strings, but they are all in the most perfect harmony, no discordant sounds, no jargon like that produced by the Babel-builders. In Revelations we are told that they who have the seal of God, have harps in their hands, and sing a new song which none but the sealed of God can learn, and the them of their song is, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints."

We have perhaps occupied too much time and space in noticing this little squib, but it is worthy of special observation that there is nothing charged in it upon the Old Order of Baptists but what will equally apply to the church of God in her primitive order, excepting, perhaps, the adjective "wang-doodle," and the place and manner of building their meeting houses. The churches of the saints were by the Jews and Pagans regarded as irregular Baptist churches. They stood aloof from and had no fellowship with the mission operations of the Jews who compassed sea and land to make proselytes. The predestination ideas of the apostles of the Lamb were considered awful by their adversaries. They washed the saints' feet, and their preachers were of the sort which are now classified by their opponents, "wang-doodle," and they played on the same harp with its numerous strings, which still fills the kingdom of Christ with the most heavenly melody.

NEW SCHOOL DOCTRINE.

It is some time since we have treated our readers to an exhibition of the progressive corruption of the New School Baptists. Now, lest our New School neighbors should charge us with neglect, and our readers should forget that there is a difference between truth and error, we have selected the three following articles from the "Cross and Journal," of Columbus, O., of December 4th 1846:

"ADVICE TO NEWLY ORDAINED CLERGYMEN.

"Make up your minds deliberately, if you mean to be faithful, to lead a life wherein hardy and venturous faith will be daily tested by calls to unflinching self-denial. Your one work is to win souls to Christ; not to produce a certain general decency and amendment in the face of society around you, but as God's instrument, and through the power of Christ's name, to work in living souls the mighty marvel of their true conversion. How painful soever be the thoughts which it excites, never lose sight of this truth, that your ministry has failed as to every soul entrusted to you who is not under it converted to the Lord, or built up in his holy faith. And such a work must be full of toil and self-denial. The strong man armed will not allow you to spoil his house, and be free the while from molestation. And he is ever ready with his assaults and craft; unless you slumber he will not seem to sleep. Reckon, then, first on opposition. And then secondly, remember that in all this you will have a real work to do. Let this thought be always with you. Go out to visit in your parish, not because you ought to spend so much time in visiting you people, but because they have souls, and have committed to you (feeble as you are) the task of saving them, in Christ's strength, from everlasting burnings. Be real with them, strike as one that would make a dent upon their shield of hardness, yea, and smite through it to their heart of hearts. When you preach be real. Set your people before you in their numbers, their wants, their dangers, their capacities; choose a subject, not to show yourself off, but to benefit them; and then speak straight to them, as you would beg your life, or counsel your son, or call your dearest friend from a burning house, in plain, strong, earnest words. Let your sermon be your own, made up of truths learned on your knees from your bible, in self-examination, amongst your people. And to make them such as this, spare no pains or trouble. Deal much in the great truths which the blessed God has taught us of himself; beware of always tarrying amongst the graves and corruption of our fallen, tempted state, but rise up to God and Christ and the Holy Ghost, and bear your flock with you there. To lead them for themselves indeed through the Spirit, to believe in the person of the Eternal Son, and so to stand before the Father, accepted in the Beloved, this is life eternal.

"TO A MOTHER.

"You have a child on your knee. Listen a moment. Do you know what that child is? It is an immortal being, destined to live forever! It is destined to be happy or miserable! You, the mother; you, who gave it birth, will be the instrument, in the hands of God, of good or ill to its soul. Its character is yet undecided, its destiny is placed in your hands. What shall it be? That child may be a liar; you can prevent it. It may be a thief; you can prevent it. It may be a murderer; you can prevent it. It may descend into the grave with only an evil memory behind and dread before; you can prevent it. Yes, you, the mother can prevent all these things. Will you, or will you not? Look at the innocent! Tell me again, will you save it?

Will you watch over it? Will you teach it? Warn it? Discipline it? Subdue it? Pray for it? Or will you, in the vain search of pleasure, or in the gaiety of fashion or of folly, or in the chase of some other bubble even in household cares, neglect the soul of your child, and leave the little immortal to take wing alone, exposed to evil, to temptation and everlasting ruin? Look again at the infant! Place your hand on its little heart. Shall that heart be deserted by its mother, to beat, perchance, in sorrow, disappointment, wretchedness and despair? Place your hand on its side, and feel that heart beat. How the blood is thrown through its little veins! Think of it; that heart, in its vigor now, is the emblem of a spirit whose ceaseless pulsations will be those of sorrow or joy forever. Go on and count off a century. In some place that spirit will be beating. You may change to meet it. Beats it then in sorrow! Oh, mother, I would not for the world suffer the agony you will feel, when you find your child ruined, desolated, destroyed, a wretch, and its spirit beating with a life that cannot cease!”

“JOY IN HEAVEN.

“My children, if you like to do good, to make the poor happy, and to comfort the afflicted; if you like to receive their warm thanks and blessings, and to see the tear of affection and thankfulness stand it their eye; then you love to help the missionary society. The blessing of them that are ready to perish comes upon the head of every little boy and girl who helps to send the gospel to the heathen. You cannot hear their thanks now; but if you meet them in heaven, they will thank you there. Mr. Scott, of Demarara, says that he once visited a very excellent negro woman on her dying bed. He took leave of her as though he never expected to see her more in this world. Just as he turned away, she made signs of wishing to say something else. He drew near her bed side, when, with her dying breath, she made the inquiry, ‘Whom shall I see in heaven?' He replied, 'Jesus, for he appears in the midst of the throne as a Lamb that has been slain.' 'Yes, yes; but who else shall I see?' Mr. Scott replied, 'All the good people of former ages are now in heaven; you will meet them.' But,as if not yet satisfied, she said, 'Shall I see any of the missionary society?' meaning the friends and supporters of the society. Mr. Scott said, 'Do you wish to see them?' 'Oh! yes, yes, Massa, and say 'Thank you for the gospel.' Dear young readers! How will you feel in heaven, when happy ransomed souls come near and say, 'Thank you, thank you for the gospel; you sent the gospel to me!' With a heart full of more love and joy than the heart can hold here, you will tune your harp afresh, and burst forth into a louder song; and the song will be, 'Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory.' – Miss. Rep."

The three articles copied above from the "Cross and Journal," afford incontestable evidence of the fearful apostacy of the New School Baptist, from whose organ these articles are copied, and of the truth of divine revelation, that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." The people who publish, patronize, and love to read and encourage their children and neighbors to read such sentiments as these extracts contain, claim to be Baptists, and think us unkind and destitute of charity because we cannot recognize them as Baptist of the primitive or apostolic order. They profess to hold the doctrine of predestination, election, and special and efficacious work of the Holy Ghost in quickening and regenerating the children of God. They also profess to hold that men in a state of nature are dead in trespasses and sin; and that salvation is of God, "not of works, lest any man should boast," and from these distinguishing sentiments of the primitive saints they declare that they have never swerved.

It is humiliating to the feelings of sensitive Baptists to see such doctrines as the New School seem to glory in, palmed on the world under the sanction of those who have usurped their name. Our object in calling attention to the corruption and blasphemy of their doctrines is not to raise against them a spirit of persecution, but of pity. As citizens of our great and mighty Republic, we would not abridge their privileges to think, decide, and act for themselves in matters of religion, and the same rights which we would award to them we would also grant to Roman Catholics and Mormons, and all other denominations of professed worshipers, so long as their free enjoyment of such rights as citizens shall not invade or infringe the equal rights of all other citizens of our country. We do not say, however, that in holding such sentiments as they publish, and yet claiming our name, they do us no injustice, or that they do not invade our rights; but our God will judge them.

Who will undertake the task to reconcile the doctrines contained in these three articles, with the confession of faith to which they have set their hands?

We will not weary our readers with a lengthy examination of the doctrinal corruption of these extracts; such a service is not called for, as we have none among the Old School Baptists, not even babes in Christ, that cannot readily detect the heresy which is so glaringly displayed. A few of the more prominent outrages upon the Spirit of truth we will notice.

First,  The “advise to ordained clergymen.” This description of bloated humanity did not exist among the Baptists in the apostolic age, and in subsequent centuries it was originated and held for ages exclusively in the church of Rome. The daughters of the Romish “beast” found it convenient to dignify their preachers by such titles as Reverends, Clergy, Doctors of Divinity, &c., and to degrade their members as laymen; but this aristocratic distinction has never, until comparatively modern times, found its way among professed Baptists, and never into the church of God, for no unclean thing can enter there. But the New School Baptists claim now to have clergymen, and we know not but their claim is as valid as that of any other branch of modern anti-christ. Their work, as set forth in the article of "advice," is "To win souls for Christ." they have not to feed the flock of God; for the sheep know not the voice of strangers. Not to preach Christ and him crucified; to the Jews a stumbling block, and to the Greeks foolishness; for they are unacquainted themselves with that kind of preaching, and they are of the number of those who themselves stumble at the word, being disobedient, whereunto also they were appointed. They are not to regard the word or Spirit of God as their oracle, but receive advice from the wise men of this world. Instead of preaching as did the apostles, that there is salvation in none but Christ, New School clergymen are to assume that every soul in their respective parishes is committed to them to save, "in Christ's strength from everlasting burnings." This they are themselves to believe, and this they are to try to make their parishioners believe, and they are advised to act upon this principle. If this task is committed to clergymen, we demand by whom was it committed, and when, and where? But enough of this.

Second, The address "To a Mother." With one breath the young clergyman is represented as having the task of saving every soul in his parish; the work committed to him exclusively, to convert them, to save them, and finally to "rise up to God, and Christ, and the Holy Ghost, and bear their flocks with them." To convert and save them, and finally take them to heaven, is in the first lesson made exclusively the task of the clergyman, and in the next breath the same work is tasked upon the mother of every child. Now this is a riddle which would require the erudition of a college-bred clergyman to unravel, how the clergyman can be exclusively the savior of every soul in his parish, and yet that every mother is required to save her own children! “O consistency,” &c. Now, if the mother can prevent her child from being a liar, a thief, and a murderer, and from going to its grave with only an evil memory behind, and dread before; if the destiny of every soul is placed in the hands of mothers, what has Christ, or his blood, or his righteousness, or the Holy Spirit’s quickening work to do with salvation of men? Can we possibly believe such doctrine without rejecting the whole testimony of the scriptures? Can we so reject the testimony of the scriptures without becoming infidels? If not, are not all who teach such doctrine, whether New School Baptists or others, infidels? We leave our readers to form their own conclusions.

Third. The third article shows what kind of a heaven the arminians are looking for. According to their description of it, it is a place where little boys and girls are to receive “thank you” for the pennies they have given to missionaries! This, reader, is New School Baptist doctrine. The poor black woman, with all the religion that the missionary Scott cold give her, and all the penny-worths of gospel that little boys and girls had sent her, could not die in peace, anticipating only the pleasure of seeing Jesus there, exalted upon the throne, and meeting the innumerable company of all his redeemed there, the missionary bears witness that she seemed to be “not yet satisfied.” She could not die in peace until assured by her false guide that she could meet in heaven the greater object of her solicitude and of her gratitude, and have an opportunity to bestow her thanksgiving on those whom she was taught to believe were more justly entitled to it than Christ. If such be the heaven anticipated by arminians, missionaries, and New School Baptists, how thankful ought all christian people to be that God has laid up in store for them a better inheritance; that while the poor deceived Ethiopian converts to missionism expect to be employed in looking up the boys and girls who gave them the gospel by the penny-worths, they shall be employed in immortal anthems of praise unto God and the Lamb for ever and ever. And then shall they be satisfied, and completely satisfied, when they awake with his likeness.

Little boys and girls may be induced to tease their parents for pennies to lavish upon the insatiable avarice of greedy missionaries, but that the joys of heaven are to be measured out by the penny-worths, and heathen converts there employed in thanking such saviors for the gospel, out-Romes Rome itself.

NEW SCHOOLISM AT THE WEST.

MR. J. M. PECK, one of the editors of the Banner and Pioneer, is engaged in inflicting on the readers of that print a series of articles, in which his professed object is to show the rise and progress of the mission cause in the Western States, particularly in Illinois. His object seems to be twofold; first, to show what a mighty champion he has been in the cause of New Schoolism in that part of the country, and. thus vindicate himself from the implications cast on him by the no less ambitious missionists who have somewhat eclipsed. him by pitching their tents in that land, and offering some improvements to his earlier plans of operation. The other object is evidently to repeat his oft reiterated complaints. against the Old School Baptists of the West.

By his own showing, Mr. Peck, when he first visited Illinois, found the churches all settled on the old ground. Not a solitary New School Association among them; and as soon as he and his colleague began to insinuate their new doctrines, the Illinois and Sangamon Associations passed resolutions, disfellowshiping the whole missionary craft.

Mr. Peck admits, or rather appears to boast, that for some years he was the only Baptist missionary in. that country. Happy would it have been for the church if thus it had remained; but such was not to be the case. Missionaries have been subsequently poured in upon them, until the churches have, suffered the most severe afflictions in consequence of their multiplicity.

We have no thought, at present, of attempting a general review of Mr Peck’s essays; the game would not pay for the ammunition. We only wish to notice that “the legs of the lame are not equal," as we have been often noticed in the Banner and Pioneer as a new sect, as a New Test party, and our claim to the distinction of Old School Baptists frequently disputed. We show from his own pen that what the Old School Baptists of the West are now is what he found them to be when he first intruded himself upon them. For some years, he says, he was the only Baptist missionary in the country, We believe this to be a fact. Again he says, "At that time there was not a Bible Society in Illinois." One Missionary Society had been organized in 1818, but became defunct in 1820.

From these statements from his own pen, if we had no other testimony on the subject, we perceive that until he troubled Israel in those parts, there were no missionaries nor Mission Societies, Bible Societies, nor anything of the kind, known among the Baptists in that country. The Lord in his providence paralyzing his efforts by sickness, the churches had rest until 1823. For he says, "In December, 1823, he fitted up a French cart and horse, as the most convenient and least expensive vehicle his circumstances permitted; provided a box for a seat, and obtained from the Missouri Bible Society a quantity of bibles and testaments, and from his own stores and those of the late Rev. Mr. Giddings, then a Presbyterian minister of St. Louis, a large quantity of missionary pamphlets, reports, tracts, &c. With this armament he started," and, as he shows, was not unsuccessful in scattering alarm, discord and division among the Old School Baptists of that country.

How very different this sort of armament must have looked from that which the Baptists of that country had been used to - the whole armor of righteousness, recommended by the apostle Paul. Eph. vi. 13-18. How contemptible must his French cart, missionary reports and tracts, with his Pandora box mounted, have looked to those who acknowledged no other armament for the soldiers of Jesus than truth for a girdle, righteousness for a breastplate, the preparation of the gospel of peace for shoes, faith for a shield, salvation for an helmet, and for a sword, the word of God. How ridiculous has Mr. Peck shown the pretensions of himself and party to be in claiming the classification of Old School.

NEW SCHOOL LETTER.

THE following letter from a New School Baptist in Virginia, may serve as a specimen of the spirit, as well as doctrinal orthodoxy, depth of thought, and knowledge of scripture, characteristic of many of those with whom we have to do. Mr. Newly is probably a disciple of the famous Wm. F. Broadus; and, for his information, we will assure him that we are not hostile to the truth of Jesus; but we find great discrepancy between truth of that high character, and the pretended truths of Newly.

We would gladly express some gratitude to our sapient informant, for his assurance that we are mistaken in thinking ourself persecuted by the New School, were it not for our scepticism in regard to the truth of his assertion - he may be mistaken. As to the implied charge of our having the spirit of the apostles when they erred, we shall only say, that we wish no harm to any one of the human family; and have uniformly disclaimed the idea of defending our faith by any other instrumentality than that of “The sword of the Lord and of Gideon;” or in other words, by those weapons which are not carnal, but spiritual, and mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds. The apparent paradox in the doctrine published by the great apostle to the Gentiles, is perfect harmony to the Old School of our Lord Jesus Christ; to them it is by no means hard to conceive, that although Paul, and all the election of grace, were chosen in Christ before the world began, that in the gathering together in one, all that are in him, some are baptized into his mystical body earlier than others are.

As to the other passages referred to, we have seen them before; and we believe if Mr. N. should ever be blessed with a ray of light from above, he will be willing to quote the scriptures as they read, and no longer wish, by disjointing, perverting, misapplying, and confounding different subjects together, to darken counsel by words without knowledge, or to handle the word of God deceitfully. True, the Great Captain of our salvation by the grace of God - not by the works of men, tasted death for every man, or son; “For it became him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through suffering.” Is Christ the captain of the salvation of those who are finally damned? If not, every man here spoken of has exclusive reference to the sons.

That our Lord Jesus is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, shows that his propitiatory sacrifice was not confined to the Jews, but embrace them which are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call. We conclude that if the labors of Paul had been applied to our correspondent, his efforts would have been salutary in saving him from his arminian delusion. We are acquainted with the words spoken by Paul at Mars’ Hill; but the words connected therewith, appear to be a kind of appendix by our correspondent, for his own convenience; as we have never met with any thing of the kind in the scriptures of truth. We were never before in possession of the fact, that the tower of Silome fell upon those who did not repent. Our Lord has told us that it was not because they were sinners above others; but Mr. N. is of a different opinion, it would seem.

The next quotation: “Jesus told the people to repent and come to him for life.” We would thank our friend to inform us when and where Jesus spake these words. The balance of the quotations show for themselves a lamentable want of bible knowledge. It is true, like the pharisees of whom Paul bore record, he has plenty of zeal; but not according to knowledge. Had Mr. N. closed his epistle without attempting to support New Schoolism by the scriptures, his letter would have been passed by in silence; but oar opponents so rarely attempt to sustain their dogmas by the scriptures, we have considered the present worthy of some special attention.

Newley's Cross Roads, Dec. 31,1835.

SIR: - It becomes my duty, having the distribution of the Rock Mill mails, to say to you, that there is no such man as Wm. B. Jones, he having gone home some time since. As I have given the “Signs of the Times” a passing notice, and. knowing what you believe, as also all the Old School in this quarter, so called, and professing myself to be a Baptist, I will trouble you with a few texts, which may be of service, if you are not hostile to the truths of Jesus. Before I quote them, I beg leave to remark, that you suppose yourself persecuted by the New School Baptists; which is not so; you persecute yourself, by not preaching as Jesus and his apostles preached; and you are railing at those who are the true-followers of Jesus - the Baptist people - for I never did believe any were true, but those baptized by immersion. But have you not the spirit of those apostles who were willing to call fire from heaven, as Elias did, and consume a multitude and for which they received a strong rebuke from Jesus? Any man would believe that Paul was chosen in Christ before the world began, according to his writings to the Ephesians; but in another book Paul says, Aquila and Andronicus was in Christ before he was. Christ tasted death for every man, and is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world. And Paul says, there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; and he further adds, that he had labored more than all the apostles, that he might save some. Paul says, that God commandeth all men everywhere to repent, and if they do not repent, they must be damned. The tower of Siloam fell upon those who did not repent. Jesus told the people to repent and come to him for life. He also says, If any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.

I fear preachers will have trouble upon trouble, who preach not the whole gospel, and read it as it is written; but must see, and clearly see a chance for salvation through Christ, unless he has committed the unpardonable sin. God loves mankind - and if he did not love them he would not afford them life; for in him we both live and have our being. Man was made after his image, and is blessed above all his creatures. And Paul says, Christ is in all, except we are reprobates. We are also told, that no man speaking by the Holy Ghost, calleth Jesus accursed. I have heard hundreds. say our Savior, who had never made a profession of religion, but was really good men. I have gone perhaps further than my limits permit, and with such stuff as you are not willing to believe, although it is the truth. I want Old School and New School Baptists to be one people.

Yours, with respect,
POLLARD NEWLEY.

NEW SCHOOL THEOLOGY.

AN obituary published in the last number of the Christian Index, (so called) after stating that the deceased little girl, (aged about 10 years) was "in a course of discipline to become an early follower of the blessed Jesus," says: "Only a few hours before her death she desired that her little stock of money should be devoted to the missionary cause, thus casting all that she had into the Lord's treasury. Blessed legacy! May the news of its glorious effects be conveyed to her in that paradise above by the heathen redeemed (under heaven) through its influence."

REMARKS.

THAT widows' houses should be plundered, silly women led captive, laden with iniquity, the example of the unnatural wretch that boasted of withholding a house and home from his wife and children, and his conclusion to neglect the body (as he termed his brutal course) rather than the soul, and to contribute fifty dollars per annum to the popular institutions, (as mentioned in our 16th number,) should be lauded as an example worthy the imitation of christians by the American Baptist Mission Society; and that even the death-bed of little girls and boys should be haunted by these ravening wolves in human form, does not constitute all our objections to the benevolence (what a burlesque on the name!) of the New School. That on which we animadvert is, that persons claiming the Baptist name should be recognized as such while teaching the doctrines embraced in these extracts, viz:

1. That the child mentioned in the obituary was in a course of discipline .to become an early follower of the blessed Jesus; as though according to the Popish or Pedo-Baptist notion, we could train our children mechanically for heaven, without grace.

2. That the ill-gotten plunder clandestinely taken from the poor deluded, dying child, will redeem some from hell, for whom the blood and righteousness of Christ had failed to secure salvation.

3. That through the modern missionary humbug a way of communicating the affairs of earth to heaven is really brought into requisition.

4. That the harmony of heaven is frequently arrested by the arrival of heathens, redeemed by money, ascribing salvation to their golden idols, or to any other object than to. the abounding grace of God unto the chief of sinners, and consequently,

5. The introduction into heaven, and into the presence of a thrice holy God, whose glory he will not give to another, nor his praise to graven images, a system of downright idolatry, in direct terms blasphemously contradicting the express declaration of God himself, that he is the only Savior.

6. The evident bearing which this doctrine is designed to. have upon the weak, the ignorant and the dying, that the little gaudy effects which death is about to remove them from will not only serve as a peace offering to secure the divine favor for themselves, but that they possess a kind of super-rogatory virtue, sufficient to save others who, in the absence of it, would be eternally lost.

In the letter copied from the Watchman into our sixteenth number, with the introductory enconium by the Board of the American Baptist Mission Society, and the editorial puff, on which we were prevented from remarking at large, for want of room, we have the true spirit of the modern mission mania flowing from its very fountain. The Board of the great national institution, glorying in what should be their shame, furnished the letter to the Watchman, desiring its publication, because it exhibited so much of what they understand to be the spirit of the gospel, and in the hope that others may cherish the same spirit, and go and do likewise, viz: rob their families, and place that which a bountiful providence has furnished for the comfort of their wives and helpless children into their pious hands. Our object in again calling this subject up is to impress upon the minds of our readers what the Board of the American Baptist Mission Society profess to believe is the true Spirit of the gospel. Who would not hire missionaries to go to the ends of the earth to preach to the poor heathen that the true spirit of the gospel requires of them to neglect their wives and children, and give what they are now wasting in providing house and home and sustenance for their families to the mission institutions?

The editorial puff by the conductor of the Watchman deserves a passing remark. He says that a revival of religion has been recently enjoyed at the place where the letter was Written, and prays that the genuineness of all the revivals from which we hear may be evinced by equally precious fruits, (money.) What delicious fruits are these - twenty dollars, and a threat to rob his wife and two small children of thirty dollars more during the current year!

We see, as we have often seen before, that the spirit of the gospel, in their estimation, is the spirit that will give them money; the spirit that will rob one's family, break asunder the sacred ties of conjugal obligation, that will make the husband neglect his wife, parents neglect their offspring, and make a man worse than infidel. (See 1 Tim. v. 8.) Yea., the spirit that would arrest the clammy hand of death itself to grasp a few pence which a dying child may be about to leave. Such a spirit, better suited to the character of the imps of hell, than to be coupled with the sacred name of the christian religion, is deemed by the New School Baptists productive of genuine revivals of religion, of the salvation of the heathen, and able to open a mail-route to the world of glory, to carry intelligence to departed spirits of what is on earth resulting from the idols which they in their lifetime have set up. May the Lord in mercy deliver us from such delusions, for ever and ever. Amen.

NOT BY SUCCESSION BUT BY WHO ARE CALLED

Since the apostles of the Lamb have finished their course with us in the flesh, no history of the church of God should be allowed to lure us from the doctrine which they taught, the judgments they recorded, the ordinances they have enjoined; nothing is to be added nor aught diminished from the perfect standard of faith and order they established, which is confirmed by all the valid authority of earth and heaven. What they have bound on earth is bound in heaven, and what they have loosed on earth is loosed in heaven. The question with us now is not or should not be: What was believed or practiced in the church one hundred or a thousand years ago, but rather, what was the faith which was once delivered to the saints? We are not now to ask: Are our ministers by succession of ordination, through the dark ages of papal abominations – traceable to the apostles? But rather let it be asked: Are they such men as the Holy Ghost commanded the church to separate to the work whereunto He had called them?

OLD FASHIONED BAPTISTS.

MR. AMOS SNELL, a writer in the Christian (so called) Secretary, of Hartford, Connecticut, in explanation of the above phrase, which it seems he had previously used in a communication to that paper, writes as follows:

"Although there may be people that endeavor to maintain sentiments that are unscriptural, and still claim to be the Old School, or old fashioned stamp in distinction from others, there is justice in their claim only so far as they have been of long standing, and without change. Yet I think them not old-fashioned gospel Baptists; for an unscriptural sentiment or practice never helps to make a scriptural person or denomination, notwithstanding a paper to support their cause may be sustained by 1600 subscribers, and the devil may have a hand in it, yet this does not alter the case. What I understand by an old fashioned gospel Baptist is, to believe what primitive christians believed, and practice what they practiced, as it respects an exhibition of sentiment; in other words, to obey the commands of God, and practice the ordinances of the gospel according to their design. I suppose a Baptist is to be known as such when his sentiments and practice agree with the bible; then if this is indefinite, the commands and precepts of the bible are altogether ambiguous; and I believe every consistent or old fashioned gospel Baptist will feel a deep interest in the circulation of the bible, and as they love to sit under the sound of the gospel, and have their children and friends enjoy the same, acting from a fixed principle at heart, they will endeavor to do all in their power that can consistently be done, that their fellow men may enjoy the same privilege, and sustain the cause of missions by their alms and prayers, looking into the old fashioned bible for this rule: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." It would be a natural consequence for such a Baptist to be perseveringly engaged in the temperance cause, for Paul, that I consider one of them, reasoned on temperance, and our guide, the bible, says, “Be temperate;” in short, be diligent in every scriptural benevolent operation of the present day, without covetousness, and not in any case give half-way fellowship to the unfruitful works of darkness, or the unscriptural inventions of men, in theory or practice. You spoke of new fashioned Baptists as though my remarks implied there were such. I think in some respects we have reason to fear there are such, and even in New England. The Baptists, or the sentiments of such as I have endeavored to describe, I think surpass in age the western or southern school sentiment, the exhibition of which originated in the wilderness of Judea and in Jordan’s stream, in some of its parts, and the rest not long after at the time the first Baptist that I have ever heard of commenced his public labors, more than eighteen hundred years ago. For this reason I have supposed such to be the most consistently entitled to the name of Old Fashioned Gospel Baptists.

“Yours in christian lore,
“AMOS SNELL.”

REMARKS.

WE have not the means of knowing on whom Mr. Snell intended to bestow the application of this sentence; but as we are not aware of any set of Old School Baptists in the United States except that in which our name is enrolled, who have taken a stand against the corruptions in doctrine and in the practice of those who “say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie, and are the synagogue of Satan,” we are led to the conclusion that we are the “sect which is everywhere spoken against;” and on this conclusion we will venture so far to correct the statement that it may at any rate give a more correct idea of who we esteem to be the Old School Baptists.

And first, he represents them as endeavoring to maintain sentiments that are unscriptural. Mr. Snell has not condescended to tell us ‘what unscriptural sentiment the Old School Baptists undertake to maintain, but like all others who have attempted to slander us, has thrown out the insinuation in a way calculated to make a false impression on the mind of the public, and then dodge behind the ambiguity of his own language, if called on to substantiate his insinuations, by saying, I did not say there were, but that there might be such a people. This is certainly the most contemptible and cowardly method of attacking the character or standing of any individual or class of men ever practiced among the fallen sons of Adam. We, however, challenge Mr. Snell, or Canfield, or any other writer or editor, to point out one or more unscriptural sentiment held by the Old School Baptists. We do not say that we are free from error, but we have a right when charged with error to demand of our accusers to show by the word of God wherein we err. We wish to be understood that being accused of attempting to maintain unscriptural sentiments, we do hereby challenge all the writers and editors in the United States to show by the bible any one or more sentiments held or advocated by the Old School Baptists which are unscriptural. If this challenge is not promptly met by our opponents, the reason why cannot be disguised.

But let the scene be reversed. Let the New School demand of us to point out by the bible wherein they are unscriptural in doctrine and practice, and we will meet them promptly, with bible in hand. “In meekness instruct those who oppose themselves, if peradventure God may give them repentance to acknowledge the truth.” Amos Snell is right in regard to our claiming to be of the Old School or Old Fashioned stamp, in distinction from others; and we also admit that there is justice in the claim so far only as this school has been of long standing, and the sentiments and practices by which it is distinguished without change. Hence it is that we reject from our fellowship in doctrine and in practices every sentiment and ordinance which has not been of at least eighteen hundred years standing; and on this ground prefer to bear the jeers, insults, ridicule, slander and persecution of the advocates of the new order, rather than to relinquish one point of the primitive faith delivered to the saints, or originally established in the gospel church, or admit into our faith or practice aught that is not fully warranted in the New Testament. He adds, "Yet I think them not old fashioned gospel Baptists," &c.

Passing the thoughts of Mr. Snell, we agree that unscriptural doctrine, unscriptural practices, with sixteen hundred, or as many thousand patrons, with the devil in the bargain, can never make a scriptural person or denomination; for if it would, it would follow of course that the New School party laden as they are with their unscriptural doctrines and practices, including all the mass of inventions planned and brought forward by men and devils, against which the Old School from the days of John the Baptist have uniformly contended, would have to be recognized by us a scriptural body. . But Amos Snell further states that what he understands to be an old fashioned gospel Baptist is, to believe what primitive christians believed, &c. To this we say amen; this is the very thing for which we contend, and for which we suffer the loss of all things. But will Amos Snell consent to be tried by this standard? He says that he supposes a Baptist to be known as such when his sentiments and practice agree with the bible, and so say we. Let us then come up to this rule, compare our faith and practice with the bible, and see according to the supposition of Amos who is on the Lord's side, and first let the Old School Baptists be weighed in this balance of the sanctuary. They reject all the popular schemes of the day, because they can find no bible authority for them. They endeavor to walk in all the ordinances of the gospel, as did the primitive saints, and being sensible of their shortcomings through the weakness of the flesh, they call on all who profess to know and fear God, to show them if in any particular they err, that they may abandon their error. Thus stands the case of the Old School Baptists. Now let our friend Amos get into the scale, let him be measured by the divine rule, let his own statement be compared with the bible, and the discrepance will appear.

He speaks for himself and says, "I believe every consistent or old fashioned Baptist will feed a deep interest in the circulation of the bible, and as they sit under the sound of the gospel, and have their children and friends enjoying the same privilege, and sustain the cause of missions by their alms and prayers." So much then for Mr. Amos Snell's belief or faith. But from whence has he received it? On what is it founded? Not one word of bible from Genesis to Revelation to support a single item of this popular creed. Hence we adopt the language of Moses and say, "Their rock is not as our Rock, our enemies themselves being judges." But hark! Amos invites us to look into the old fashioned bible for a rule. Rule for what? Why what he has just stated above: the patronizing of Bible Societies, and missionary operations of his creed. Well, let us hear what his scriptural rule says. Here it comes. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Now for the question: How does this rule and the above statement of Amos' belief compare? The rule commands one thing, and the faith of Amos embraces another and quite different. Hence we may say to Amos, as Daniel read to the king of Babylon, "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." But bear with us, Amos, If we tax your patience a little. it is so seldom that our opponents quote scripture to us, that we feel disposed to bestow on this text more than a passing remark.

1. By whom were these words spoken? By the Great Head of the church, to whose hands all power in heaven and on earth was committed.

2. Unto whom were these words addressed? Not to all the world, nor to all the church, but to the apostles of the Lamb.

3. Did the apostles and primitive preachers of the gospel understand and obey this command of our Lord Jesus Christ? They certainly did.

4. In obeying this command of Christ, did the apostle and primitive preachers of the gospel organize Theological Colleges, Seminaries or Schools? Did they spend three, six, or more years, after receiving this commission, to prepare themselves for the ministry? Did they form or patronize Bible Societies, Tract Societies, Sabbath School Unions, temperance or any other societies other than the church of the living God? They did not.

5. Were they hired by or dependent on Missionary Societies composed of professors of christianity, and unregenerate men and women? Not at all; freely they received and freely they dispensed the gospel.

6. If then the primitive preachers of the gospel understood and obeyed all that Christ commanded in this text, without going into any of the above measures, which are so popular in this day, we ask again, How far does this text go to prove the position assumed by Amos Snell, and with him all the New Light Baptists of our country? Indeed it is so far from sustaining their schemes, that it proves them to be uncalled for and unscriptural, and consequently anti-christian.

We have already extended our remarks as far as we shall be able to insert in the present number. We therefore leave the subject to the consideration of our brethren, believing that all who fear God and tremble at his word, will examine for themselves.

OLD HERESY IN A NEW DRESS.

THE heresy to which we have had occasion to allude on a former occasion appears to be gaining among the new orders of religionists in these parts, and probably elsewhere. The outlines of the theory are, 1st, that the death of Christ has removed, or taken away all sin from the whole human family, so that no son or daughter of Adam can be damned for being a sinner.

2d. That God now requires every human being to believe the above article on pain of damnation.

3d. That the long cherished doctrine of a necessity of a change of heart, a certain exercise of mind, &c., (what we commonly call christian experience) is a deception of Satan, designed to cheat men out of their souls. And that the mental powers of men in their natural state are fully competent to exercise the faith of the gospel, and believe to the saving of their souls; that those who wait for God to do anything more to prepare them for the exercise of spiritual things will wait in rain, and be finally damned for refusing to believe.

The above are the general outlines of the new-fangled theory, subject to such modulations and variations as the exigencies of times and circumstances may require. We have ourself heard the substance of the above boldly asserted in a public assembly, by a man professing to be a minister of Jesus Christ.

OLD LAWS OF VIRGINIA.

THE following are extracted from an old collection of the laws of Virginia. They appear to have been in force as late as the year 1773, in which year the "Collection was published" at Williamsburg. The first Act in the book provides for the erection of a church or chapel of ease in every parish.

"Chapter III. An Act against persons that refuse to have their children baptized.

"Whereas many schismatical persons, either out of averseness to the orthodox established religion, or out of the new fangled conceits of their own heretical invention, refuse to have their children baptized;

"Be it therefore enacted by the present General Assembly and authority thereof, That all and every person or persons, that in contempt of the divine sacrament of baptism, shall refuse, when they may carry his or their child or children to a lawful minister in that county where he or they dwell, to have them baptized, shall be amerced two thousand pounds of tobacco, half to the parish and half to the informer." – Southern Literary Messenger.

THE OLD SCHOOL BAPTISTS' COMPLETE COMPENDIUM.

We have recently received letters of enquiry from brethren in various parts, asking information concerning a work said to bear the above title, published in Portland, Maine.

A circular has been sent to many of our Old School Baptist brethren, setting forth that this is "an invaluable book, and every Old School Baptist should have it."

As we have no knowledge of either the book or its publishers, we are inclined to think the whole thing is a "Yankee Trick." We know of but two or three persons in the city of Portland, that we recognize as Old School Baptists, neither of whom are publishers. From the fact that the author of the circular has not sent us a copy of his work to examine, nor of his circular, but has sent them broadcast to such of our subscribers as have given their names and address through the "Signs," we presume it was not intended to give notice of the imposition until too late to prevent the hoax. The recommendation of the work by the "Methodist Evangelist," and the so called "Christian. Observer," is strong presumptive evidence that the work is not designed for the approval of our order of Old School or Primitive Baptists.

THE OLD SCHOOL DEFINED

FORASMUCH as we have discovered in this city, and elsewhere, a spirit of inquiry into the reason of our being distinguished by the above cognomen, we esteem it not only our duty, but also our privilege, to define our use of the terms; and in doing which, we will briefly state what we conceive to be the real difference between the Old School Baptists and the New School. Before we enter upon the definition proposed, we will notice negatively a few things which we do not intend by the term.

First. We do not intend to convey the idea that we advocate any system of mere scholastic divinity whatever.
Second. Nor do we wish to be understood that from the poverty of bible language we are driven to the necessity of coining words with which to distinguish ourselves from others, as it is only in consequence of the general perversion of the language of the sacred scriptures by nominal professors, that it becomes necessary for us to submit to such names as the scriptures do not furnish, in order to be known in distinction from those who have stolen the livery of primitive saints to serve their own masters in.
Third. We do not by our use of the term design to be understood as dissenting from the ground which has been occupied by the Regular Baptists from the days of John the Baptist until the present time, but the very opposite, to wit; that we are precisely what all orderly disciples have been in all ages of the gospel dispensation.

With these brief preliminary remarks, we will proceed to our explanation. The time has been, gentle reader, when the name of a Baptist was an index to the character, faith and practice, of those who bore it; but that, alas! is no longer the case. We have lived to see the day so long predicted by the apostles of the lamb, in which many should depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, and by reason of whom the way of truth should be evil spoken of; and in the dreadful apostasy, it has become a matter of no inconsiderable difficulty to know by the profession of a man what he does in reality believe.

At the present moment we have among us, bearing the Baptist name, those who hold nearly every sentiment which has been esteemed heterodox and corrupt by the Baptists of past ages - Baptists who, like the idol gods of which we read, have come newly up. Witness the Seven-day Baptists, the Free-will Baptists, the General or Open-communion Baptists, the General-atonement Baptists, the Fullerite Baptist, the Campbellite Baptists, with many other kinds, whose sentiments are as discordant and confused as that of their more ancient brethren, the builders of Babel. The above classes, with but very few exceptions, all are united in regard to the popular system of modern benevolence, however much they may differ on other subjects, there are at least some popular idols at whose shrine they can unitedly prostrate themselves. Nor are there many points in doctrine, or in practice, by which the Primitive Baptists have been distinguished, which some of the above named classes do not openly oppose. And hence it is that we who cannot conscientiously depart from the faith of the gospel, and the order of the Lord's house, are compelled to draw the line of demarcation between them and ourselves; and as we can no longer be known in distinction from them by the e simple unqualified name of Baptists, rather than to appear amalgamated with them, we are content to be known as Old School Baptists.

The time and circumstances connected with the appending of this discriminating qualification to our name as Baptists, were these: After the missionary phrenzy had broken out among the Baptists, and the poisonous infection, like an epidemic, had spread itself throughout our churches, and when those laboring under the dire contagion turned away from the word of the Lord, (as their rule of faith and practice) and were turned to fables, those who had remained steadfast in the apostles' doctrine, and had not yielded to the winds of doctrine which had blown tempests of fire-brands, arrows and death among our churches, published a circular to all old-fashioned Baptists n the United States, to convene with the Baptist Church at Black Rock, MD., to take into consideration the trying state of Zion, and to encourage each other in maintaining that form of sound words and practice handed down to us by the grad Head of the church and his apostles, in opposition to the new schemes and inventions of the day, which, like the flood which the dragon poured forth, seemed to be calculated to carry away the woman (church) which had brought forth the man-child who was to rule the nations with a rod of iron. At the time and place appointed, the chosen tribes went up, the old veterans of the cross assembled - not to organize a convention for legislative purposes, nor to constitute themselves a standing body, in distinction from the church of God, but to worship god, to unite in solemn prayer to God, in behalf of his afflicted Zion, and to take sweet counsel together; and having met, a free interchange of sentiment was obtained, which happily resulted in a unanimous resolution to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, and not to be entangled with the yoke of bondage which was then being applied to the neck of thousands who had once ranked with Regular Baptists. On that occasion it was, upon mature deliberation, thought advisable that we who could not fellowship the new doctrines which had gained among those of our profession, or their newly invented machinery for converting the world, should from every brother that walketh disorderly withdraw ourselves. And being at the same time unwilling to desert the Baptist name because others had perverted it, or "to give up our choicest flowers because spiders could pervert their sweets to poison." We selected from the list of epithets which our new-measure brethren had most bountifully bestowed on us, that of "Old School Baptists ." We also at the same time prepared an address to our brethren throughout the country, in which we fully stated our views, and our objections to the newly invented institutions of the day; and in that address we did most solemnly admonish those of our Father's children who had been beguiled by the new divinity systems which were in being, to return to their Father's house, where there is bread enough and to spare; and warned them of the consequence of their forsaking the Fountain of living water, to hew to themselves cisterns which could hold no water.

In the foregoing remarks we have informed our readers how we came in possession of the title, "Old School Baptists," and that the school to which we allude is none other than the school of Christ, where Jesus our Lord by his word and spirit presides, and teaches his children as never man taught. It remains for us to point out the difference more minutely between our order of Baptists and those who are in distinction from us generally known as New School Baptists; and we hope that every Baptist reader will, in reading the leading features of the two parties, be able to discover the which company he belongs. Our object is not to make proselytes to our views; we want none with us except such as are so from principle; yet we desire so to present the real difference, that even the very babe in the kingdom may understand where he is and where he belongs.

The Old School Baptists believe, that God from eternity set his love upon his people, marked them out as the election of his grace, and ordained them to an inheritance of eternal life in Jesus Christ, who in accordance with the purpose and grace of God, in the fulness of time came into the world, was made under the law, to do the will of God, as it was written of him in the volume of the book. And as this is the will of the Father, that he shall lose nothing of all that was given him, so he shall certainly raise them all up at the last day. We believe that our blessed Savior has finished the work which his Father gave him to do, that he has saved his people from their sins, {Matt. i. 21} that he has borne their sins in his own body on the tree, has put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, and brought in everlasting righteousness for all those whom his Father gave him; so that by his stripes they are healed, and by his one offering he has perfected forever them that are sanctified, or set apart to him in the covenant of peace; and consequently 'All that the Father giveth him shall come to him; and he that cometh to him he will in no wise cast out." And on the other hand we as firmly believe that "No man can come unto him, except the Father who hath sent him draw him;" and consequently we believe that he pillars of heaven are no more firm than the salvation of all the redeemed of the Lord; and that all the arts, sciences, machinery, wealth, power, influence, or industry of men or angels, can no more increase or diminish the number or safety the people of God, than they can tear him from his throne, or change the thing that has gone forth from his mouth.

The New School Baptists generally profess to believe also that the doctrine of the above paragraph is true, and they often tell us that they believe it as firmly as we do; but yet they do not believe that it is profitable to preach it. It will, in their judgment, discourage sinners, and lull the saints into a state of carnal security; it will hinder revivals of religion, and stop the progress of the work of the Holy Ghost in the conversion of sinners; hence they do not feel disposed to preach it, nor to countenance those who do. We say the New School generally hold such language; but some there are, and not a few, who boldly deny the doctrine in toto, and assert that the death and intercession of Christ saves no one; that he did not die for sinners, but for sin; and that he saves none, but has rendered it possible for all to save themselves! But still there is not so great a discrepancy between these, as one would at first imagine, for even those who in words admit that Christi is ALL, and in ALL, do in works most positively deny him; for the new theory is, that the economy of salvation is a system of means, and that the benevolent (so called) institutions of the day are admirably calculated to enlarge the Messiah's kingdom, and save many, who without these would perish eternally. Thus, for example, Judson wrote to the American females, saying, "Some, yea many precious souls might have been saved from the quenchless fires of hell, where now they must suffer eternally, had you not been afraid of being thought unfashionable," &c. and to this sentiment of infidelity New School Baptists of America have most heartily responded from the pulpit and from the press.

Now if the most orthodox of their party can countenance Judson, and contribute to support him in this his presumptuous stand against the doctrine of God our Savior, and revile us, as they have done most shamefully, for exposing the corruption of the sentiment, can they still consistently believe that salvation is of the Lord? To admit this heresy, what do we not admit? If some are now in hell, who might have been saved by the ladies' superfluous dress or jewels, these either were or they were not of the elect of God; they were or were not redeemed by the blood of Christ; they were or were not subjects of eternal love, electing grace, and of the intercession of Christ; hence, if they were of the elect, their being now in hell shows that election saves no one. If they were redeemed by Christ, it shows that the blood of Christ has no power to save. If they were the objects of Christ's intercession, if follows that the Father does not always hear Christ, or that eternal love, or electing grace, or both, or all that god has done for the salvation of his people, was infinitely inferior to the vain trappings of our American ladies, since these sinners were interested in all this work, and are in hell notwithstanding all.

Or if our new lights will try the other horn of the same beast, and say that those many precious souls, whom Judson says are in hell, and who might have been saved there from by our ladies, were not eternally loved, chosen, redeemed by the blood of Christ, and that they had no part in the intercession, grace or righteousness of Christ, it follows then, of course, that our New School Baptists do not believe that salvation is of the Lord; seeing they hold that souls for whom he has made no provision in the economy of redemption through the death of Christ, might have escaped the damnation of hell by the sovereign virtues of the ladies trinkets.

Again, the Old School Baptists believe that the scriptures of truth are a complete and all-sufficient rule for the christian's faith and practice.

But the New School believe that the scriptures contain only a general outline of the christian's duty; and the are required to set their wits at work to fill up the blank - see report adopted by the General Convention of New School Baptists, at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1833, as copied in the "Signs of the Times," Vol. II. No. 8.

The Old School believe that God has chosen, appointed and ordained al the means which are necessary for the accomplishment of his purpose in the salvation of his people, and that he will assuredly bring them all into requisition in his own time and way.

But the New School hold that the devising of means to accomplish the work of the Lord, and the bringing of them into requisition, is left with them.

The Old School Baptists believe that the church of the living God, the ground and pillar of the truth, is the only divinely authorized religious society on the earth; and that this community is, according to the word of the Lord, composed exclusively of baptized believers in the Lord Jesus Christ; and that all other professedly religious societies in the world are not up by men, without divine authority, and are consequently anti-christian.

But the New School believe that it is well pleasing to God and calculated to advance his cause, and that it will augment the number of his elect, &c., for them to go on without precept or example, and institute a number of professedly religious societies, which shall be composed of such as have money, and will pay a stipulated sum into their hands, without distinction of character - none being rejected but the poor and moneyless; and that it is their right to organize such professedly religious institutions, upon constitutions which would exclude Peter and John, if they were destitute of gold and silver as they were at the beautiful gate - Acts iii. 6; or even our Savior himself would be constitutionally debarred from a seat, if he should come to them as empty handed of the glittering dust as he was when called on to pay tribute.

The Old School believe that it would be a violation of the law of Christ as expounded by the apostle James, for us in our religious society to give the preference to the rich, or say to him that comes in goodly apparel,

Sit thou here in a godly place, and to the poor man, Sit thou at my footstool.

But the New School will sell birthrights in their religious societies for a stipulated sum; to the poorer class, a simple membership for what they can pay; a life membership to him who can pay more; a directorship to him who can pay a still higher price; and Dr. Ely did go so far, when on a tour of religious mendicancy in Orange Co., N. Y., as to sell for twenty dollars, an everlasting life membership in the Sunday School Union, for a Mr. Powell, who had been dead at that time about two years; this fact was announced in one of the public newspapers of that county, probably with a view of inducing others to come and buy an everlasting religious inheritance for their deceased relatives and friends.

The Old School believe the great Head of his church has reserved in his own hands the exclusive right of calling, qualifying, sending forth, and of sustaining his ministers, of appointing to them the field of their labors, and the term of their service; and that all those professed ministers of the gospel who do not acknowledge Christ in this department of his government, are anti-christian, and are to be rejected from our houses and pulpits in that character, on pain of the displeasure of our gracious Prince and Savior.

The New School, however, are of an opinion quite to the reverse. They believe that the commission given to the apostles by him who held all power in heaven and on earth, was intended for the church in general, and that even unregenerate sinners (provided they will give money) may unite in the execution of the functions of the great commission; and that the words of the commission, "Go ye," are to be understood, "Send ye." Hence they feel themselves called on to form themselves into incorporate bodies, for the purpose of taking this part of the divine government out of the hands of Christ; and they hold it to be their privilege to call pious young men who choose to preach rather than to work, and after putting them through their theological machinery, ( a process requiring from three to seven years drilling) appoint to them their field of labor, and the amount of their hire; nothing doubting that one of these philosophical dunces or learned novices of their own production is worth at least one dozen such as the God of heaven has called, and qualified, and sent to the work of the gospel ministry.

Old School Baptists believe that the effectual calling and spiritual birth of all the ransomed of the Lord, is the work of the Holy Ghost alone; that it is the Spirit that quickeneth, and the flesh profiteth nothing.

But the New School believe that the conversion of sinners is a work which is to effected by the use of certain means lodged in their hands, and consequently that the flesh profiteth a great deal; but they will condescend to admit, that where the sinner proves too obstinate for them, they are at liberty to call to their aid the work of the Holy Spirit, never forgetting, however, to direct the Spirit when to come, what to do, and how to do it; and lest there might be some misunderstanding, they will generally arrange the sinners whom they have predestinated to life and salvation, upon consecrated seats, or anxious-benches; and when they have got all things in readiness, they will assay to notify the Spirit, and call him to finish the work which they have so graciously begun.

The Old School believe that the atonement made by our Lord Jesus Christ was for the elect of God exclusively; and that all for whom the blessed Savior died, shall and will assuredly be saved with an everlasting salvation.

But the New School are divided among themselves on the subject of the atonement; some of them holding that it was universal, and others, with Fuller, that it was sufficient for all mankind; yet considering the atonement, or word of Christ in the matter of saving sinners, a subject of minor consideration, they put it down in their list of non-essentials; and notwithstanding their differences, all unite in carrying on their work, agreeably to their general plan of operations.

The Old School Baptists believe it to be their duty to withdraw their fellowship and nominal connection from the New School, as from disorderly walkers.

But the New School remonstrate, and say, Only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach, and we will eat our own bread and wear our own apparel.

In the foregoing remarks we have stated some particulars in which the Old Fashioned Baptists differ from the New.

THE OLD AND THE NEW MAN.

“So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin.” - Rom. vii. 25.

If Paul had in him these two opposite principles, and both to identified with his person that with the one he himself served the law of God, and with the other at the same time he himself served the law of sin, was he like all other christians in these respects? Have all christians in them a mind with which they themselves serve the law of God, or can any man be a christian who has not such a mind? And have all christians, like Paul, a principle or law in their members which is at war with this law of the mind, and with which they themselves serve the law of sin? Or is the flesh of some christians so purified by regeneration that they are unlike Paul, and have no wicked propensities in their flesh whereby they serve the law of sin?

If all christians are like Paul in these particulars, and like him serve the law of their God with the mind, and with the flesh serve the law of sin, are both of these opposites born of God; Or is that flesh in them which wars against the Spirit, only born of the flesh: or has it been born over again and made holy by a spiritual birth? And if it has, why does the apostle admonish christians to crucify it with its affections and lusts, and how can the christian with it himself still serve the law of sin? If in our flesh there dwells no good thing, and in that which is born of the Spirit there dwells no evil thing, if that which is born of God cannot commit sin, because his seed abideth in him, and he or it cannot sin because he is born of God, is it heretical or wicked for a christian to believe that all the corruption's within him are born of the flesh, and none of them are born of God, and that all that is pure and holy within him, is born of God, and no part of it is born of the flesh?

I of this mind with which the christian himself serves the law of God, the apostle says, "We have the mind of Christ," and another mind, or law, which he saw in his flesh he calls a carnal mind, which signifies a fleshly mind. With the mind of Christ he serves the law of God; but the carnal (or fleshly) mind is enmity against God, it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. These two minds must be very opposite. One of them is not, and cannot be subject to the law of God, and with the other we serve the law of God. Are both of these minds born of God, or is that mind which cannot be subject to the law of God, born of the flesh? The carnal mind is enmity against God, while the law requires love to God, and love to our neighbor, and on these hang all the law and the prophets. Is that fleshly mind which cannot obey the law of love, born of God? Or is that mind which can and does love God, with all the heart, might and strength, born of that flesh in which there is no good thing?

We think all christians will unite in the conclusion that all within them that is carnal, earthly, depraved and vile, is born of the flesh, and will continue to annoy them until they shall be by death delivered from these bonds of corruption, until this earthly house or mortal tabernacle shall be taken down, dissolved and fall, and our mortal bodies will not be animated with immortal life until God shall change them and fashion them like the glorious body of their risen Redeemer, and that change will not come until the resurrection, when if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in us, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken their mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwells in them. Then, and not until then, shall they be satisfied: when they awake in his likeness.

Strip the subject of all vain speculations, and all futile attempts to analyze the natural soul, body, or spirit of man, in trying to make out what we possess that is born of earth, or born from above, and it will be easy for every heaven-born child to perceive that all that we possess as identified with our persons in our present state that is born of God, bears the image of the heavenly, and all within us that does not bear the heavenly image is born of the flesh, and not of the Spirit.

With a clear understanding of their complex character, as now in an earthly body which clings to the earth, and lusts after the things of the earth, and wars against the spirit of their mind, and makes them groan, being burdened, and also clearly understanding that they also are the happy recipients through grace, of eternal, or immortal life, that Christ is formed in them the hope of glory, that God has revealed his Son in them, that God has shined in their hearts to give them the light of the glory of God, shining in the face of Jesus Christ, they will be prepared to appreciate what the inspired apostles have said of the old man, and new man, the outer man, and the inner man, together with the admonition to put off the old man with his deeds, and to put on the new man, which after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness.

A clear scriptural understanding of this subject will serve also to obviate the difficulties which may harass their minds in regard to the nature of the christian warfare. The saints are often tempted to doubt the reality of their own experience because they find in them so much of what is earthly, sensual and devilish, so much unreconciliation to God, so much murmuring, such vile affection, and strong propensities to depart from the living God, and to run into forbidden paths. If, say they, we were born of God, would it be thus with us? Can a nature which is born of God, grovel in the dust, and be so opposite to the spirit and purity of God? Certainly that which is born of God cannot commit sin, cannot disbelieve or doubt what God has said, 8w. But when they hear an inspired apostle declare that it is no more I that doeth it, but sin that dwelleth in me, that the new man in them only, is born of God, loves God, loves holiness, loves the brethren, and serves the law of God, and that with his flesh, or earthly nature, he serves the law of sin, and does the things which he would not, and leaves undone the things which he would do, it gives them sweet relief. "From whence come wars and fightings among you?" Thus the apostle James interrogates the saints. Do they arise from that new man which is after God created in righteousness and true holiness? Certainly not. They cannot proceed from that in us which is born of God, for that cannot commit sin, for the seed abideth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. Whence are they then? "Come they not of your own lusts?" Our flesh lusts against the Spirit, and that which is born of the flesh is flesh. Here is the source of wars among christians. But as that which is assailed by the flesh is Spirit, and is born of the Spirit, it wars against the corruption's of the flesh. The life, or animation in the christian which is of the flesh, shall die, and if we walk after the flesh, as the body is death, and it is dead because of sin, ye shall die. There is nothing else in the flesh; but if ye through the Spirit (which is born of God) do mortify the deeds of the flesh, ye shall live; for the Spirit is life, because of righteousness. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit." Let us remember that if we walk after the Spirit, we shall not fulfill the desires or lusts of the flesh. If the saints could at all times walk after the Spirit, there would be no wars and fighting among them; that is, no biting and devouring of one another; they would lay aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speaking, and as new-born, heaven-born, spirit-born babes, we would desire the sincere milk of the word that we may grow thereby. This spiritual food is adapted to the child of the new birth; it will not nourish the child of the flesh. Our fleshly natures are of the earth, all their sustenance must come from the earth, and be obtained from thence by the sweat of the face. But that birth which is of an incorruptible seed, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever, must be sustained by the milk of that living and abiding word.

THE ONE TALENT.

(Matt. xxv. 24, 25.)

Brother E. McKinney, of Missouri, desires our views on Matt. xxv. 24, 25, "Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I know thee that thou art a hard man, reaping where thou has not sown, and gathering where thou has not strewed: and I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine." These words are part of a parable which was spoken in connection with the several parables of servants left in charge of their Lord's household, to give them their meat in due season, the parable also of the ten virgins, and of the sheep and the goats; all of which, we think, were spoken in admonition to the disciples and especially to the servants of the household of our Lord to rule, and feed the members of his house in due season until he should return from his journey. A special application is probably had to the time of his being delivered up to be crucified, and extending to the period when he should, by his spirit, return to them, as he did by his spirit on the day of Pentecost. This was a time of peculiar trials, in which they did not know at what hour their Lord would return to them. These servants, according to chapter xxiv. 42-51, were his, Christ's own servants, on whom he had bestowed gifts qualifying them to feed and watch over the household; and those of them who should at his coming be found in the faithful discharge of the duties enjoined on them were pronounced blessed; but if any of them should say in their hearts, My lord delayeth his coming, and should begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken, the lord of that servant would come in a day when they looked not for him, and cut them asunder, and appointed them their portion with the hypocrites; and there should be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

We do not understand this to mean that these unfaithful servants should be sent down to hell; but that in the wholesome discipline of the church and kingdom which was to be set up, they should be cast out from the fellowship of the saints, and mingle with hypocrites; for within the walls of the holy city is the tree of life, and they are blessed and happy who do the commandments of Jesus, that they may have right to the tree of life – to the privileges of the church of God; for without are dogs, sorcerers, hypocrites, &c. – Rev. xxii. 14, 13.

Then, at that time, when the king should return and sit in the throne of his Mediatorial glory, shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins; for the kingdom of heaven is as a man traveling into a far country, who called his own servants and delivered unto them his goods, and to one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability, and straightway took his journey. Observe these recipients of the talents were not only servants, but they were his own servants. They were of different capacity or ability, but all alike as his own servants, and the gifts were distributed according to their several ability. Even so has God set the gifts in the church which is the body of Christ, as it hath pleased him. He knows the several ability of all his members, and has wisely varied the gifts which are for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, and for the edifying of the body of Christ, so as to accomplish his design; and he that has but one talent, has as much according to his capacity as he that has five, and is under no less obligation to be actively engaged in the use o fit as he would be if he had five. It may be thought an easy matter to say that this slothful and wicked servant was an alien. But has our Lord ever bestowed any gift for the feeding and edifying of his church on any but his own servants? And may we not press home to ourselves a still more soul-stirring inquiry, Have we not ourselves complained almost in the very words of this wicked and slothful servant? Have we always been free from murmuring when paddling our little canoe so near the shore, while we have witnessed the superior gifts bestowed upon those of greater capacity bounding over the raging billows of the broad ocean with safety and ease? Nay, have we not concluded, and said in our heart, Our gift, if it be indeed a gift, is too small to be of any use, we will hide it in the earth; for if the Lord requires us to occupy a gift, he is a hard master, reaping where he has not sown? If our Lord would give us five talents, and make us equal in point of gifts and ability to the most gifted, then we would be satisfied that he had sown, and had a just right to reap; but as he has not, we are afraid, and think it more prudent to hide or conceal what little we have, and return it to him at the day of reckoning.

This wicked slothfulness is not peculiar to those who are called to the work of the gospel ministry. Some of the new-born children have said in their heart, My hope, which I cannot quite throw away, is so small that I am afraid, and will keep it hid, in the earth, in the secret chambers of my earthly heart, and wait until the Lord shall give me as clear an evidence as I think he has given to others, then I shall not be afraid, and will no longer hide it. It will then go and tell the church what the Lord has done for me. Our Lord is entitled to a revenue of praise for every gift however small it may appear to us, and if we cannot use it to any great profit and edification of others, we should at least put it in the bank, or church, where it would be appreciated by the saints and through the saints produce usury, of praise to God.

At the time of reckoning, the slothful servant of the one talent is severely reproved, and chastened. The enjoyment even of his little hope or talent is taken from him, and given to him who has ten talents, and the slothful servant is cast out from the light and liberty of the faithful, into darkness, and in company with hypocrites, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. “For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth.” If we understand correctly, it is the chastened child of God who for his disobedience is cast into outer darkness who weeps, for none but God’s own dear children weep when cast into that darkness which is the element of the ungodly. They truly weep when they remember Zion, and the privileges which they once enjoyed. But it is the company into which they are cast who gnash upon them with their teeth. Derisively their enemies require of them to sing the songs of Zion in the strange land; for without are dogs, sorcerers, hypocrites and scoffers.

May we all be admonished by the application of these parables, especially those who are called to feed the church of God, when allured by the delusive vanities of the world to drink in the intoxicating doctrines of men, and to smite their fellow servators – or to neglect the gift that is for them, however small it may be, for, “It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.” Nor would we have the little trembling ones who feel afraid because they have not as great an evidence as others, fail to ponder well the application of the admonition of this parable. Small as their talents may seem, it is the Lord’s, and in the improvement of it they shall be enlarged, and shall enter in through the gates into the Holy City, and have right to the tree of Life. But with their Lord’s money hidden, they must have for their associates the scoffing enemies of the cause of God. “Joy is sown for the righteous,” and “The willing and obedient shall eat the good of the land;” but the disobedient shall be beaten with many stripes.

ON MARRIAGE

We are requested by a correspondent to give our views on Romans 7: 2, 3. "For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. So then, if while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress; but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man." From this apostolic exposition of the law of God upon the subject of matrimony, we are fully sustained in asserting that nothing short of the death of the husband can so exonerate the wife from her marriage obligations as to leave her at liberty to marry another man. That cases may and do sometimes occur in which a wife may lawfully separate from her husband, or a husband may put away his wife, we believe the Scriptures are sufficiently clear and to the point. See Matt. 5:32; also 19:9; but in no case do we find authority for such persons to marry again. Cases may occur in which a separation may take place against the will of one of the parties, and not for the cause mentioned, Matt. 19:9; but in such cases the parties are forbidden to marry again. "But unto the married I COMMAND, yet not I, BUT THE LORD, let not the wife depart from her husband; but and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband." (I Cor. 7:10, 11) "The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband Liveth." (I Cor. 7:39) From the plain testimony of the Scriptures as referred to above, we give it as our decided conviction that no married wife can, under any circumstances whatever, marry another man while her husband is living, without involving herself in the crime of adultery. Nor can a man marry again while his wife lives, without involving the same sin. We do not say, first husband and first wife, for a second marriage does not constitute the parties husband and wife, where this legal impediment exists.

A bill of divorcement, legally obtained, may in the eye of our civil code disannual a former marriage contract, so that, as far as the civil law is concerned, the parties may contract to live in adultery with impunity, and their issue be legally their heirs; but the Bible gives them no such liberty. Nor has the God of heaven given any authority to any earthly legislature to divide asunder what God has joined together.

We could as soon extend our fellowship and approbation to the direct crime of adultery, where no separation has taken place between the husband and wife, as where such separation has taken place, a divorce obtained and the new connection legalized by the marriage of parties where one or both have a living wife or husband.

We know there is a difference of opinion among professors of religion on this subject; but we have ever refused to perform the marriage service, in any such case, as we should as soon connive directly at or countenance the sin of adultery. We hope NEVER TO HEAR OF AN INSTANCE AMONG OLD SCHOOL BAPTISTS; nor can we hold any as Old School Baptists who would thus live in adultery. The very use the apostles makes of this law, in the text at the head of this article, shows that the church of Christ could not be lawfully wedded to Him, in her visible Gospel order, until she became dead unto the law. Her being put away and cursed by her former husband, (the law) did not release her - she must die, and she did die to the law; Christ became the end of the law, for righteousness to every one that believes. We might extend this article; but we hope enough is said to satisfy the mind of our inquiring correspondent.

OUR EXISTENCE IN CHRIST BEFORE THE WORLD WAS.

Dear Brother Beebe: - I now sit down to write a few lines to you, and must say that your editorial in reply to brother Vanmeter has been a mystery to me in one or two points. I must say there is a contradiction abroad somewhere; and it is for instruction I write. You stated, and truly too, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," nothing else, "and that which is born of the spirit is spirit," and nothing else. Now you say that the same that was born by ordinary generation is in time born of the spirit. If I understand you, it leaves me in the same fix that Nicodemus was in. I will say that if the same man is born again, it is spiritual and I suppose it is incorruptible, and if this is the case, sin cannot approach it. Then this mortal has put on immortality, in part, but I find no such Scripture; but find that we have this treasure in earthen vessels, if in us at all, and the excellency is not of men, but of God. This is the same leaven which a woman hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened. Now if the Adamic man is born and made spiritual, it is all leavened and is not a progressive work, as I have thought, to be completed in the resurrection. Now I think this new birth is clearly set forth in the words, "Christ in you, the hope of glory." You made one point, that the inward man and the outward man are commensurate, and after the new birth there is but one man, and he is solely of the Lord, and I won't have such an idea. To be born is to develop. Now in developing godliness through the prepared or subjugated body, there is a manifestation of righteousness which was not there before. Now if it perfected the Adamic man, Paul did not understand it clearly when he said that with his flesh he served the law of sin, and "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death." Now this same body that was born first is born again, and the second birth leaves it still a body of death. Being born again surely does not make it spiritual, or it would not die.

Dear brother, I would be well pleased if you would write me a letter and give me your views on the inward man, and what it is, and also the outward man and what he is, just in as short a way as you can, and direct it to Road House Station where you send the "Signs". And as my time is up in December, I want you to stop it then. I write you in good feelings for instruction.

Yours truly,
A.W. Murray.

Reply to Brother Murray: - Dull and bungling as we are in expressing our views, we are surprised sometimes at our failure to make our views intelligible to our brethren, and still more surprised that any of them should understand us so very differently from what we mean. If we were as unsuccessful on all points in attempting to make ourself understood as we have been on the subject of the first and second birth of the children of God, we would return our pen to the wing of its mother goose, and leave the statement and defense of the truth to abler writers. We have not been without our fears that the late agitation on the regeneration and the new birth, at least to some of our readers, had a tendency to darken counsel, rather than to edify. Whatever we publish as our views on any subject, we give only as our views, holding none of our brethren responsible for them, only so far as they find them sustained by the Scriptures and made plain to their understanding. We neither ask nor desire any one to accept as true what we hold, or set forth, any further than our views are sustained by the unerring Scriptures of truth. And we have confidence in the Old School, or Primitive Baptists, that they will carefully compare what we publish with that sacred standard before they endorse it. But we must request them to consider candidly what we say before they condemn it; and in no case allow themselves to misconstrue or misrepresent what we advance. By our words we are willing to be judged; whether by them we be condemned or justified.

In replying to our brother Murray, we will make this one more effort to express, as explicitly and plainly what are our views, as we can.

First. It is our firm conviction that all the men, women, and children who belong to the elect family of God had an existence in Christ Jesus before the world began, and consequently before they had any of them been born at all, either of the flesh or of the Spirit.

Secondly. That their existence in Christ before the world began was so personal that no change could possibly be made, the inheritance of every one of them, for time and eternity, was assigned to each personally, definitely and unchangeably. That they were all of them loved personally, blessed with all spiritual blessings personally, and personally chosen in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world, and that each and all were so definitely identified in the choice, love, grace, and gift of God that no one of them could possibly be misplaced, overlooked, or fail to fill the destiny appointed or to receive the spiritual blessings which were given them in Christ, or any one of them fill the place in the body of Christ which God hath ordained for another.

Thirdly. That they were all regarded as the children of God, and heirs of immortal glory before they were any of them made partakers of flesh and blood; and consequently before any of them were born of the flesh or of the spirit.

Fourthly. We hold that it was the counsel, purpose and ordination of God to bring all these heirs of glory into manifestation by a first and a second birth, preserving through both births the identity they had with him before the world began.

Fifthly. That their identity, individuality, and personality being anterior to their first and second birth, depended on neither the one nor the other, except to subserve the great purpose of God in their manifestation, which he ordained should be in the fullness of the dispensations of times.

Sixthly. That their first birth, or their being born of the flesh, was ordained for their manifestation in the flesh, as the children of the first Adam, of whose nature they were to partake, in whose transgression, depravity, and the mortality they were to be involved. And that until they were born of the flesh, they could not see the natural world into which they were to be born. And that when any one of them is born of the flesh, that man is born once. That man who was chosen of God, in Christ, is now born of the flesh, and can see the world into which he is born. That man, who was a man before he was born, now by his birth partakes of humanity, mortality, and corruption, and requires to be redeemed from sin, death and condemnation.

Seventhly. That very man, who was a man, as chosen of God in the election of grace, and whose name was written in heaven, in the book of the Lamb, and has been born of the flesh is by his one birth only revealed or manifested in the earthly nature which God ordained for him; but before he can be made manifest in a spiritual nature he must be born again. As there is natural life given to this man in his earthly birth; for that which is born of the flesh is flesh, so there is nothing natural given to the same man when he is born again, as that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.

Eighthly. The vessel of mercy whom God afore prepared to glory by his first birth receives his mortality and in his being born again the same man receives his immortality. "I give unto them eternal life (John 10:28)." "That he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him. And this is life eternal, that they might know thee," etc. Now being born of the flesh, and born again of the Spirit possesses both flesh and spirit, which Paul says are contrary the one to the other; he now possesses both mortality and immortality; his mortality is born of the flesh, and the flesh continues to be mortal as long as the man, so born, remains in the flesh. The immortality is born of the Spirit of him who only hath immortality, and continues to abide in the man who has experienced both births and possesses both conflicting natures which must both continue in him until the one is swallowed up of the other; until the flesh shall yield to the spirit, until this mortality shall be swallowed up of life. Then, but not till then, shall this mortal put on immortality, and this corruptible put on incorruption, the spirit shall then triumph over the flesh, when the flesh shall go down to the grave, and there be sown a natural body, and thence be raised a spiritual body, changed and fashioned like the resurrected body of our Lord, who has already risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept.

1. Now let us consider Christ as the first fruits, the perfect sample of what his saints shall be in their resurrection! Was Christ the Son of God, and perfectly identified in that full relation to the Father before he was born of the virgin, or begotten from the dead in his resurrection? Did his being made of a woman, under the law, or his resurrection constitute him the Son of God, or did he exist in his Mediatorial glory with his Father before the world began, the same as he will when the world shall be no more? See John 17:5. Had he the same glory with the Father before the world was that he ascended to when he went up with a shout?

2. Did Christ in his incarnation possess two whole and yet distinct natures in his one person? Was he both God and man at the same time? Was he properly the Son of God, and the Son of Man; and did his Godhead compose any part of his humanity or his humanity compose any part of his Godhead?

3. Was he the subject of two births, one of the virgin, when he was made flesh, and the other when he was quickened from the dead by the Eternal Spirit, in his resurrection from the dead? Before answering these last interrogatives, read Matthew 1:21; Luke 1:35; and Acts 13:33.

If then it be admitted that Christ possessed two whole natures in his one person, the one called flesh, which could suffer and die, and the other Spirit, which could not die, but had power to quicken and raise the dead, is it hard to infer that those who bear his image can also, being born first of that flesh of which also in like manner he took part, and then being born again of an incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth forever, be while here in the flesh, possess two distinct natures? The one born of the flesh, the other born of the Spirit, the one human, the other divine? One mortal, the other immortal; the one depraved and possessing in it "no good thing," the other perfectly immaculate?

It is testified of our Savior, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made. And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us (John 1:1-3 & 14)." Would it now be proper for us to raise the question, What part of the Word was made flesh? We are told it was the Word which was God. No less the Word because it was made flesh, no less God because identified with flesh.

So with the men, or people, which were with, and in, Christ before the foundation of the world, they are no more, nor are they any less, the people of God because they are made flesh, born of the flesh, and are thereby partakers of the transgressions, pollutions and mortality of the flesh, than they were before the world began. The man who was chosen in Christ Jesus in eternity was in time born of the flesh, defiled and involved in guilt and transgression, and washed from pollution and guilt by the atoning sacrifice of Christ. That same man, who was a man chosen in Christ from everlasting, and who was born of the flesh, and made flesh, is born again of a heavenly birth, receives a spiritual life from God, which is distinct from the life received by him in his first birth, and in his two-fold nature of flesh and spirit, dwells among us. Brother Murray has entirely mistaken, and misread us, in regard to our "making the point" which he condemns that the inward man, and the outward man are commensurate of the new birth. Such a thought never entered our heart; nor have we ever contended that our Adamic nature is born over again in the new birth, nor that it ever has or ever will be made spiritual. It is certainly not so now, and if it was it would cease to be Adamic; for Paul testified that Adam was not spiritual but natural; that Christ the second Adam is spiritual. To be spiritual then is to partake of the life and nature of Christ, not of Adam.

We have not time to discuss this subject in private correspondence with those who do not choose to patronize the "Signs". We have about all we can do in addition to our pastoral and other ministerial labors to write for the "Signs". We are very prone to be prolix in our articles, but the shortest way in which we can answer the last questions proposed we say: the outward man is the flesh, that is born of the flesh; and the inward man is the spirit, that is born of the spirit.

Brother Murray has mistaken us in regard to the old nature, which is born of the flesh, being born again of the spirit, and made spiritual. We hold, as we have tried to explain, that the subject of grace had an identity before he was born at all, either of the flesh or of the spirit; when born of the flesh, the fleshly nature produced by that birth became identified with him, so that he who before existed in Christ is now manifest in the flesh, and receives a fleshly corruptible, and depraved, dying nature. And the same person, man, or identity, who has received this earthly nature (it must be the same, or some other), also receives a spiritual, pure, incorruptible, imperishable and heavenly nature which is born of the Spirit, with which he also becomes identified; and that this man, person or identity retains both these antagonistic natures, and is identified with both, as long as he continues in the flesh, and until the one of them shall be swallowed up of the other, until the mortal shall put on immortality, when death shall be swallowed up of victory. In this complex state in which flesh and spirit are component parts the same person, we may properly speak of the man or person who is born, and born again, as a sinner, and of the same man or person in whom both natures now exist, as a saint. He is as black as the tents of Kedar; and at the same time, he is as white and comely as the curtains of Solomon. Or, as Erskine says:

"To good and evil, equal bent, I'm both a devil and a saint."

"I am crucified with Christ," "I am dead with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." Paul uses the personal pronouns, I and me, identifying him, in both natures, thus, For I know that in me (that is in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing, for the good that I would, I do not, but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is therefore no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. For I see another law [or governing power] in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O, wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of Christ; but with the flesh the law of sin (Romans 7). Now when we can comprehend how the apostle could himself, with his mind serve the law of God without the concurrence of his fleshly nature, but in direct opposition to it; and how he himself could with his flesh serve the law of sin, without involving his spirit, in any participation in that service; and how he could say without contradiction, "I myself serve the law of sin, and yet it is not I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me." I serve the law of sin; I myself, serve the law of God; but in such a way that it is not I, but sin that dwelleth in me. I am a wretched man, involved in a body of death; nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ that liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, etc. Then we shall have less trouble in distinguishing between the flesh and the spirit, the old man, and the new, the outer man and the inward man, the natural man and the spiritual man; and how these two opposite natures emanating from opposite sources and produced by distinct births, can form the elementary parts of a Christian. Then shall we all better understand the words of our Lord, in which he has informed us that "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit;" and we shall be less likely to conclude that anything earthly is born of the Spirit, or anything spiritual is born of the flesh.

OUR MOTTO.

WHEN the hosts of the alien were encamped around about the little trembling band of Israel like grasshoppers for multitude, and all human prospect of escape from captivity had fled - the despairing tribes were reduced to the necessity of looking alone to God for deliverance. The manner in which it pleased the Lord to give deliverance and victory to Israel, was the very opposite to what human wisdom would have suggested. The Lord would neither suffer Gideon to go with his thirty-two thousand, nor with his ten thousand men: “Lest Israel should vaunt themselves against the Lord, saying mine own hand hath saved me.” The first work of preparation for the onset was the reduction of the strength of their numbers, and to convince them that the work would be accomplished by the mighty arm of the Lord. How effectually did the Lord stain the pride of men in removing from them all on which they would be inclined to rely! and when they were brought down sufficiently, Gideon was instructed to advance with his three hundred men, divided into three companies,. with directions to take their positions round about the enemy,. without a single implement of war, excepting a trumpet in every man’s right hand - with no weapons, offensive or defensive - no sword, nor shield, nor bow; but relying on the Lord as their Shield and Buckler, their High Tower and their Defence. Every man was to carry his empty pitcher covering, a lighted lamp in his left hand, and to await the signal from their leader, at which every pitcher was broken, the united light of three hundred lamps at once flashed forth upon the surprised enemy, attended with the simultaneous shout of three hundred voices, crying, as in one breath, “The sword of the Lord and of Gideon!” How dreadful was the consternation of the Midianites at this display of the arm of the Lord! More dreadful to their ears was the sound of the name of the Lord than all the thunder of the battle clash;

and more terrific to their eyes the radiant flame than the glitter of a million spears! The dreadful majesty of the God of Israel shining around them; and the terror of his name, echoing from the trumpets on every side, filled their hearts with dismay and their ranks with confusion.

We are inclined to believe there is something in this figure analogous to the manner in which the Lord is conducting the conflict of his people, at this day, with the host of their opposers. The numerical strength of those who contend for the primitive order of the house of God, is greatly reduced; and they are taught by very many important admonitions, that they are not to rely upon human wisdom nor human might; their pitchers (mere earthen vessels) are empty of themselves, and only to be broken in the contest, while the light of that treasure which our God has committed to earthen vessels, is to shine forth with the united declaration of our sole reliance upon the sword of the Lord and of our glorious leader Jesus Christ, from every one whom God has honored with a place and rank among the very few by himself designated to follow their illustrious Leader into the field. Not the sword of human power, of human wisdom, literature, science or fame; but the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. While the motto of our enemies is, "Attempt great things, expect great things," which motto truly expresses their confidence in their own skill and perseverance; the confidence of the people whom God has chosen shall be expressed by the shout of Gideon's little army, whose reliance was restricted to "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." And although the sword of the Lord and of our Leader is at this day invisible to the enemies of Zion, as was that sword in the days of Midian; yet its glittering blade shall flash upon them in as unexpected a moment as in the case of their prototype, and shall be as effectual as on that memorable occasion.

A few words, then, of admonition to those who can lap water like dogs, may be seasonable. Brethren, remember the charge that was given to the three hundred men: “And he (their leader, who, in this particular at least, was a figure of the Captain of our salvation,) said unto them, Look on me, and do likewise; and behold when I come to the outside of the camp, it shall be, that as I do, so shall ye do; when I blow with a trumpet, I and all that are with me, then blow ye the trumpets also on every side of the camp, and say, The sword of the Lord and of Gideon!

It is of the utmost importance that the little company whom God has preserved from bowing to Baal, should keep their eye fixed upon the Author of their faith, and imitate his divine example. We are to cry, The sword of the Lord! and rest assured that God will use it effectually, in defence of his Israel and the discomfiture of his enemies.

OUR RELATION TO ADAM.

DEAR BROTHER BEEBE: – As I have never asked the favor of you before, I now ask, Do we now stand in the same relation to Adam as we did before the flood? As God destroyed all of Adam's posterity save one righteous man and his family, it seems to me that we sprang from a righteous stock, as every tree bears fruit of its kind. Please answer, and oblige.

Yours with the best of feelings,
J. BARKER.
Moscow, Texas. March, 1881.

REPLY. – The destruction of all others of mankind did not change the natural relation of Noah to Adam, for it is in Adam all die; and Noah, though a righteous man, and although saved from the destruction of the deluge, still retained the mortality of all the human family; and the antediluvians generally lived to a greater age than any of the descendants of Noah since the flood. We are told by the apostle that death reigned from Adam to Moses, and that death reigned by one man's offense. From the time of the flood to the days of Moses was about eight hundred years, and from the days of Moses until this day death, unabated mortality, continues to reign over all the children of men; and as all who die, die in Adam, the relation to him in our earthly nature continues the same as it was before the deluge.

Whatever may have been set forth figuratively by the flood, and the salvation of Noah and those that were with him in the ark, as Noah himself was a descendant of Adam, the linage connecting Adam with all the postdiluvians of mankind is unbroken by the flood. Although Noah, Abraham and David, as chosen patriarchs, figuratively represented the chosen generation and royal priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ, it was not in their fleshly descendants; for Noah's fleshly seed developed the same depravity and mortality as all others of mankind. And Abraham's seed was not reckoned in the flesh; "For they are not all Israel which are of Israel; neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children; but, in Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for the seed." – Rom. ix. 6-8. And of the seed of David he said, "Although my house be not so with God, yet hath he made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure." – 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. It is true of its own peculiar kind. Adam, the earthly tree, bears the fruits of sin, depravity, rebellion and death. But Christ is the Root and Offspring of the tree of life, and the fruit of that tree is of its own peculiar kind, and all who eat of its fruit shall live forever; "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." – 1 Cor. xv. 22, 23.

OUR SPRING ASSOCIATIONS

The Baltimore Association was held in May at Harford, Maryland, and we learn from brethren who attended that the season was pleasant and refreshing. It was not our privilege to meet with them, as we had intended, but we rejoice to learn that the churches and brethren are steadfast in the faith, and in peace and harmony among themselves.

We were permitted to attend the Delaware, at Bryn Zion, Delaware, where we enjoyed a refreshing season from the presence of the Lord. No discordant sound was heard during the meeting. The churches are generally small, but composed of members who, like those John saw with the Lamb in Rev. 18, are, "Called and chosen, and faithful." Brother Thomas Barton, who has labored long and faithfully in the bounds of this Association, though pressed with age and infirmities, was able to attend, and in his preaching and conversation, seemed to still retain the "dew of his youth." Elder Ephraim Rittenhouse is doing good service among these churches. His views of divine truth seem to be clear and vivid, and his gifts manifestly of the Lord. He is in the vigor of life, and gives evidence that he prefers Jerusalem above his chief joys. These two devoted servants of God comprise the ministry, and their time is divided among the several churches.

From the Delaware Association we came through Philadelphia, where there is a small church of our faith and order, who meet regularly on the first day of each week, like the Primitive saints, in a large upper room, and devote the time to prayer and praise, speaking to themselves in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs. They have no settled pastor, but occasionally receive visits from ministers of Jesus, as they pass through the city, or as they visit them expressly for the purpose. Passing through that city, we visited Southampton church. We spent two or three days in the company with Elder Daniel L. Harding, who has been sorely afflicted with disease for a long time, and has had to endure several surgical operations on his person. We were pleased to find his general health somewhat improved. He has been able to fill most of his regular appointments in the church; but unable, from the nature of his complaints, to travel abroad much. He has been graciously supported in his painful afflictions, and we hope and pray that he may be restored to health, if it be the pleasure of the Lord; for we esteem him as a precious brother, whose gifts are highly appreciated in the church, and among our churches generally. We spent the Sunday with him at the Southampton church, preached twice on that day at their meeting-house. Their meetings are well attended, the church is large, and the brethren and sisters seemed to be dwelling together in love and unity. With the brethren of that church we came on, being brought on our way by the kindness of our dear brother, Deacon J. V. Willard, to the Delaware River Association, which was held with the Second Hopewell church, at Harberton, N.J.

This meeting was well attended, and the season was delightful. All the brethren and sisters seemed to enjoy it. At present there are but four churches in this Association, but the aggregate number is about four hundred members. The First Hopewell church contains two hundred and eight members; the Kingwood, sixty-nine; Southampton, eighty-six; and Second Hopewell, thirty. Elder P. Hartwell is the pastor of the First and Second Hopewell churches. His ministry among them has been remarkably blessed, not only in the great ingathering of members, but more especially in edifying, instructing and confirming the saints in the truth. Elder Conklin is pastor of the Kingwood church, and his labors are abundantly blessed to the church, especially in his faithful and unremitting labors in word and doctrine. His general health has been much better for the last six or eight years than for many years previous to that time. Elder D. L. Harding, as we have already mentioned, is with the Southampton church. These three previous brethren supply faithfully the four churches, and as far as they have opportunity extend their labors in traveling abroad, comforting and confirming the churches generally.

Our own, the Warwick Association, was held on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, after the first Sunday in June, with the New Vernon church. The first day of our session was very rainy, but on the second and last days of the feast, the assembly was very large for our country. We were favored with the attendance of a goodly number of our brethren in the ministry from abroad; all of whom came to us in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of peace, and with one accord preached Jesus Christ and him crucified, greatly to the comfort and edification of all the saints.

The next Association we were permitted to attend was the Chemung. This was held with the Chemung church at Waverly, in a very pleasant and commodious meeting-house, very kindly offered for our use by the New School Baptists of that place. The churches of this Association are generally small. All the old ministers have been called from their labors on earth to their crown in glory, excepting our venerable and dear old brother, Elder Joseph Beaman. But God has not left himself without witnesses in that part of his vineyard. Within a few years past, two brethren of promising gifts have been raised up and set apart to the work of the gospel ministry in their bounds, namely, Elders Chester Schoonover, of Asylum, Pennsylvania, and P. W. Doud, of Mainsburgh, Pennsylvania. Elder John Donaldson and Elder K. Hollister also supply, a portion of the time, some of the destitute churches. This meeting was well attended, and was principally devoted to the preaching of the word, and all seemed to regard it as a precious season. From Chemung, we went on in company with Elders G. Conklin and W. Housel, and attended a meeting on Monday with the little church near the Horse Heads, where we were joined by Elders Beaman and Smith, and on the day following, proceeded on our way by railroad to Hornellsville, where we were met by brethren and teams to convey us to the Conference of Western New York. This meeting was held with South Dansville church, which is under the pastoral care of Elder N. D. Rector. This conference is chiefly composed of the brethren scattered abroad in the Western and Northwestern parts of this State, many of whom are living remote from any regularly organized church of our order, who seldom have the opportunity of social intercourse with their brethren. Elders Beaman, Smith, Conklin, Housel, and Beebe were present with Elder Rector, and we enjoyed a pleasant and interesting time.

At all of these meetings Christ and his cross was all our theme. Although our country is involved in a merciless and cruel war in which thousands and even hundreds of thousands of the flower of our country are being sacrificed on the bloody altar, not a lisp of any thing of a political character was heard from any of the pulpits, nor during the discussions of those meetings. Peace and harmony prevailed, over all the clamor of war; and the spirit of "Peace on earth, and good will toward men" seemed to pervade the hearts of all the saints. Earthly thrones may crumble to the dust, and the very best forms of human governments may be uprooted, nations, kingdoms and states may be dashed to atoms, but of the increase of the government and peace of the Wonderful Counsellor, there shall be no end. (Isaiah 9:7) "Wherefore we receiving a kingdom that can not be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire." # ORDINATIONS

Brother Beebe: If it is not asking too much, I would be glad if you would take up the subject of Laying on of the Hands of the Presbytery, in the ordination of Elders and Deacons. What is the practice of the Old School Baptists? If it is their practice, by what authority? Please give your views through the "Signs of the Times" and oblige one who wishes to know the truth.

Yours truly,
Abraham Foutch
Vandalia, Iowa
April 11, 1864

Reply: There is not a perfect uniformity in the practice of Old School Baptists in their manner of setting apart their Elders and Deacons to their respective callings. In the ordination of Elders, however, it is the general practice to call a council, or Presbytery, to be composed of Elders and brethren from sister churches whose concurrence in behalf of the churches in regard to the call and qualifications of such candidate for ordination is deemed essential to their future usefulness; inasmuch as the Elders are set apart for service in all the churches of the same faith and order, where they may have occasion to officiate in their sacred vocation. When such concurrence is obtained, the most general custom is to recognize the brother as an Elder in a public manner. First, a sermon is preached suitable to the occasion, then a prayer is offered, and at the same time the hands of the Elders present are laid on the head of the candidate, after which a solemn charge is given to the candidate by some Elder father in the ministry. Then the right hand of fellowship is extended to him with a few appropriate remarks in which he is recognized as a regularly ordained Elder of our faith and order.

We have said there is not a perfect uniformity as to the ceremony. Some brethren have doubted the propriety of laying on our empty hands, as we can not impart to the brother the gifts of the Holy Ghost. It is by them supposed that the laying on of our hands would imply that the gifts of the Spirit were pretended to be so given, and others perhaps have objected to the ritual from other reasons.

As our own views, however, are asked for, with out any design to disparage the views of others or to provoke any discussion or controversy on the subject, we confess that our convictions are in favor of the formalities which we have described. There can be no public recognition without some formality, and if we have rightly read the scriptures, it was an apostolic custom to set brethren apart to the work of the gospel ministry by fasting and prayer, and with the laying on of hands, to faithfully charge them before God and the elect angels to preach the word, and also to give them the right hand of fellowship to go and preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; and the apostle tells us we have them for our example. There were many cases of the laying on of hands, where the design does not to us appear to have been to convey the gifts of the Holy Ghost, but simply to set apart brethren to the work where unto the Holy Ghost had called them.

With regard to Deacons, as their office is local, or generally confined to the church to which they belong, there does not appear to be any necessity of a council from abroad; and our churches generally ordain their Deacons by the unanimous voice of the church, solemnly invoking the blessing of God upon them to make them useful in their sacred calling. Still there are some churches who set them apart in about the same way in which Elders are ordained.

I PETER 1:22

“Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently.”

As we intimated in a late number, we now offer such views as we have on the above text, in answer to the request of brother George Fettenger, of Iowa. The apostle addressed the saints which were scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia, elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ, and having set forth the grand principles on which their salvation was established, he proceeds to instruct and admonish them in perfect harmony with the foundation of their faith and hope. “Forasmuch,” says he, “as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot: who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifested in these last times for you, who by him do believe in God seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth,” etc.

The principal inquiry of our correspondent seems to be as to the meaning of the apostle, in regard to their having purified their souls, when the Scriptures so manifestly teach that the cleansing and purification of the saints is attributable only to the blood of Jesus Christ, which alone can purge us from guilt, and present us holy and unblamable in the sight of God. We must observe that the apostle in the connection had clearly established the doctrine of salvation by the sovereign grace and atoning blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. Their standing and acceptance before God was in Christ. Elected, or chosen of God in Christ before the foundation of the world, and that according, not to their works or merits, but according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, and through the sanctification (separation, consecration, or setting apart by regeneration,) of the Spirit unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. The saints had not therefore purified their souls by virtue of any meritorious action of their own, nor do we understand this text to speak of expiation for sin, or atonement for guilt, for that is very positively ascribed in the verses immediately preceding, to the precious blood of Christ, as possessing the only power or virtue that can possibly redeem sinners to God. But the purification of their souls, in the sense of this text, is from the defilement of error, which they had received by tradition from their fathers, by which they had formerly been defiled; which had led them to confide in the flesh, and to follow and obey the flesh in its dictations, and that in disobedience to the truth. But now, being sanctified, or set apart by the Spirit, and as the apostle adds, Being born again, not of a corruptible seed, but of an incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever, they have received the truth, and the truth has set up its throne in their hearts, and by the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, they have obeyed the truth, are governed by the power of the truth, and in obedience to the mandates of the truth as it is in Jesus, they have laid aside all malice, and all guile, and all hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, as new born babes they desire the sincere milk of the word, that word by and of which they are born again, as being congenial with the new life which God has given them in their new and heavenly birth, they by their obedience to the truth have cast off, or laid aside, their former malice, guile, hypocrisy, etc., and thereby they have purified their souls in obeying the truth. As all error is defiling and filthy, so the truth, which is the opposite of error, is pure, and heavenly in its nature. Truth flows from the word of God by which they are born again, as the sincere milk of the word of God that liveth and abideth forever. Thus while obedience to the flesh, to traditions of the fathers, according to the flesh, corrupts and defiles, the opposite course of obedience to the truth, purifies and cleanses from falsehood, deception and hypocrisy. Under the ceremonial law the Israelite who transgressed the law was pronounced unclean. But a faithful obedience to the precepts was considered clean. God said to Israel, “Wash you, make you clean.” How? The manner is pointed out. “Put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed; judge the fatherless; plead for the widow,” etc. - Isaiah 1:16,17. But it may be asked, How had the saints addressed by Peter purified their souls by obeying the truth? The apostle tells how: through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren. An effort of the flesh to cultivate a love for the people of God, or the things of the Spirit, can at the most, only amount to a neat counterfeit. There is no brotherhood to, or fraternal love for, the saints felt in reality until we are born of the Spirit, for, All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man is as the flower of grass, which will soon wither, and fall away. Hypocrites may make great professions of love and feign an ardent love, but it is not reliable; it is not the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, but an imitation, a deception; but that love which is the fruit of the Spirit is real, vital and lasting as eternity, for it is the love of God, and is therefore eternal and immutable, and is consequently unfeigned; it flows out freely, spontaneously, sincerely and ardently to the brethren, to their kindred in Christ. Not only in times of prosperity, when religion walks abroad in silver slippers, but when brethren are oppressed, despised, afflicted or persecuted. To know that a dear brother or sister is in distress, and needs consolation and sympathy, then will this love findvent, it will gush forth in the most unmistakable and undisguised tenderness. It will not say to a needy and destitute brother, Be warmed, and be clothed, and at the same time withhold the things which are required; but it will weep with those who weep, and mourn with those who mourn, and if necessary divide with him the last loaf, or the last dollar or dime. That love which is induced and cultivated by theory or tradition from sire to son, and grows only out of the flesh, and exhibits only the fleshly passions which belong to our depraved nature, is just as corrupt and polluted as the nature from which it emanates; but that which we receive in the new birth, is as pure and holy as the fountain from which it proceeds. When through the Spirit therefore the saints obey the truth, they love one another with a pure heart fervently; the heart is made pure, it is sprinkled from an evil conscience, and the law of Christ who is essentially the Truth, as well as the Way and the Life, is written in the pure heart, the new heart which God gives to his people. Then the good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, brings forth good things; from such an heart, unfeigned love proceeds; but all pretension to christian love which comes from any other source is feigned, deceptive and unavailing before God.

The very expression of the apostle, Seeing that ye have purified your souls by obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, implies that none but such can be profited by the admonition, See that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently.

We are told that because iniquity should abound, the love of many should wax cold. And is not the same cause at all times productive of similar effects? This was the case, according to the words of our Lord, when the abomination which maketh desolate, stood in the holy place, and the fearful judgments of God were poured out upon the ancient Jerusalem. And at all other times when iniquity has abounded, has it not had the same tendency, that is, with many? Not with all, for some have manifested their love to God, to holiness, and especially to the brethren more abundantly at such times. But prevailing iniquity in the world serves to discriminate between feigned and unfeigned love. Far beyond any other time that any of the present generation have known, the present is a time in which iniquity abounds; the man of sin is permitted to scatter fire-brands, arrows and death, broadcast through the world, and do we not see that many who formerly professed to love the people of God most fervently, are giving the saddest evidences that their love, if not feigned, has grown lamentably cold? Are there not brethren in this day, ready to deliver up brethren to the sword, with whom they have hitherto professed to be in fellowship and love? If we see such in hostile array against each other, and ready to consign each other to death, must we not conclude their love, if they ever had any, has reached the freezing point? But let us, dear brethren, whose hearts are cleansed from dead works to serve the living God, heed well the admonition of our text, and See that we love one another with a pure heart, fervently; that we may know how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity, keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace.

I Peter 3:8

"Finally, be ye all of one mind."

This eminent apostle of our Lord Jesus Christ, in common with all the other apostles of the Lamb, was invested with divine authority to establish in the church of God every principle of faith and order which can ever be lawfully entertained in his kingdom. No religious organization can ever be recognized as a church of Christ or a branch of the church of Christ, unless standing in the apostles' doctrine, conforming to their decisions, listening to their instructions and accepting all their decisions in judgment on all parts of the law of Christ. The apostle John lays down this rule of judgment, this infallible and everlasting test of fellowship, and criterion by which the saints of God shall know, without the least shade of uncertainty, who of all the professing world are of God, and who are of the world, and not of God. He says, "We [that is the apostles, and the apostolic church, which holds the apostles' doctrine and order] are of God: he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error." "They [that is, they whose spirit and doctrine are not of God] are of the world; therefore speak they of the world, and the world heareth them." (I John 4:5,6) To hear the apostles, in a scriptural sense, is to receive their instructions, accept and abide by their decisions in all they have said, and to obey their injunctions and heed all their admonitions. He that is of God will do all this, and if any who profess godliness do not in this sense hear the apostles, it is because they are not of God, but are of the world. This decision is infallible, whether applied to individuals or to churches. By this rule the church is commanded to "try the spirits", and by it they are to discriminate between truth and error; between the Spirit of God and the spirit of the world, or of antichrist.

In conformity with this unerring rule let us examine the admonition of Peter, which we have placed at the head of this article. It is given as a finality, admitting of no amendment, of no abridgment, of no alteration. "Finally." This word is used not only to express in this place irrevocable decision, but also legitimate deduction from the instructions contained in the context, in which the duties of all the saints to God and to men are distinctly and authoritatively laid down; as citizens of the world, to kings and governors, magistrates and rulers, of wives to husbands, children to parents, and of servants to masters. These are the instructions immediately preceding, and the "finally" of our text is expressive of the general summing up of what they amount to, or the unanimity of consent with which they must be accepted by all who are of God, all who are to be held in fellowship as "elect, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience," etc.

"Finally, be ye all of one mind." Unanimity of sentiment is indispensable to church fellowship. Of the church, in her original organization at Pentecost, we are informed that her constituents gladly received, or heard, the doctrine of the apostles, that their union was so perfect that they were of one heart and one soul. They on whom God had poured out his Spirit were pricked in their hearts, gladly received the word of the apostles, were baptized in that faith and order, continued steadfast in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship. They could not possibly be in the latter, if not in the former, for if they were of God they would hear the apostles, according to the infallible rule copied from the apostle John, and if any one of them stood not in the apostles' doctrine, his spirit was of the world, and not of God. No one was allowed to dissent from the apostles' decisions on any one of those positions taken by them, on the plea that he had a right to his opinion independent of the apostles, or of the church of God in which apostolic rule and order are maintained. The apostles have not so decided, that if any man teach otherwise from their instructions that it is only a matter of opinion, and he has a right to such opinion, and his brethren and the church should tolerate such independence. No one is to be recognized as being of God who does not yield every opposite opinion, and bow to the decision of the holy apostles. Paul says, "If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words," etc., he is proud, knowing nothing; that is, knowing nothing of the things of the Spirit of God. How can he, if his spirit is of this world, and not of God? No man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man that is in him; even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. They are spiritually discerned, therefore the natural man cannot know them, and consequently he knows nothing, and in his blindness and ignorance he dotes about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, etc. From all such the command of God through the apostles is, "Withdraw thyself;" and all who are of God will hear this last, as well as all other of the apostles' commands and decisions, admonitions and exhortations.

As all the fraternity of the household of God are required to be of one mind, as our apostle has decided, then it follows, of course, that no member of the brotherhood has a right, or can be tolerated by the church, in holding sentiments or opinions discordant with the mind of the church, which is based upon the decisions of the apostles. How can the church of God be distinguished from the world, or from antichrist, if there be no unity of faith, no unanimity of sentiment, no agreement in doctrine and practice? It is indispensable to the existence of an orderly gospel church that all her members should be of one mind, and to be of but one mind; it is equally indispensable that all shall be of one spirit. If all are born of the Spirit, and led by the Spirit of God, then all will have the mind of Christ, and in that mind there is unity. That mind is always in perfect harmony with all the teachings of the apostles, and will recognize their high authority, as inspired judges of the spiritual tribes, to establish forever the order of the church of Christ.

But, one demands of us, Have I not a right to my own opinion? Must I pin my faith on the sleeve of another? While we believe that all intelligent beings must have settled convictions and opinions of their own, and as members of the human family no man or set of men has a right to domineer over the conscience or judgment of his or their fellow men, and while as citizens of the states and nations freedom of thought and independence of opinion is the inalienable right of every man, so far as relates to the authority of his fellow men to control his thoughts, provided, however, that he, in his freedom of thought, does not infringe upon the equal rights of others, by entertaining unwarrantable thoughts or malicious feelings against his neighbors, yet, while admitting all this independence of thought to men of the world, we at the same time hold and contend that as a member of the body of Christ no one has a right to entertain thoughts or opinions independently of the faith of the church to which he belongs. This point the apostle has settled in our text: "Be ye all of one mind."

When called out of the world we are commanded to renounce the world and its doctrine, spirit and opinions, and on the profession of faith in Christ we professed to gladly receive the doctrine of the apostles, to take on us the yoke of Christ, to learn of him, and to take his word as the man of our counsel, the standard of our faith and the rule of our practice. In short, we relinquished all claim to an independent position, we gave ourselves to the Lord, and by his will, to one another, were baptized into one body, surrendered our individuality, became all one in Christ, a perfect unit; no more our own, for we were bought with a price; members of Christ, and members of one another. No reservation of rights which we did not hold in common with the church of the living God.

As to the right of thought, take for example the case of Peter with Simon Magus. How terribly sharp was his rebuke: "I perceive that the thought of thy heart is not right. Repent of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee." Upon the plea of independence and right to think differently from the doctrine of the church, how is heresy to be detected and disposed of? The divine rule enjoins on the church to reject an heretic after the first and second admonition. Heresy is understood to be thoughts and words which are opposite to, or not in harmony with, the doctrine of Christ, as laid down by the apostles and held by the church. They were heretics who resisted Paul, as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, and Paul describes them as being of the sort which creep into houses, who lead captive silly women. He says they are heady, high-minded, and lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power (or authority over them) thereof, and he adds, "From such turn away." Timothy is commanded to "shun profane and vain babblings; for they will increase unto more ungodliness; and their word will eat as doth a canker: of whom is Hymenaeus and Philetus; who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some." There are many such examples of heresy recorded, and the peremptory command in every case is, "From such withdraw thyself."

Now it must be seen that the church of God has no right to tolerate a diversity of sentiments or opinions on any matter of faith or practice which has been established by the authority of Christ, through his holy apostles. While on every matter only involving personal interests or rights we are admonished to be lenient, kind, forbearing, longsuffering and gentle, we are not allowed to trifle with the order of the church as positively established by divine authority. Those who are unwilling to yield their own independence, or who claim the right to dissent from the rules and authority of Christ in his church, should never be admitted to membership. Except they become as little children they cannot truly enter the kingdom of God; this is an indispensable prerequisite to membership in the church of God. No church can be all of one mind where this rule is not strictly adhered to.

It has been thought by some that there are exceptions to these divinely established rules; that the church has no authority over our worldly matters, such as belong to our domestic or political relations with mankind. If that be so, why did our Lord require that we render to Caesar the things that belong to Caesar, and to God the things that belong to God? The apostles have laid down rules which are binding on all Christians, to regulate all their social, civil, political and domestic relations in the church and in the world. This fact is overlooked by many, and quite repudiated by others, but it is nevertheless true. They have given no rules for the world to be governed by; the world is not responsible to the church, nor the church to the world; the kingdom of Christ is not of the world, nor are the governments of the world of the church; they are quite separate and distinct. The apostles only sit on their twelve thrones to judge the twelve tribes of Israel. "Them that are without God judgeth." All within the precincts of the kingdom of Christ are in their social relations to associate only as the apostles have directed. This department embraces the social relations of husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, people and magistrates, rulers and ruled, and we hold that the apostles have clearly laid down and explained to the church of God the laws of Christ, commanding Christians to be governed by them.

By his law the Christian can have but one wife; the parent must provide for those of his household, or he denies the faith. Children must honor and obey their parents; servants must honor and faithfully serve their masters, and every Christian, by the law of Christ, is to submit to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king, as supreme, or to the governor, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers and for the praise of them that do well, and every soul is to be in subjection to the higher powers. They are commanded to pay tribute, and, as good law-abiding citizens, render honor to whom honor, and tribute to whom tribute is due.

Therefore, if any man seeks to evade the laws of the house of God by denying the right of the church, or of his brethren, to meddle with his politics, or his secret lodges, or oath-bound covenants, it is an evident mark of disloyalty to the King of Zion, and a virtual repudiation of the authority of Christ in his church over his members. Can the admonition of our text be duly regarded if conflicting views be entertained by her members? Is it possible they can all be of one mind if a portion of the members are allowed to deny responsibility to the church, and regard any part of their walk and deportment as being beyond the jurisdiction of the church to which dissenters profess to belong? Can two or more walk together except they are agreed? To be all of one mind in the church, as the divine law requires, can only be practicable where all the members are required to receive and continue steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, withdrawing from all who depart from the faith.

We cannot repudiate the apostles' instructions, decisions, admonitions and exhortations and still be a church of Christ, nor can we tolerate in our churches such as the apostles command us to withdraw ourselves from, without repudiating them and their doctrine; nor can we repudiate the apostles, as enthroned in judgment over the church of Christ, and still retain Christ as our King; for when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, then shall his apostles also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. If the apostles do not sit over us in judgment, then neither does Christ preside over us as members of his spiritual kingdom. The church of God is the body of Christ. The necessity of unity in the body, harmony in all the members, is strikingly set forth in the figure of a perfect body. A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways, and if the members of Christ be not all of one mind, where is our stability? If in the body one hand claims to be independent of the body, not moved by the same volition, but by some spasmodic or rebellious impulse, it cannot work in harmony with the other. If one foot resolves to journey southward and the other northward, the rebellion of both against the government of the body would prevent the travel of the whole body. Or, if to compromise the matter, the feet be each in turn to have its way, the unstable body alternately swayed by its refractory members would, like the pendulum of a clock, vibrate back and forth, and make no progress. But the rule to be applied in case of such disorder and schism is, If thy foot offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee; or if it be the hand, or the eye, or any other member, and let all be of one mind. Let those who are refractory, if they cannot by gospel rule be reclaimed, go to their own company, where they can enjoy their independence of the body among their kindred spirits. Of the church it is said, "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye [all her members] are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism. One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all."

I PETER 3:18,19

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit: by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison."

Sister Patterson of South Dansville, N.Y., has expressed a desire to know how we understand this scripture, especially the eighteenth verse. We will give such views as we have, hoping they may be edifying to her, and others who desire to know the truth.

The context, and almost the whole of the epistle, is devoted to the encouragement of the persecuted and scattered saints, with instruction and solemn admonition and exhortation. As the saints were then suffering severely for the truth's sake, the apostle gives them, and us, to understand that it is the will of God that his people shall suffer for well-doing. He says, "For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing." It is undoubtedly good for us to suffer chastisement for our faults, and in such a manner as the Lord in wisdom may direct, whether by his ministration of the rod, or by allowing the enemies of truth to persecute us. But good as his fatherly chastisements may be for our faults, it is far better when by his will we are enabled to bear the frowns, reproaches and cruel persecutions of our adversaries, for a strict and conscientious adherence to the truth and order of the gospel. If all manner of evil be said of us falsely for Christ's sake, or because we honor and obey him in all things, then may we rejoice and be exceeding glad. The apostle says, "If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the spirit of glory, and of God, resteth upon you: on their part he is evil spoken of; but on your part he is glorified. But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil doer, or as a busybody in other men's matters. Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf." As an encouragement to the saints thus suffering for righteousness' sake, the text proposed for our consideration, was written. "For Christ also has once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust; that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh; but quickened by the spirit."

While in this text the great doctrine of redemption, reconciliation to God, and salvation through the blood and righteousness of our Lord Jesus Christ is clearly stated, a bright and glorious example is presented for the encouragement of the saints, unto whom it is given, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake. Are we to be falsely accused, our names cast out as evil, our rights trampled upon, our liberties taken from us, and our very existence disputed by wicked and malicious men, and must we, when guilty of no crime, tamely submit to all this? Look at this example. Behold the beloved of the Father, the adored of all holy beings in earth and heaven, the just, the holy, the immaculate Lamb of God, suffering for sins. Ah yes, for sins! For himself bear our sins in his own body on the cross. He suffered for sins; the just for the unjust. As the holy and the just One, his Father from heaven bears record of him, the Holy Ghost as such descends from heaven upon him, the law and the prophets testify of him. The saints inspired of God bear witness saying, "Just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints." And the very court which delivered him to be crucified was constrained to acquit him of all the false and malicious charges made against him. "I find no fault at all in this just man," said Pilate. No guile was in his mouth; yet as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth; not even to assert or plead his innocence. Yet to bring his people to God, he must suffer and die. He manifested his character as the just by his exact obedience to the just and righteous law of God, and in all the complete satisfaction rendered to all its jots and tittles; and his perfect right to that character is vindicated by his resurrection from the dead. He was put to death in the flesh; but quickened, and justified by the Spirit.

If then it was the will of God that his only begotten Son, in whom he is well pleased; so holy, so just, separate from sinners, and above all, one so much higher than the heavens, should suffer, shall we be surprised, discouraged or disheartened that it is the will of God that his people, his members, shall participate in his sufferings? Shall we desire to know him and the power of his resurrection, and object to the fellowship of his sufferings, and conformity to his death? Though holy, just and pure, it was just that he should suffer, bleed and die, to bring us to God; for all the iniquities of all his people were laid upon him, and he by relationship to them, possessed the right to redeem them, to bear their griefs, carry their sorrows, and assure the chastisement of their peace, and heal them with his stripes. As their surety, God in justice laid on him the iniquities of them all, and he in equal justice, bore them in his own body on the tree, and put away their sins by the sacrifice of himself. Those for whom he died were enemies to God by wicked works, unrighteous, ungodly and unjust, and by nature children of wrath, even as others. But God who is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us with Christ. “He was delivered for our offenses, and was raised again for our justification,” and we are freely justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.

Here the great object of his suffering is made known: it was to bring us to God. This end could not be attained in any other way. It was not possible that the blood of bulls, goats or other victims, which had been offered continually under the law should cleanse us from guilt and purge our conscience from dead works, or bring us to God. But he by his own blood has entered into the holiest of all, even unto heaven itself, having obtained eternal redemption for us. Thus has he by one offering perfected forever them that are sanctified. In the accomplishment of this, our text reminds us that he was put to death in the flesh; but quickened by the Spirit. His Spirit being the life and immortality of the Eternal God, he could not in that Spirit die, nor be recognized as under the law which we had transgressed. “But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death.” “For as much as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death.” “The word was made flesh and dwelt among us.” “He was made of a woman, made under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law.” “He took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham” “If ye be Christ’s, then are ye Abraham’s seed, and heirs according to the promise.” “But he was quickened by the Spirit.” That is, by the spirit of life and immortality, which now dwells in the hearts of his saints, of which they are born, when born by the Spirit, and by which they are sealed to the day of redemption. “But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by his Spirit that dwelleth in you (Romans 8:11).”

This Spirit which raised up the crucified body of Jesus from the dead is the same that we now have an earnest of, and shall quicken and animate our resurrected bodies in the world to come. It is the Spirit of life, of immortality, and is expressly called the Spirit of Christ. “If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” But as many as have this Spirit of God, they are the sons of God; for it is only by being born of this Spirit that our relation to God as sons is, or can be, made manifest. The apostle informs us moreover that this resurrection Spirit is the same by which he went and preached to the spirits in prison. To Abel, Enoch, Noah, and to all the Old Testament saints, patriarchs and prophets who were born of this resurrection Spirit, and through it were savingly acquainted with him, held communion with him, and by him found access to the throne of grace. This is the Spirit of which he testified by Isaiah, saying, “The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek, he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound.” Those prisoners to whom he preached deliverance, he did not go to them in his fleshly body; for he had not in their day become incarnate; but he went to them in this Spirit, and by this Spirit dwelt in them. We are told that they searched diligently what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it (the spirit of Christ in them) testified beforehand of his sufferings and of the glory that should follow. Christ, by his Spirit, was in the prophets, and in the Old Testament saints, and in them preached; as instanced by Peter in the connection of our subject, in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing. Noah by this Spirit was a preacher of righteousness to the anti-diluvians. And certainly it was by this Spirit of Christ that God at sundry times and in divers manner spake to the fathers by the prophets, the same by which he has in these last times spoken to us by his Son. It is the same Spirit which raised up Christ from the dead, the same that was shed upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost, and the same which (in measure) dwells in all who are born of the Spirit, in all ages. It is called, as we have seen, “The Spirit of the Lord God,” by which the head of the church is anointed, and identified as the Christ, which name and title signifies the Anointed. Christ publicly declared this scripture fulfilled in him, manifestly, or in the eyes of those whom he was addressing, when he read to them in the book of Isaiah the prophet, “The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound (Isaiah 61:1,2).”

The spirits in prison to whom Peter says he, by the Spirit of his resurrection, went and preached, are by Isaiah called captives, to whom he went and proclaimed liberty. Prisoners, to whom he by that Spirit went and preached the opening of the prison doors. To them Zechariah 9:9-13 says “Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the fold of an ass.” “And he shall speak peace, (or preach good tidings) unto the heathen: and his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth. As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water. Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope: even to day do I declare that I will render double unto thee.” These must be the prisoners to whom Christ by his resurrection Spirit went and preached deliverance. They were prisoners in a perishing condition, in a pit where there is no water, yet prisoners of hope; for God had promised them deliverance.

Every saint may find an illustration of this subject in his or her personal experience. Only look back to the rock whence ye were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye were digged. Once were ye under arrest, proved guilty, condemned, sentenced and thrown in prison; the walls were strong, the bars were massive, and your escape by human power or agency, impossible. The apostle Paul most clearly attributes the quickening, enlightening and salvation of the saints to the Spirit and power of the resurrection of our Lord, as also the faith by which the saints believe on him. “The eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come: And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, Which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all (Ephesians 1:18-23).”

Carnal professors may believe according to their powers of human agencies, schools, tracts and moral suasion, etc. but God’s people believe according to the working of that mighty power of God which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead, and exalted him far above all heavens. Thus we see that the Spirit and power of the resurrection of Christ is the Spirit and power by which the risen and glorified Savior went and preached to Abel, Enoch, Noah and Abraham, who rejoiced to see his day, saw it, and were glad. And the same resurrection life, power and Spirit, is that by which Gentile sinners, embracing the saints at Ephesus, and all the faithful in Christ Jesus everywhere, are quickened and delivered from bondage, and from prison houses, and brought into the liberty of the gospel. They are raised up together with him, and made to sit together with him in those heavenly places, which are far above all principality, power, dominion or government in this world, or that which is to come. This resurrection Spirit and power is implanted in all the saints; by it they all were quickened and born; by it they are sealed to the day of the resurrection of their mortal bodies; for if it dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit, which dwelleth in you. (See Romans 8:11.) Well might Peter say, and every saint respond, “Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy bath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, To an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time (1 Peter 1:3-5).”

I PETER 3:18-20

In our last number, Brother J. W. Livingston called for our views on I Peter 3:18-20:

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit: By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; Which sometime were disobedient, when once the longsuffering of God waiting in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water."

In our attempt to comply with the request of our brother to give our views on this text, which has puzzled those of more light and understanding than we possess, we hope we may not be left to darken counsel by words without knowledge, or to embarrass, instead of edifying, those who honestly enquire after the truth. We frankly confess that the latter part of this text has been very dark and obscure to our mind, and what we shall present on the subject is only to be regarded as our views, until at least the reader shall find them sustained by the testimony of the scriptures.

In the context, the apostle has been treating upon the new and spiritual birth, which is of incorruptible seed, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever; in distinction from that birth which is of corruptible seed, or of the flesh, which (like grass) is corruptible, and the glory of which is as the flower of the grass, which must also perish, or fall away. The subject of this new birth, like the living and ever abiding word from which it proceeds, must live and abide forever; and those who are so born, as new born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word (that is, of the word of God which liveth and abideth forever), as it is congenial with the production of the new birth which is by the same word.

Having drawn the line between the distinct elements of which the Christian, in his present state, is composed; the one of the flesh, which is grass, corruptible, mortal, and perishable; the other, of incorruptible seed by the word of God, and therefore, incorruptible and abiding, he goes on to show that in our earthly and fleshly standing, the relationship in the flesh is not annulled, nor changed by our new birth; the production of the corruptible and that of the incorruptible seed are brought into personal identity, for the time being, but still in opposition to each other, insomuch that the spirit wars against the flesh and the flesh against the spirit; or, the corruptible against the incorruptible, until the grass shall wither, and the flower thereof shall pass away. Having defined this subject in the most lucid manner, Peter proceeds to show some of the obligations which are binding on Christians in their personal relations to each other and to mankind, in the flesh, as well as what is enjoined on them as children of the spiritual and immortal birth. In their spiritual identity they are “a chosen generation” - to show forth the praises of him who hath called them out of darkness into his marvelous light. In their flesh they are admonished to have their conversation honest among the Gentiles, and to submit to every ordinance (or constitutional law) of man, for the Lord’s sake; whether it be to the king, as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers. Honor all men, love the brotherhood, fear God, honor the King. “Servants,” that is Christian servants, for Peter as an apostle has nothing to do with any but Christians, “be subject to your masters, with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.” The same as Christians in their fleshly relations are bound by the laws of Christ to be loyal to kings and governors, or to whatever form of constitutional government they may be placed in the providence of God, to let every soul be subject to the higher power. “Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands,” and in all our fleshly relations, to observe the same rules and authorities which would be binding on us if we were not Christians. And as this fidelity is enjoined on all Christians, not only to the good and gentle, who may have dominion over them, but also to the froward; the apostle admits that a faithful obedience to these laws of Christ will, beyond all doubt, subject them sometimes to suffer unjustly from the dominion of tyrants, still he says it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well-doing, than for evil-doing, and then adds the words of our text, giving us a pattern and example in the person of our divine Lord and Master.

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust." He would not call on his children to suffer unjustly from the froward and tyrannical, who may have a brief authority over them, if he had not himself suffered the just for the unjust. The will of God was so that Christ should suffer, though holy and harmless, and separate from sinners; although no guile was found in his mouth. He did not object to drink the bitter cup, which was pressed to his holy lips, saying that he had violated no law, transgressed no rule that was binding on him, but recognizing his Father's will in the matter, he said, when pressed with the unutterable agony, "If it be possible, let this cup pass, nevertheless not my will, but thy will be done." Learn then, ye suffering Christians, to bear with patience so far as men are concerned, and when reviled, revile not again. Christ suffered for sins - not for sins which he had committed, for he knew no sin. Holy, pure, spotless and immaculate in every respect, he was emphatically just, but he suffered for the sins of the unjust. He was crucified by wicked hands, of those whose wicked hearts were full of violence. But who were they? The Jews and Romans! The men of Israel and the Gentiles were the immediate agents in the bloody tragedy on Calvary!

"But knotty whips and jagged thorns
In vain do I accuse;
In vain I blame the Roman bands,
And the more spiteful Jews-

'Twere you, my sins, my cruel sins,
His chief tormentors were;
Each of my crimes became a nail,
And unbelief the spear."

The sufferings of Christ were vicarious. He suffered the just for the unjust. The Lord has laid on him the iniquities of all his people. He was delivered for our offences, and was raised from the dead for our justification. And he has himself said, "I lay down my life for the sheep." The chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed. The sufferer was personally just, but those for whom he suffered were legally unjust. He was as a lamb without spot or blemish; but those for whom he bore the penalty of the divine law were guilty sinners, and by nature, children of wrath, even as others; and the object or design of his sufferings was that he might bring us to God. "All we, like sheep, have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." There was no other way to bring us to God, or to reclaim us from our wanderings, but by redemption; and none but Jesus had the right of redemption, he being the nearest of kin; and none but Jesus had the ability to redeem us to God, for there is salvation in none other. It was not possible that the blood of bulls or heifers could purge us from our sins, and in our sins we could not see God. The design then of the atonement was special, definite and exclusively for his people. The iniquities which were laid on him he has put away by the sacrifice of himself; he bore them in his own body on the tree; and by one offering he has perfected them that are sanctified.

"Being put to death in the flesh". The second Adam, which is the Lord from heaven, was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, that he, by the grace of God, might taste death for every one for whom he was delivered up. The Word which was with God, and which was God, in whom was life, (that life which is the light of men) was made flesh, and dwelt among us. His flesh was indispensable for the work of redemption. He took not on him the nature of angels, for in the nature of angels he could not taste of death for men. For men in the flesh he was to die, and to represent them in the flesh in which they were sinners, he must be made flesh, and stand before the law in the likeness of sinful flesh. He was, therefore, made of a woman, made under the law, that he might redeem us from under the law. Bear in mind the theme of the apostle in the connection of our text, the flesh and the spirit, the incorruptible and the corruptible seeds - the flesh which is grass, and the word of God which liveth and abideth forever. The Word of God, which is the fountain of all our spiritual life, the Lord from heaven, etc., to represent us in the flesh and die the just for the unjust, must be made flesh, or take on him a fleshly body that could suffer and die, in which to be put to death. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death; that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." He was put to death in the flesh, not in the spirit which liveth and abideth forever, for that aside from his flesh was immortal and could not die; and hence his assumption of flesh, that he might taste death, or be put to death in the flesh. By the term flesh, in regard to what Christ took on him for the purpose of suffering, we understand according to Christ's own explanation to be 'That which is born of the flesh;" namely, the seed of Abraham, or that which his children are partakers of; soul, body, and all that Adam was, when man became a living soul. Before he took on him a body in which to suffer and a soul which was poured out to death, or which was made an offering for sin, (Isa. 53:10) he was the Lord in heaven, and the anointed Mediator, in whom all the Church of God was chosen, and in whom God had blessed them with all spiritual blessings, before the foundation of the world. But for the suffering of death he took the same nature on him, in which his people had sinned, a body in which he bore our sins, a soul that was exceedingly sorrowful even unto death, and a spirit which could be troubled, could groan, and which he committed to his Father, when he yielded up the ghost on the cross. His whole person, including soul, body, and spirit, was just, holy, and pure. The holy thing which was conceived in the womb of the virgin, and born of her, was unblemished, undefiled, spotless, and pure, although he was made sin for us, or in other words, all the sins of his people were laid upon him, and he was legally held responsible for them, and did suffer the full weight and penalty of the law to the complete satisfaction of Eternal Justice, for them, the same as though they had been committed personally by him; for the Lord had laid them on him, and he was able to put them away by the sacrifice of himself. It was in his being found in fashion as a man in the flesh that the law could recognize him as the legal representative of his people in their flesh, in which they had sinned, and in the flesh to put him to death. The importance of the doctrine of the incarnation is most vital, for John testifies that, "Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God; and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God; and this is that spirit of anti-Christ, whereof ye have heard that it should come: and even now already is in the world." God was manifest in the flesh. All fulness dwelt in him. All the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in him bodily; and all the fulness of his Church also dwelt in him, and is complete in him who is the head of all principality and power. The spirit of Immortality, the power of an endless life by which he is made a priest forever after the order of Melchesidec, was in him, as the life which was with the Father and was manifested, I John 1:1,2. And which God hath given to us in him, I John 5:11,12. He was put to death in the flesh.

"But quickened by the spirit." By what spirit was he quickened? By the spirit of life and immortality which was made flesh and dwelt among us. That spirit which is the fountain and source of regeneration of which Peter is treating in connection with our text, and which he distinguishes from all flesh which is grass, which is corruptible, which can die or which is mortal. His flesh qualified him to die; but his flesh, in itself, aside from the indwelling, the Eternal Spirit, through which he offered himself without spot to God, had no power to raise from the dead. It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing. "God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit," etc. His simply dying in the flesh did not of itself demonstrate his divinity; for all flesh is grass, all die, all flesh is subject to death; but the power of his resurrection shows that Christ was in that flesh; and being quickened by the Spirit, justifies the character which he assumed, and proves that he is the Son of God, and the complete Savior of his people. The spirit which raised him up from the dead is not only a life producing spirit, but it is life itself. Thus Paul, in discriminating between the flesh and the spirit, says, "And if Christ be in you, the body is dead, because of sin: but the spirit is life, because of righteousness. But if the spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you. Rom. 8:10,11. Thus clearly identifying the spirit that quickened the crucified body of Christ, and which dwells in us by regeneration now, and which shall ultimately resurrect the mortal bodies of all who are born of that incorruptible seed, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever. In this flesh, like grass, even Jesus could bleed and die - pour out his soul, yield up his spirit, and slumber with the dead; but in the Eternal Spirit of life and immortality, he had power to take up his life again, and destroy death, and swallow up death in victory. His crucified body was raised up from the dead, by this quickening spirit, and by this quickening spirit, in regeneration, all the saints are born of incorruptible seed by the Word of God, and by this self same spirit the mortal bodies shall finally be clothed in immortality - and be fashioned and made like unto his raised and glorified body. "For whom he did foreknow, them he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren." The spirit which brought again from the dead the body of our Lord Jesus Christ is the same spirit that now dwells in all who are born of God, by which they are sealed unto the day of redemption, to-wit: the redemption of our body. And it is called the spirit of the Lord God, which is upon him, by which he is anointed to preach glad tidings to the meek, etc., Isa. 6 1:1, and that "By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison." The spirits in prison were those unto whom Christ was anointed to preach good tidings, whose prison doors he came to open and whom he came to deliver out of their prison houses. If they were not prisoners, they would not need deliverance. They were prisoners, yet they were prisoners of hope, Zech. 9:12. As Paul says, "In hope of eternal life which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began." They were captives, sold under sin; lawful captives, but Christ has led their captivity captive, and received gifts for men. In one general view, all whom Christ came to redeem were prisoners, and his ministry to them all is by the same spirit of the Lord God, by which he was raised up from the dead, and his preaching or proclamation of deliverance to them is by that spirit; whether we understand it as applicable to his personal manifestations in their individual experience respectively, or through the prophets, apostles, evangelists, teachers, and pastors, or by whatever gifts the saints are edified; for, there are different gifts, but all by the same spirit, and that is the spirit of Christ. The prophets sought diligently to know what, or what manner of time the spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it spake of his sufferings and of the glory that should follow. This spirit is that with which the apostles were endowed from above, and which came upon them like a mighty rushing wind from heaven on the day of Pentecost. And, in short, if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

"These spirits which were in prison, were sometime disobedient." And in all time, until called by grace, of every redeemed child it may be said there has been a time in which they lived in disobedience to God, and in opposition to this spirit of life, of truth, of holiness - and the apostle refers to an instance in the days of Noah, when the ark was being prepared. The spirit of Christ was then in Noah, who, by it, was a preacher of righteousness; but his preaching by that spirit was resisted by the antediluvians. And Stephen charged the Jews, "Ye do always resist the Spirit, as your fathers did, so do ye," etc. And all who oppose the truth as it is in Jesus, do also in like manner resist the spirit. We do not, of course, mean that God, the Holy Ghost, attempts to operate on their hearts, and they successfully resist and prevent him. Such a sentiment would represent the sinner as being stronger than God. But the spirit of Christ as it exists in all the saints is opposed by the flesh which warreth against it, and by the world which cannot receive it, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him. Christ came and preached to you, dear brother, and to you, dear sister, when your spirit was in prison; when arrested in your mad career of sin and folly, quickened and made sensible that you were a guilty sinner against a holy God; when you, as a prisoner, were under arrest, and brought before the awful bar of Justice; when you were compelled to plead guilty to every charge; when your sins were set before you, and Justice with uplifted sword demanded satisfaction, and your mouth was stopped, and you stood guilty before God - were you not bound hand and foot, so that with your hand you could do nothing to expiate your guilt, and with your feet you could not run away from or escape the avenger of blood? Strong chains of darkness bound you in your cell, and you could not open the prison door. Were you not then a spirit in prison, until the anointed Jesus came and preached peace and salvation, life and liberty to your captive spirit?

And are there not seasons with old Christians when they find themselves shut up as with hewn stones, so that they cannot come forth, and the prison none can open until Jesus by his spirit comes to preach to you?

He went by this spirit and preached unto the spirits in prison, when he entered the dark domains of death, when he dwelt among the dead. This was loud preaching to them; it told them that he had bowed his heavens and come down, that he had descended to the lowest parts of the earth; that the iron gates were opened to him, and that he had come to destroy death and the grave, and to deliver them who were all their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death. When he arose, he opened the doors of death, and destroyed the power of the grave. And as he arose as the first-fruits of them that slept, he gave the assurance that he would also quicken from the dead, and in due time raise up and glorify the redeemed bodies of all his saints who sleep in the dust of the earth.

To illustrate this bearing of our subject, the apostle uses the figure of the ark, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved. This he calls a figure; and as a figure, sets forth the doctrine of salvation through or by grace. As Noah and his family were preserved from the destroying waters of the deluge in the ark, so Christ and all the spiritual family are saved from wrath, in the church of God. And as, while the ark was being prepared, some were disobedient; so while God is gathering into his church the heirs of immortality, some are disobedient, and some who are called by grace are conscious that they were in that number.

"The like figure, whereunto baptism doth also now save us." Just as the temporal deliverance of Noah and his family in the ark was a figure of salvation by grace, so is also christian baptism a like figure, signifying the same thing. Baptism cannot save us from the curse of the law, or the blood of Christ might have been spared; neither can it put away the filth of the flesh, which is grass, but it is the answer of a good conscience toward God. It is in answer to an eternal principle implanted in us by an incorruptible seed; it shows our willing subjection and allegiance to Jesus Christ, and our joyful espousal of his cause, and open profession of his name. And at the same time sets forth the doctrine of the death, burial and resurrection of Christ, and of our being buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, we also are to walk in newness of life.

Brother Livingston, we have made rather a long article of this, but if any thing herein written shall be of service to you, or to any of our readers, we shall have cause to be thankful to God. May you and they carefully and prayerfully compare our views with the infallible standard of truth, and endorse our views only so far as they are clearly sustained by the scriptures of truth.

I PETER III. 21.

"The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ."

Baptism, according to this text, has a figurative import, and as a figure of our salvation, Peter classifies it with the figure of the temporal salvation of Noah and his family in the ark; the former figure is like the latter figure. Hence we understand that both figures refer to and set forth a spiritual reality in reference to the manner of the everlasting salvation of the church of God. The Spirit of Christ was in Noah as in other patriarchs and prophets of the Lord. And Noah, as a patriarch, a preacher of righteousness, the representative of a family and progeny to be saved from the deluge, and as a builder of the ark which was to contain all that God had ordained to that temporal salvation, was an eminent type of Christ. Christ is the builder of the spiritual ark, the church, which contains all that God has from the beginning chosen to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth. He is also their spiritual progenitor, and they are accounted to him for a generation. And with him, in the church, they shall outride all the storms and floods, which shall sweep away the ungodly, and rest forever on the mount of God. Salvation by grace was clearly set forth in the figure of Noah's deliverance. And as also is the ordinance of christian baptism an expressive figure of the same salvation of the people of God. It is not, like the Jewish purifications, designed for the putting away the filth of the flesh, but it is the answer of a good conscience towards God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Christian baptism, as instituted by our Lord, and practiced by the primitive saints, sets forth a death, burial and resurrection, and is applicable to, first, the death, burial and resurrection of Christ; second, to the experience of saints, who are slain by the law, and raised up from condemnation and wrath by the application of the blood and righteousness of the now risen and glorified Redeemer; and third, it sets forth the dissolution, burial and ultimate resurrection of the bodies of all the saints of God.

1. The death, burial and resurrection of Christ is called a baptism. “I have,” said he, “a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!” The sons of Zebedee were to be baptized also with that baptism wherewith Christ was to be baptized. Paul says the saints addressed in his epistle to the Romans, were also buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so they should walk in newness of life. Hence it is our understanding that the whole church of God was represented in Christ, as to her spiritual identity, when he died on the cross, slumbered in the tomb, and when he arose from the dead, and ascended up on high. When he died for all, then were all dead, and they were quickened together with him, raised up together, and made to sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus. In this baptism we are truly saved. “The law has dominion over a man as long as he liveth.” Romans viii. 1. Christ as the embodiment of the church, takes our law place, and that lawfully, not making void the law, but establishing it; for in him the law finds the church, and makes its stern demand. He asks for no abatement of the demand, but promptly meets and completely cancels it. The sword awakes against the fellow of the Lord of Hosts. Deep waters come into his soul, and all the billows pass over him. Immersed in death, the law can ask no more; the dreadful debt is paid. The yawning grave receives the slaughtered body, and closes its doors upon him, recognizing in his person all for whom he died. This is baptism, but it is not all. His flesh must see no corruption. ~The pains of death cannot hold him long. As in baptism the body is immersed but also raised up to make the figure complete, so Christ must arise from the dead, and bring immortality into light in his resurrection. Under the law he dies, but quickened by the Spirit he rises, and brings up from the dead all his sheaves with him. As except a corn of wheat falleth into the earth and dieth, it abideth alone, and the germ of its production remaineth undeveloped, but if it die it will bring forth much fruit, simply by developing that which was in it,so in the death and resurrection of Christ, his people are buried with him by baptism into death, wherein the extreme penalty of the law being executed, the law can henceforth have no more dominion over them. Now, quickened by the Spirit, they arise, not to a legal bondage state again, but they arise to walk in newness of life, and are married to, and become one with him who is raised from the dead, and are no more under the law, but under grace. "Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law, by the body of Christ, that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God." - Romans vii. 4.

2. Christian baptism sets forth the experience of the saints. When the commandment comes, sin revives, and they die. They are slain, and all their legal hopes are cast off, and they are buried from their former element, and raised up from the horrible pit, and out of the miry clay, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. Dead to, and buried from, the rudiments of the law, and the beggarly elements of the world, they are crucified to the world, and the world is crucified to them; they are raised up to participate in all the privileges of the church of God.

3. The ultimate, resurrection of our bodies from their graves, and ascension to glory, is also embraced in the figurative import of gospel baptism. One of the strong arguments of Paul, in proving the final resurrection of the bodies of the saints, is presented in these words: “Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?” - 1 Cor. xv. 29. Baptism was evidently designed to signify a resurrection, and would be divested of its doctrinal import if there is to be no final resurrection of the bodies of the saints from the dead.

1 PETER IV. 4-7; GENESIS VI. 5-8.

We have always regarded the passages proposed for consideration among the most obscure and hidden parts of the Scriptures, and what we now venture to write upon the subject, is humbly submitted to the consideration of our readers with much hesitation and trembling. Brethren will read our remarks carefully, and compare them with the infallible standard of truth, and wherein they may find our views at fault, kindly point out to us the more excellent way, and their faithful words shall not break our bones, but be an excellent oil.

In the first passage proposed, the apostle, after having spoken of the two distinct elements personally identified in the christian, namely, the flesh and the spirit, and having drawn the line between them according to the doctrine of Christ, that that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, proceeds to enforce the exhortations with which all the apostolic writings abound: to mortify the deeds of the flesh, and crucify the old man with his lusts, and put on the new man which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness. These exhortations are urged in our text and its connection from the consideration that Christ has suffered for us in the flesh, that we are crucified with him, that the body is dead because of sin, that we are dead, and our life is hid with Christ in God, and although dead with Christ, nevertheless we live; yet not we, but Christ liveth in us; and the life which we now live in the flesh, we live by the faith of the Son of God, who hath loved us, and given himself for us. - Gal. ii. 20. Forasmuch then as Christ has suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves with the same mind; for he that hath suffered in the flesh, hath ceased from sin; that he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God. He then particularizes the manner in which those saints had formerly wrought the will of the Gentiles, in the abominations which now characterize the ungodly. "Wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess," &c. When the saints are called by grace, and become followers of God, as dear children, the world thinks it strange that they should thus renounce, and turn away from their idolatrous and fleshly pursuits, their doctrines and commandments, and become a circumcision which worship God in the spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. The world has instituted so great a variety of worldly religions, so carnal, so popular, so agreeable to every fleshly passion, and so pleasant to every fleshly palate, that they can see no necessity for singularity, or for embracing an unfashionable kind of religion. They are offended that their splendid delusions should be rejected, exposed and forsaken; and therefore they speak evil of the saints. For if any man will live godly in Christ Jesus, he shall suffer persecution; they shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for Christ's sake. But they are amenable to him who is ready to judge the quick and the dead. They are held strictly accountable to him, and whosoever shall offend one of them, shall find that it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the midst of the sea. By the quick and the dead, are meant the living and the dead. It applies to quickened sinners, for God shall judge his people; and it also applies to sinners who are dead in sins, for God shall judge the world in righteousness, at the last day, by that man whom he hath appointed. And to christians it applies, both in regard to the inward and the outward man, the body that is dead by reason of sin; and the spirit which is life because of righteousness. - See Romans viii. 10.

We come now to the sixth verse, which reads thus: For, for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit. There must always of necessity be a cause for the production of an effect. A cause is therefore stated for the preaching of the gospel, namely, that they unto whom it was preached, might be judged according to men in the flesh. Here we find the cause in the purpose of God, and not in the resolutions of mission boards, nor in the wisdom, power or contributions of men. It was and is preached to answer the precise end for which God designed it, and the accomplishment of that object it cannot fail to secure. But it was preached also to them that are dead. If we understand this declaration to mean those of former ages, under the old dispensations, it was true, for the gospel was preached in types, and set forth in shadows of good things to come, from the days of Abel, in the firstling of the flock, the unblemished lamb which he offered in sacrifice to God, and by Noah, in the building of the ark, and the souls which were saved, as by water, in a figure of like signification to that of baptism under the gospel dispensation; and those unto whom it was so preached, are literally dead. And they are judged according to men who are now in the flesh, unto whom it is preached, but who have no ear to hear, heart to love, receive or understand it. Thus, when Abel preached, Cain was wroth, and slew him, showing his carnal or fleshly propensity, the latent enmity of his carnal mind was roused, and the murderous lusts of the flesh broke forth. Men now in the flesh answer to their type, “Woe unto them, for they have gone in the way of Cain.” When Noah, who was a preacher of righteousness, was engaged in building the ark, he was resisted, mocked and ridiculed by those unto whom he presented the figure of salvation; so, under the present dispensation, Stephen testified of men in the flesh. As their fathers did, so did they always resist the Holy Ghost. Not that they could, or ever did hinder the accomplishment of the Spirit's work, but they opposed, and contended against it. But all these references, and illustrations, seem to be designed to enforce the admonition and exhortation to the saints, who are called on to crucify the old man, with its affections and lusts, and to arm themselves with that mind which the adorable Redeemer evinced when he suffered in the flesh for us, that he might bring us unto God. If we are subjects of the new and heavenly birth, we have in our carnal, corrupt and depraved nature, all the elements of men in the flesh. Our fleshly minds are the same in all respects as the carnal minds of other men; not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be; and so far as they are concerned, they are judged according to men in the flesh. To christians it was said, "If ye sow to the flesh, ye shall of the flesh reap corruption," for the fleshly soil is incapable of yielding any other crop. Paul is very clear on this point in the eighth chapter to the Romans. "Therefore, brethren," says he, "we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh, for if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." The two natures which struggle in every saint on earth, are opposite each to the other; the contrast is presented under the names by which they are designated, as flesh and spirit, old man and new man, outward man and inner man, corruption and incorruption, mortal and immortal, death and life, sin and holiness, &c., and each is traced in Scripture to its seminal or progenitive origin. That which is called flesh, is of the earth earthy; was made of the dust of the earth, subsists on the productions of the earth, cleaves to the earth, and is destined to return to the earth; it is earthly, sensual and devilish, and all its productions are according to their corrupt source. The new, spiritual, inner man, is born of God; its life is hid with Christ in God, and only appears when Chri8t, who is our life, appears. It is heavenly, and can only subsist on heavenly food, on him who is the true Bread; eating the flesh, and drinking the blood of him who came down from heaven, nor can it subsist on any other food. It is a life which we live in the flesh, but it is not the flesh, nor is it of the flesh. It is eternal life; it is immortality, and it shall never perish. It is born of God, and cannot sin, because it is born of God. It is born of the Spirit, and therefore it is spirit. And when this earthly house of our tabernacle shall be dissolved and fall, the spiritual, immortal, eternal life shall survive; it cannot die. The dust in dissolution shall go back to its original element; and when that judgment which came upon all men unto condemnation, and which has passed upon us, as judged according to men in the flesh, shall have been executed, a glorious resurrection of the bodies of all the saints awaits them. That spiritual, divine and heavenly life, which we now have in Christ, shall quicken, animate and stamp immortality upon our rising bodies, so that though now judged according to men in the flesh, though now imprisoned, and held fast for the time being, in the bondage of corruption, so that we have to cry out, O, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? We can, through grace triumphing over the flesh, with the apostle, add, I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with my mind, (the spiritual, heaven-born man,) I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh, the law of sin. Thus while in our flesh, we are judged according to men in the flesh, we live according to God in the spirit. After God, this new man has his creation in righteousness and true holiness; created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we shall walk in them. According to God, that is, according to his purpose, design, and spiritual sustenance afforded, we live; and as our immortal life is an emanation from God, it aspires to holiness, purity and godliness; above all things desiring to show forth his praises, and to glorify God in our bodies, and in our spirits, which are his.

In regard to the text, Gen. vi. 5-7, we have neither time nor space to treat largely upon the subject. God saw that the wickedness of man was great upon the earth, and expressed his determination to destroy both man and beast, by a deluge of water. The manner of making this announcement was in language calculated to impress our minds with a sense of that abhorrence with which God regards the transgressions and sins of the sons of men, as sin is the very opposite to holiness. But we cannot understand the terms "repented him," and "grieved," in the text, in the ordinary acceptation of the words, or as when used in relation to finite beings. Repentance, when applied to God, cannot mean a change either in his nature, or any of his attributes, or perfections; for we are expressly informed that with him there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning. He is of one mind, and none can turn him, and he has himself declared, "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore the sons of Jacob are not consumed." Nor are we at liberty to construe the term grief, in this case, so as to imply that God is a being of excitable passions, such as we possess. The most brutish darkness ever charged on sinful man, was in that they had supposed that God was such an one as we are, or in likening or comparing him with ourselves. His ways are not our ways, neither are his thoughts like our thoughts; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways and thoughts higher than ours. Any interpretation given to any portion of the Scriptures, which conflicts with any other portion, must be wrong, for the Scriptures are in perfect harmony. We, being finite, and consequently limited in our understanding, may fail to comprehend many portions, and perhaps all the inspired writings of the Bible, but that does not prove a defect in the Scriptures, but weakness and inability on our part. In this passage, and in what is said in the book of the prophet Jonah, of God's dealings with Ninevah, we understand that nothing more is intended than to show a change of providential dealings with men. God had borne long with the abominations of the old world, and as Peter has said, “Once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah.” God had manifested a long forbearance toward them; but their iniquities were now full, and according to the holy standard of all God’s administrations, namely, the counsel of his own will, according to which he worketh all things, the time had come for him to make known his wrath upon the vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction; and he in vindication of his own holiness, displayed his righteous displeasure against their abominations, unstopped the bottles of heaven and poured down on them the deluge, and swept them from the earth, on which he had permitted them so long to dwell, and at the same time made provision for the salvation of his chosen servant Noah, and his family, as embraced in the covenant provisions of mercy; and hence it is said, “And Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.” The whole figurative import of the subject, embracing the wickedness of men, the justice and mercy of God, is to set forth in a figure the sublime and glorious doctrine of salvation by grace, and by grace alone. For God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. There was no redeeming quality. Not one thought, not one imagination, not a work at that, or at any other time, but was evil, and evil continually. Upon the ground of human merit, none could be saved. Grace, and grace alone, could reach the case of man; but all did not find grace, neither did all desire grace. It is probable that the ante-deluvians hated the doctrine of grace then as bitterly as all Arminians of the present generations now do; but Noah found grace, because God had grace in store for him; and that grace secured him and his family in the covenant of salvation, from the waters of the flood.

From the plain import of our figure, let us then understand that a day of retribution awaits the ungodly world, when God, whose mercies have hitherto been showered down upon the just, and upon the unjust, will be withheld; when death and hell shall deliver up their dead; when he will judge the world in righteousness, and turn the wicked into hell, with all the nations that know not God, when only the subjects of his grace, embraced in the covenant of life and peace, embraced in the rainbow that encircles the throne of God and the Lamb, shall be brought into the ark, and therein lifted above the earth, and finally lodged in the mount of Jehovah's holiness, where there are pleasures for evermore. May it be our privilege, through abounding grace to the chief of sinners, to sing the song of the redeemed in that great day, for Jesus' sake. Amen

I PETER IV. 18.

DEAR ELDER: – I should like to know your mind on I Peter iv. 18. Do you think Peter means the righteous of the law, or the righteous of the faith of Jesus Christ?

Yours in hope of eternal life,
W. E. BUCK.
Dorchester, N. B., Sept. 1, 1880

REPLY. – We do not understand the apostle to be speaking of the salvation of God's people from the curse of the law from which they are fully redeemed and forever perfected by the one offering of our Lord Jesus Christ, for in that there can be no scarcity. "For with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption; for he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities." – Ps. cxxx. 7,8. "In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified and shall glory." "This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord; and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord. – Isa. xiv. 25 and liv. 19.

We understand the apostle Peter to be admonishing the saints to pursue a righteous course, and although all who adhere to his faithful admonitions and live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution, still it is better for them, if the will of God be son, that in the sufferings from which the righteous are scarcely saved, that they should suffer for their strict obedience to Christ in a righteous course, than to suffer for ungodly conduct, as a thief, a murderer, or a busybody in other men's matters. The judgment of which he speaks is in the house, or church of God; where they who are righteous, in their walk sometimes suffer for righteousness' sake. He refers them in the next chapter to the example of their Lord and Master, who once suffered (though he was strictly righteous in all things,) the just for the unjust. "And who is he that shall harm you if ye be followers of that which is good? Having a good conscience; that, whereas they speak evil of you, as of evil doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ. For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well-doing, than for evil-doing.

From the general terms of the apostle's admonition it seems plain to us that the righteous who are scarcely saved from persecutions, and other sufferings while here in the flesh, are those who suffer for righteousness, sake, and the sinners and the ungodly are those who suffer for their faults, and ungodly conduct. "For what glory is it if when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye take it patiently? but, if when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, that is acceptable with God. For even hereunto were ye called; because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps; who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth; who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously."

Now if the righteous, who deny themselves all ungodliness and worldly lusts, are exposed to trials and persecutions; nay, if the immaculate Lamb of God endured great contradiction of sinners against himself, so that even he was not saved from suffering, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? The sinner who suffers as an evil doer, or transgressor of the laws of Christ, and the ungodly, who denies not himself of ungodliness and worldly lusts, where shall they appear? The sinner in Zion, who transgresses the law of Christ, and whose walk is not according to godliness, shall appear guilt-stricken and condemned under the chastising rod of him who shall judge both the quick and the dead.

I PETER 5:5; ROMANS 12:10

Elder Beebe: I have been in the habit of reading your editorials for the last few years, and being highly pleased with them, I would like to have your views on I Peter 5:5, and with Romans 12:10. By giving them you will oblige,

A Friend to the Cause of Truth.
Oxford, C.W.
January 17, 1866.

"Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder. Yea, all of you, be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble (I Peter 5:5)." "Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another (Romans 12:10)."

The former is an apostolic admonition to the elders which were and are among the scattered people of God, the latter is addressed more generally to all the saints, irrespective of the position they may, any of them, hold in the church of God. The two passages, considered together, show us that the apostles have given exhortations, instructions and admonitions to all, whether elders or private members of the church of God. The apostles are by the authority of Christ seated upon twelve thrones, to judge the twelve tribes of Israel. And being divinely qualified for the very responsible and important position to which Christ has elevated them, their judgment and decisions on every point of doctrine, rule of order, and exposition of every precept of the law of Christ, the establishment of every ordinance belonging to the house of God, together with all the relative duties and privileges devolving on or belonging to the saints, regulating their deportment in the church, and all their intercourse with the world, is accurately considered, authoritatively decided, and unalterably established, never to be amended, improved nor repealed so long as this world shall stand. By the special command of the King Eternal, Immortal, Invisible, the Only Wise God, our Savior, they are commissioned to teach the disciples of Christ of all subsequent ages, to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded them. And to prevent the possibility of the slightest failure, from forgetfulness or any other cause, the Holy Ghost is sent down from heaven, like a rushing mighty wind, to qualify them perfectly by its unerring inspiration, and to bring to their remembrance all the instructions which Christ has given them. Without the possibility of committing an error in their official administration of judgment, all they have bound on earth is bound in heaven, and all they have loosed on earth is loosed in heaven. In every decision they have made, they have spoken as the Holy Ghost has given them utterance, God himself has spoken by them, and from their decisions there is no appeal. None may claim that they are disciples of Christ who are not governed by the decisions of the apostles in all matters of faith and practice; nor can any church, or branch of the church of Christ, be known as such, where Christ does not sit upon the throne of his glory, and his apostles with him, upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. (See Matthew 19:28; Luke 22:30 and Isaiah 32:1.) Where ever Christ is recognized upon his Mediatorial throne, his apostles must also be recognized as his authorized judges and exponents of his laws. Our obedience to Christ is the test of our discipleship, and if we reject his apostles, we also reject him, and therefore cannot be his disciples or his church.

Peter not only claims to be an apostle, a judge, enthroned in judgment with all the authority of heaven and earth to establish his inspired decisions on every point, but he claims to be also an elder. An elder, in a gospel sense of the word, means a pastor, or one who is authorized to preside over, and to feed the flock, or church of God.

1. This was at least a part of Peter's work, for Christ had specially commanded him to feed his sheep and to feed his lambs. (See John 15:16,17.) He was the more eminently qualified to hold that relation to the church from having been a witness of the sufferings of Christ. He was with him in his betrayal, when arrested, and at court where he was tried and condemned to die; was with him in the garden, a witness of his agony; and from his mentioning this in our text, we infer that the elders of the church, while they feed the flock, are qualified by the Spirit to be valid witnesses of the sufferings, death and resurrection of Christ. And Peter was also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed, as resulting from the sufferings and death of Christ. The prophets had testified of his sufferings and of his glory. And Christ said, "Ought not Christ to suffer, and then to enter into his glory?" And Paul testifieth that, "He was manifested in the flesh, justified in the spirit, preached to the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." Peter was a partaker of that glory, and so are all who have risen with him, and with him sit together in the heavenly places.

2. The work of elders generally, who are not apostles, is clearly defined in Paul's valedictory to the elders of Ephesus. (See Acts 20:17-38, but more especially in verse 28.) "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." The pastoral labors of an elder belong to the church, and not to the world. Not, however, to every community who may call themselves, or be by others called a church, or the church; but they stand related to, and are the servants of "the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." And as there is but one church of that description to be found in heaven or earth, the labor of the elder is restricted to that church alone. He has no commission or authority to feed the world, or any of the queens or concubines which are recognized by the world as churches, for the food which they are to deal out to the church of God cannot suit the appetite of any but the children of the living God. They "being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever," are qualified to receive and feed upon the "sincere milk of the word."

3. The pastoral nature of the work of the elders is fully expressed in the exhortation of Peter, who being himself an elder, had a perfect understanding of the duties involved in the calling. He exhorts them thus: "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof." Observe he directs his epistle to the elect which were scattered as strangers throughout Pontius, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia. And this special exhortation is to the elders which were among these scattered saints, and they are exhorted to feed the flock of God which was among them, and to take the oversight of them. That is as watchmen, not as lords over God's heritage, but as faithful watchmen; to warn, admonish, exhort, teach and administer the word and ordinances, according to the instructions and examples given them by the apostles. And this they must do from pure motives, not for the gratification of a covetous disposition, but of a ready mind, and as examples to the flock. And as in this work they sustain to the flock of God the relationship of under shepherds, they are encouraged that they shall be approved and remembered by the chief Shepherd when he shall come.

As we desire to extend our remarks upon the exhortation to the elders, as introductory to what we may say on the two verses to which our attention has been called, we must, for want of room, defer the further consideration of the subject to our next number.

I PETER 5:5; ROMANS 12:10

(Concluded)

Remarks on I Peter 5:5, and Romans 12:10. Reply to "A Friend to the cause of Truth."

From Peter's exhortation to the elders, which are among the flock of God, and Christ's charge to Peter in John 21:16,17, as also from Paul's charge to the elders of Ephesus in Acts 20:28, we unavoidably infer that the pastoral work of the elders is very definitely and clearly stated, to feed the flock of God, the sheep and lambs of Christ. No authority, expressed or implied, is given to provide a flock, or to increase the flock, but to attend to the flock which the chief Shepherd has gathered with his arm, and which he carries in his bosom (Isaiah 11:2); and to take the oversight of them, as shepherds, whose business is to look after their welfare, vigilantly watching for their peace, comfort and safety, and ready to give the alarm at the approach of their invading foes; their principal business being to see that they are well fed on good and wholesome pasturage. "Not by constraint." In the spiritual application of our figure, how unfit for the pastoral duties is he whose heart is not in the work; who does not delight to mingle freely with the flock; who must be induced by filthy lucre, or some worldly inducement appealing to his selfish, carnal nature. "Neither as being lords over God's heritage." Instead of being lords, God's ministers are servants of Christ, and by his will, servants of his church. "Ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake." Looking not to men for a reward, but to the chief Shepherd who has the hearts of all men under his control, and will see that they shall be provided for here, and when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they shall receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away; or, as Paul says, "a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing (II Timothy 4:8)."

Having thus briefly noticed the apostolic exhortation to the elders, which are among the flock of God, we pass to notice the relative duties enjoined by the same unquestionable authority on all the other members of the Lord's flock.

"Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves to the elder." This submission is in like manner, as the word likewise means. There is a reciprocity in the submission of pastor and people, of elders and younger. Whether we consider the elder as a pastor, or only a senior in church membership and experience, the submission must be mutual and reciprocal; for while the ministers of Christ are vested with authority to "preach the Word," and to "teach with all authority" according to that Word; so that when they preach and teach according to the Word, every member is solemnly required to submit to the instruction, and no member of the church has a right to disregard the preaching of instruction. So, on the other hand, while the elders preach, the church sits in judgment, and are authorized to investigate and decide whether they preach and teach according to the Word; for if they do not, it is because there is no light in them. "Know ye not that the saints shall judge angels?" or messengers. Elders, whether by age or position in the church, are under the authority of the church, and must be in submission to the authority which Christ has invested her with. And this extends not only to the doctrine they may preach, but all their walk and deportment in the church, and in their intercourse with mankind; for all is under the supervision of the church. "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ." And God has set his King upon his holy hill, Zion. There Jesus, by his Spirit, sits in judgment, and arraigns all his subjects at his bar in Zion. That there is a marked deference to be paid to pastors and to senior brethren, there can be no doubt. Divine instructions are clear on this point. Read I Timothy 5:1,17, and 18. Here, while the apostle commands double honor to the elders in both applications of the term, and especially to those elders which labor in word and doctrine, he adds a most solemn charge before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, to observe these things without partiality. As all the members of the body of Christ are equally precious, and all to be recognized in their appropriate places or gifts, as it has pleased God to set them in the church, the honor or distinction of honor due to age or gifts, is not to be observed in a manner disparaging to all the other members of the body.

The injunction or command of the apostle to the younger is applicable to all in the church who are not elders, either by age or vocation, and none are left at liberty to disregard, disrespect, or disobey the instructions, admonitions or teachings of the elders, except where the elders evidently depart from the law and order of Christ as settled by the apostles. Thus while the elders are required to be kind and gentle, and in submission to the authority of Christ in his church, as servants and not lords, all the members who are permitted to receive their services are in turn bound to appreciate their labor and be in submission to them.

"Yea, all of you be subject one to another." The church of God is one body, having one spirit; her members are called in one hope of their calling.

The movement of the body in obedience to the dictation of its spirit requires that there shall be harmony in all the members which make up the fullness of the body. To attain this harmony, no member can be independent of its fellow members; but all must be subject one to another, and all subject to the spirit by which the whole is governed. Otherwise there will be schisms in the body paralyzing all its actions. If, for instance, the eye refuses to see for the body, there is no other member that can perform that service for the body; or if the ear refuse to hear, or the tongue to express the sentiments of the body, or if the hand refuse to labor, the foot to walk, the body cannot travel. As a whole, all the members must obey the head, and each member be in subjection to the body. If in labor, one hand refuses to act in harmony with the other, the one builds, the other throws down; nothing is gained. The one foot, in obeying the Spirit, would move Zionward, the other inclines towards Babylon, and will not be in submission - the whole body must be in confusion, and the Spirit which directs to Zion is disobeyed until the unyielding and offending foot or hand be cut off, or the offending eye be plucked out. As in the natural body, so in the church, all the members of the body are members one of another. The hand can do nothing without the cooperation of the arm, and the arm must have the cooperation of all the body; and this cooperation and harmony requires that all the members shall be in submission one to another.

A morose, haughty, selfish disposition in any of the members would involve all the body in perplexity, and therefore that spirit is forbidden, and the opposite is enjoined on all. "Be clothed with humility." Clothing not only shields and protects the body and members from the cold and so contributes to the health and comfort of the body, but covers and conceals its deformity. The whole church and all her members being clothed with humility allows no manifestations of arrogance or want of unanimity to appear. And this seems to be the design of the figure in our text. "For God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble." No higher incentive can be known or felt by an humble child of God than to enjoy his divine approval. A proud, lofty or haughty carriage, especially when detected in a child of God, is sure to meet the marked disapprobation of our Heavenly Father. His rod will find them out; but he giveth grace or favor, beauty and support to the humble.

"Blest are the humble souls who see
Their emptiness and poverty;
Treasures of grace to them are given,
And crowns of joy laid up in heaven."

The other text proposed for consideration (Romans 12:10) presents the same admonition, only in other words: "Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love: in honor preferring one another." Both are addressed to the children of God, who, being born of God and led by his Spirit, are a spiritual brotherhood; but being also in the flesh which is born of the flesh, are liable to be led by the corruptions of their fleshy nature to a selfish and unlovely course, in which there is danger of biting and devouring of one another. Were it not that they have a law in their members, warring against the law of their mind, and bringing them into captivity to the law of sin which is in their members, they would not need these admonitions with which the scriptures abound. But in their present condition they need to give the more earnest heed to them, lest they should fall out by the way. The ardent desire of Paul for the well-being of the saints seemed to enlist his whole soul, and in the most pathetic and imploring manner he says: "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God," (what a striking appeal!) "that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." This sacrifice of our bodies includes all our worldly interests, wealth, honor, fame, ease, or life itself, if need be, and all must be laid upon the altar, all surrendered and submitted to God to be disposed of as he shall direct; allowing nothing of a worldly nature to divert us from that course which we are called to pursue as the followers of the meek and lowly Lamb of God. This living sacrifice requires that we shall not be conformed to this world, but transformed by the renewing of our mind, that we may prove what is that good and acceptable, and perfect will of God. Not indulging in vain conceit, or cherishing exalted views of ourselves; but regarding our standing in the body of Christ, as members of Christ, and as members in him one of another. Each member having its appropriate gift and measure of faith is for the benefit of all the body. "Let love be without dissimulation." Let it not be feigned, or in hypocritical pretense; but the honest, sincere and unfeigned out-gushing of holy affection which comes welling up from the depth of the heart where God has shed abroad his love. "Abhor that which is evil." Those who love God supremely, and by virtue of his love in their hearts, love his Word, his people, his ordinances, and all that God approves, do not, as some seem to suppose, therefore, necessarily love everything. If they love truth, they hate error; if they love holiness, they hate sin; if they love God, they hate mammon; for God's love is discriminating. If we love the world, the love of the Father is not in us. And just as far as we love that which is good, we will hate and abhor that which is evil.

"Be kindly affectioned one to another." As the possession of Christian love in our hearts to all the fraternity of the saints is the distinguishing and infallible evidence that we have passed from death unto life, are born of God, and belong to the brotherhood of the saints, it is therefore clearly established that all who are born of God do possess an undying affection for all the saints. But the peculiarity of the words of this admonition seem to imply something more than that the principle of love, or of affection shall exist in our hearts. To be affectioned, as we understand, means not only that we love; but that we should show our love. And to be kindly affectioned, means that our spiritual affection shall rule and control our actions, and that our affections shall be seen in acts of kindness, sympathy and devotion to those whom we love in the Lord. That brother who sees his brother in need, and shuts up the bowels of compassion, saying, Be warm, or be clothed, without ministering to his necessities, is not kindly affectioned towards him. "How dwelleth the love of God in that man?" Not the priest nor the Levite, but the good Samaritan was kindly affectioned towards the man who had fallen among thieves. Yet his might only have been a natural affection; still it was manifested by at least neighborly kindness. The kind of affection enjoined on the saints in our text is more than neighborly; for the admonition is, "Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love," by that love in which our fraternal relationship is founded. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us that we should be called the sons of God." If love is thus displayed in our sonship, and our being the sons of God makes us brethren, then our sonship shows that God was kindly affectioned towards us. "God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ," etc. "To be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love," is to be so governed by that filial, fraternal, spiritual, and divine love which God has bestowed on us, that in all our deportment our actions should be marked with kindness to all our Father's children. No unkind, ungenerous, unfeeling, or reproachful word or action can result from the love of God in our hearts. The kindly affectioned brother loves with a pure heart fervently, can bear a brother's burdens, share his sorrows, seek his comfort, sympathize in his affections, weep when he weeps, and participate in his joys. He will not watch for his halting, nor exult in his downfall, nor make him an offender for a word.

"When free from envy, scorn and pride,
Our wishes all above;

Each can his brother's failings hide,
And show a brother's love.

"Love is the golden chain that binds
The happy souls above:
And he's an heir of heaven that finds
His bosom glow with love."

"In honor preferring one another." The Christian who is kindly affectioned to his brother is not ambitious to monopolize the honors which distinguish some above others. It is a remarkable and a distinguishing trait in the children of God that each esteems others better than himself. The young convert in the fullness of the love of God newly shed abroad in his heart says, O how gladly would I mingle with the dear people of God if I were worthy. The lovely ordinance of baptism, how joyfully would I lay my poor sinful body in the watery grave where Jesus laid, if I were worthy. The old travelers on our King's highway are often heard to say, If I had such a gift as my brethren and sisters have, how I would delight to improve it. They sometimes think all their brethren are far before them in all that is excellent, and themselves less than the least of all saints; unsparing after preferment, in honor preferring one another. A minister is to be called to the work, but O, not me. "Ah, Lord God, I cannot speak, for I am a child (Jeremiah 1:6)!" If a deacon is to be set apart to the work, every other brother seems better qualified than myself. Now while we hold that each member should be subject one to another, and abide the decision of the church as to where their place shall be, we still hold that it is a heaven-granted right each one saint may claim, in honor, to prefer one another. Oh that this spirit may prevail in all the church of God, and then what jealousies would have to die! What fires of hell would be quenched! What strife and bitterness would be banished from our borders!

What is more lovely in nature, in families, and in communities, than a kind and affectionate regard for the welfare and happiness of each other; a sight but too seldom witnessed. But in the church of God, the Pillar and Ground of Truth, it is superlatively glorious, and as delightful as it is beautiful. Especially so, when all around in the world and in anti-christian communities, all is hatred, malice, wrath, strife, seditions, envies, murders and every abomination. Then how beautiful for situation is Mount Zion, in the sides of the North; the city of the great King!

2 PETER i. 9.

IN his letter on the first page of this number, brother Mitchell has desired us to express our views on 2 Peter i. 9, "But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins." "These things" mentioned in the text, are the same as in the context, namely, faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity. He that lacketh these things, the exercise of them in his deportment, walk, and conversation, is represented as barren, and unfruitful, and blind, or, at least, unable to see afar off. These things belong to the life of a christian; they are spoken of by Paul as the fruits of the Spirit; they grow out of, or are produced by the spirit that is born of God, and which unites to Christ. as the spiritual Head of his spiritual body. That child of God, in whom they richly abound, is fruitful; for these fruits of the Spirit in him make him so; hut he that lacketh them, (and alas! how many of us do,) is subjected to darkness of mind, unfruitfulness, and a forgetfulness of what the Lord has done in purging us from our old sins. The apostle invokes grace and peace unto his brethren through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord, according as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue; whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, &c. These things therefore which are to make the christian fruitful, and to give assurance of his calling and election, are gifts of God's divine power, and belong to life and godliness, must appear in our walk and conversation in order to give evidence of our calling and election of God; and being and abiding in us, they shall stir up our minds by way of remembrance of what God has done for us in purging away our sins. We cannot understand that the apostle would intimate that the spirit of Christ can dwell in us, disconnected with these things; virtue, knowledge, &c., are inseparably connected with the Spirit by which we are born of God, and called to glory and virtue; but while in principle they lay latent in the heart, and the child of grace is left to a careless indifference as to the spiritual exercise of his mind, he becomes blinded in regard to the evidence of his adoption by grace, and as he in such a state or frame of mind is unable to display these things in his external walk, he also fails to give evidence to his brethren that he has been purged.

Hence the admonition of the apostle, to give diligence, to make their calling and election sure; or, in other words, to make the evidence of calling and election to appear, in confirmation of the same.

"But he that lacketh these things," if in principle and practice, cannot be one that is born again. And even the soul born of the Spirit, who fails to be exercised in and by these things, is in darkness in regard to his interest in Christ. Therefore the importance of diligence on the part of God's children, that, having faith, they add to it virtue; genuine faith dictates a virtuous course, obedience to the laws of Christ our King, and virtue in practice is to be added to our faith, that we may show our faith by our works, so as to give evidence of our calling and election. And to virtue knowledge, as we are to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord. It becomes us as pupils in the Old School of Christ, to learn of him, for he is meek and lowly, and we shall find rest to our souls; and to knowledge all other things which are named in the context, and requiring diligence on the part of the disciples of our Lord.

Who that has traveled far in the divine life, has not learned that the things urged by Peter are essential to their peace, happiness, fruitfulness, confidence, and assurance?

Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to them, and may the gracious Lord in the fullness of his grace enable us to walk worthy of the high and holy vocation wherewith he has called us.

II PETER 1:10

(Reply to Elder James Strickland)

As in his letter he has made several appeals to us on various propositions, before we attempt an exposition of the text on which he desires our views, we will endeavor to respond to them briefly. We say briefly, because it would require much time and space to write elaborately on each of them.

First. We will remark that we were not led to a misapprehension of the general purpose of his former letter by his having unfortunately used the term "protracted," as by a more careful review of our former remarks it will be found that we did not object to the protraction of meetings when the Spirit so directs, or circumstances require; we objected only to the idea of protracted meetings for the purpose of getting up revivals or religious excitements. We did not understand from brother Strickland's letter that the meeting at Francisco was previously appointed as a protracted meeting for any such purpose, but being assembled, the meeting was protracted. Brother Strickland misapprehends us if he understood us to object to prayers being made for mourners in Zion. All the inhabitants of Zion are mourners at times; sometimes they mourn their own leanness and barrenness, their trials, tribulations or persecutions, and all the saints are at all times in public or private duly authorized to pray for each other, as the word directs and the Spirit indites; but still to call on either saint or sinner to signify by rising up, by coming to some particular altar or seat, or by extending their hand, or by any other sign or signal, is in our view very objectionable. First, because in so doing we assume a mediatorial position between the sinner and his God which would mislead them to rely on our prayers to commend them to God, instead of teaching them that we are just as dependent on God to sustain us as they are for deliverance from their distress. There are examples in the word in which the prayers of the saints are asked for, but if there be any instance where the primitive disciples called on their congregations to signify by motion or gesture, movement or sign, that they desired their prayers, we have overlooked it.

Second. Much mischief grows out of such proceedings sometimes. For instance, at a revival meeting, even if the revival be genuine, there are often those present whose natural sympathies are touched; they feel alarmed for the moment, and on being called on they signify that they wish the prayers of the minister; by their public expression of the desire they feel that they have committed themselves publicly as seekers, or as wishing to become christians, and having done so, after the excitement has subsided they are induced to make a profession of religion, when they would not think of doing so if they had not thus prematurely committed themselves.

We were sincere in saying that we had mistaken these brethren if they would designedly depart from the ancient landmarks of Zion. We did not think they really designed what their practice seemed to imply, and for that very cause we felt constrained to warn them to shun the appearance of evil. What we understand by the efficiency of the ministry, is that they be divinely qualified to minister in holy things, by such gifts, and only such, as Christ has given unto men for the work of the ministry and for the edifying of the body of Christ. If this be what our brother means by efficiency, we agree that the prosperity and benefit of the church is promoted by the gifts which Christ has so bestowed for the benefit of the whole body. Baptist ministers, in common with others, not beyond others, may be too much occupied in discussing worldly subjects, and a faithful admonition to such is seasonable and proper, if it be administered in the spirit of the gospel; instead of admiring errors among the Baptists, which we would condemn in others, we look for nothing else but errors in others, and therefore an error in a professed Baptist is more unbecoming and out of place, in our estimation, than anywhere else.

We may be under the deceptive influence of a beam in our own eye, but we are greatly deceived indeed if we do not discover a mote which we would gladly remove from the vision of our brother. We confess that the different view which we take of some of the same things seems to indicate that there is some defect somewhere in our vision, we do not seem to see the same things precisely alike; this may be owing to beams or motes. May the Lord enable all his watchmen to see eye to eye.

Brother Strickland says: "If our ministers had been as careful in pointing out and keeping before the brethren their errors as they have the errors and wrongs of others, it would have been better for the Baptists, and we to-day would not have had to complain of the cold, lifeless, barren and dead state of religion that we do." This is saying considerable. Well, however derelict other Baptist ministers may have been in pointing out the errors, or what are supposed to be the errors, of brethren, brother Strickland and ourselves will not be charged with the sin of altogether overlooking or winking at the errors of each other. But although we have been for many years endeavoring to point out the errors of our dearest brethren, and not insensible that we have many of our own also, which our brethren have kindly borne with, still we feel much coldness, barrenness and deadness. But we have serious doubts if a kind of animation resulting from our own faithfulness, either in admonishing our brethren, or anything else that we can do, would be the kind of life and activity that either brother Strickland or ourselves would be satisfied with. Both of us would rather say, If the Lord shall quicken our poor, cold hearts, and animate our sluggish minds by the life-giving and life-reviving power of his Holy Spirit, it would make us more active and more faithful in pursuing every good word and work.

"Too much time and labor," you say, "has been given to the subject of doctrinal preaching, and not enough to the practical part of the gospel." And this you demonstrate by the testimony, which to us is new, that there are to-day a dozen different factions in the United States calling themselves Old School Baptists, utterly refusing to correspond with each other; all in consequence of some doctrinal difference. Admitting for instance the whole force of this testimony, we cannot see that it proves, but rather disproves, the correctness of the position, for the testimony only shows that those who are so divided on the subject of doctrine are not sufficiently posted on doctrine. If they were better instructed in doctrine they would be more united. If the difference were in their practice it would look more to us as though too little time and labor had been bestowed on practical subjects. Brother Strickland we trust will not undertake to say that the preaching of the doctrine of the gospel, the doctrine of God our Savior, has a tendency to divide the children of God; if so, we would infer that it ought not to be preached at all.

How many sorts of people may claim to be Old School Baptists who do not believe our doctrine, and who are not in correspondence with us, we do not know, but we did not think there were so many as our brother speaks of but if there be "a dozen," it to our mind only shows the greater necessity for a more faithful and constant preaching of the doctrine.

Brother Strickland says: "No denomination that I am acquainted with seems to boast of the correctness of their doctrinal sentiments as much as the Old School Baptists, and yet none are more divided among themselves than the Baptists are." Truly, if a dozen or more factions, holding different doctrinal sentiments, and having no correspondence, fellowship or communion with each other, are still but one denomination or church, it must be admitted that there is much division in the denomination. But is it fair to include as any part of the church of Christ any factions or parties who do not hold our sentiments, and who have no correspondence with us, merely because they choose to call themselves Old School Baptists? On the same principle may we not include as belonging to the true church of Christ all who profess to be christians, and so consolidate Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Mormons, Quakers and Dunkards, with many other names, as the same one church, only somewhat divided in their doctrine and practice? We hold that all who are not with us are against us, and all who have gone out from us have gone out that it might be made manifest that they were not of us. The church of Christ is a unit, and though there may be threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, yet Christ's bride is but one, she is the only one of her mother, the choice one of her that bare her.

We admit that the faithful preaching of the gospel presents the gospel in all its excellence, which cannot be done without presenting the experience and practice of the gospel, but we do not think the minister of Christ can dwell too long or too loud on what is called the doctrine, nor that the doctrine can be faithfully preached without preaching christian experience, for all christians have experienced the doctrine of God our Savior, and desire to adorn that doctrine in their deportment and conversation.

We are astonished at the figure brother Strickland has employed to illustrate his views of the nature and tendency of doctrinal preaching. Is it true that the constant and persistent preaching of the doctrine of Christ, with now and then an exposure of Arminianism, stamps the life out of real christians, like the stamping the roots of young trees, as in the similitude used? We do believe that the faithful preaching of the doctrine of Christ will drive away from the church those who have never received the love of the truth, that they might be saved, but we are willing to see all that fire put out which God has not kindled, all those converts driven away from the church which God has not made, and all that life which is not born of God slain by the sword of the Spirit. Let them all die who cannot live on every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God; let them all starve who cannot feed upon the doctrine of Christ, and let them all be stripped of their foliage and fruit whose roots can be killed by the faithful preaching of the doctrine of the gospel. “For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorra: their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter: their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps.” (Deut. 32:32,33) Of this sort were those “disciples” who figured zealously at the banquet of loaves and fishes. (John 6) But the vigor was bruised out of their roots on the very next day, by the doctrine which kills so many at this day. When Jesus preached to them the doctrine of salvation by grace alone, that none could be saved except by him, that none could have eternal life except they ate his flesh and drank his blood, etc., this doctrine made a great scattering of the disciples. No doubt if our Lord had kept back this hard doctrine, and in its stead given them such food as they could relish, a few more loaves and fishes, they would have been inclined to remain with him, and to have had him for their King. But the bread of heaven they did not desire, and his doctrine they could not endure; it pinched their roots beyond endurance, because they were not rooted or grounded in him, and we read, “Many therefore of his disciples, when they had heard this, said, This is an hard saying; who can hear it?” “From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him." (John 6:60,66) 'Then said Jesus unto the twelve, Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." Here we see that the very doctrine which crushes the roots and drives away nominal and graceless disciples, feeds, comforts, unites and binds more closely together those who are truly born of God and led by his Spirit. Those churches therefore which have withered and died because the doctrine has been preached to them long and loud, and Arminianism exposed, we are sure were not the churches of Christ, and they cannot die too fast when the truth of God kills them. " Doctrine is good in its place." So brother Strickland admits, but where is its place? In the church of God. The holy apostle has warned us, saying, "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed: for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds." (II John 10) This admonition is to the elect lady and her children, whom John loved in the truth, and certainly is applicable to all who know and love the truth. Paul was so far from apprehending danger to the saints that he exhorted Timothy to "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee." Too much of this would not kill them, nor destroy their spiritual exercises. God says by the mouth of Moses, "Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth. My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distill as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as showers upon the grass." (Deut. 32:1,2) Nothing crushing or violent to the plants which God's own hand hath set, in his doctrine. Even the tender herb, instead of being crushed by it, is refreshed; it comes like the small rain, and distills like the cheering dew, softly descending, with wholesome effect, causing the tenderest plants to sparkle in living vigor and beauty. To those who have an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches, the doctrine of Christ is in its appropriate place, but to anti-Christ it has no attraction; to all false professors of religion it would be like "a jewel of gold in a swine's snout." (Prov. 11:22) As brother Strickland justly remarks, "It must underlie all the experience and practice of the gospel." Nothing therefore can be regarded as gospel experience or gospel practice that is contrary to or that cannot endure sound doctrine. But our brother seems to think it useless to harp upon it where it is already well understood. The apostle dwelt largely on those things, not because the saints did not know them, but because they did know them, and Peter desired, as long as he should continue in the flesh, to stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance.

Those who possess genuine faith will show it by their works, and where it is not so manifested we have no reliable evidence of its existence. "We having the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak." (II Cor. 4:13; Psalms 116:10) Those who believe that the preaching of the truth is for the edifying of the saints will be expected to advocate that kind of preaching, and those who think an exhibition of the doctrine will be detrimental to the cause, and depressing to the spiritual exercises of the saints, will be apt to show their faith by keeping it back.

Brother Strickland inquires, "What good is faith going to do you or me, unless that faith is coupled with good works?" We reply, That faith which is the fruit of the Spirit never fails to work, for it works by love and purifies the heart, and any other kind of faith will be vain, even if it be coupled with what we may call good works, for without faith it is impossible to please God. We do not disagree in regard to the character of those works of which brother Strickland speaks, and we believe that the faith of the Son of God living and reigning in us will be evinced by a careful practice of them all. We may differ in regard to the manner in which the saints are to wash each other's feet. According to our understanding of it, we are now trying to wash brother Strickland's feet, and we presume that he designed to cleanse our feet of some dust by his brotherly letter, to which we are now replying. If we diverge from the pathway of holiness we shall defile our feet, if not our garments, but we shall keep our feet when we stand on holy or consecrated ground.

Having occupied so much space in our remarks on brother Strickland's letter, and our replies to his interrogatives, we will now attend to his request for our views on II Peter 1:10: "Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall."

The saints to whom this apostolic admonition is addressed, we are told in the first verse, had already obtained faith of the like precious kind, as that possessed by Peter himself It was not therefore a faith in prospect and to be procured, nor a faith that had originated with themselves, but it is that faith which is the gift of God, is born of God, and is the faith of the Son, and which overcomes the world. It is precious from its intrinsic value, from its nature and effects, from its power to conquer the world, quench the violence of fire, stop the mouths of lions, and give ability to endure all things, as seeing him who is invisible. It is peculiarly precious, because it can only come from God as a special gift, and because without it no man can please God; and it is also precious because it is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen; and precious because to it all divine revelation is made to the saints of their election, calling, justification before God, deliverance from wrath and assurance of immortality beyond the grave. With this priceless treasure the apostle assures the saints that God has given them all things that pertain to life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue. By this precious faith, together with all things pertaining to life and godliness, which things are all grasped, apprehended or received by precious faith, and by them are given (that is, dealt out to us from our Lord Jesus Christ, the great Reservoir of all spiritual blessings), to us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these (that is, by faith, and what faith lays hold on), ye might be partakers of the divine nature. It is not by this faith and all things that pertain to life and godliness, that we are or were made partakers of human or earthly nature, but of that spiritual, immortal and eternal life, which constitutes our new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. We cannot possess this precious faith without possessing Christ, for it is in him, and as Paul says, "Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." By this faith and these attendant graces the saints have escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust, or through the depraved propensities of our earthly nature, being by the blood of Christ purged from our old sins. Now with all this grace, not only in store for us, but given and received, obtained and in possession, we are called to be active. God has bestowed all these spiritual blessings on us in Christ, "according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love." God has called us to glory and virtue. "Wherefore [for these reasons, this being the case, and this grace being received,] the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure." Instead of this precious faith, and with it all things pertaining to life and godliness, and all the many great and precious promises, and even a participation in the divine nature, having a tendency to make us negligent, careless or indifferent in regard to our high and holy calling, every principle of this heavenly and divine nature implanted is rather calculated to make us diligent in the pursuit of the things which become sound doctrine. The child of God thus called and invested with these precious gifts is to regard it as the great business of his life to diligently pursue those things which are in our context enjoined. Not thereby to procure his election, or any or all the things which pertain to life and godliness, for these he has already in possession, but that he may thereby demonstrate for his own spiritual comfort and for the declarative glory of God, that he does already possess them. This makes sure their calling, that is, it proves beyond all contradiction that God has already called them to glory and to virtue; and as it proves that they are called, so it proves that they are chosen or elected children of God, for "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called." To make our calling and election sure, is not to procure either, for they are already complete, but it manifest and demonstrate the existing fact. "For if ye do these things, ye shall never fall." Do what things? The things which he had mentioned in the preceding verse. "Add to your faith virtue." Virtue is the opposite of vice, and God has called the saints to virtue, that they may show forth the praise of him that hath called them. All the amiability of our nature, in the absence of faith, could not please God, or make our calling and election sure. Faith is first, and virtue, which is in harmony with precious faith, is to be added as evidence to ourselves, and to those around us, that we possess the faith of God's elect. A man may hold a creed which for orthodoxy may be unexceptionable, and he may preach long and loud in defense of it, but if he be not virtuous in his conduct and deportment he only holds the truth in unrighteousness. And again, a man may be a subject of grace, and possess true and genuine faith, yet if he be not virtuous, circumspect and upright in his deportment, he becomes a castaway, so far as relates to the proving of his calling and election, and a castaway as to his usefulness in his high and holy vocation.

“And to virtue knowledge.” We are not to conclude that we know enough, and that there is no more for us to learn in the school of Christ. We are to learn of Jesus, search the Scriptures, prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. Ask counsel of God, watch carefully the leadings of his word and Spirit, and follow those things whereby one may edify another. This knowledge of divine things is to be diligently sought after, that it may be added to our faith and virtue. But if we have not the faith and virtue we may be ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

“And to knowledge temperance.” If we have not faith, virtue and knowledge, we shall not know what is temperance, but having the former we are qualified to add to them the latter, and to be temperate in all things.

“And to temperance patience.” A restless, murmuring, fretful course illy benefits one who should show forth the praise of the Redeemer. To be patient in tribulation, under sore trials, afflictions, temptations and persecutions, greatly adorns the life of the christian, and this blessed ornament of our profession should be added to the others.

“And to patience godliness.” Godliness consists in living in the fear of God, denying ourselves all ungodliness, that we may live soberly, righteously and godly in the world. To live godly is to pursue in all things that course which God has approved in his word, and which Christ has taught in his examples.

“And to godliness brotherly kindness.” We cannot attach too much importance to these things. “We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren.” But how do we know it if we do not love the brethren?

Brotherly kindness is an important evidence then of our calling and election.

“And to brotherly kindness charity,” or christian love, which is to manifest our attachment to God, to his cause, his doctrine, his ordinances, his people, and to all his laws and institutions.

“For if these things be in you, and abound.” That is, if precious faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and charity, if these thins be in us and abound, that is, if they be acted out, made manifest in all our walk and conversation, we cannot be barren or unfruitful, for these are the fruits of the Spirit, and give testimony that the tree which bears them has been made good, and hence they demonstrate that our calling and election is of God, and therefore sure.

“If ye do these things, ye shall never fall.” Never fall from your steadfastness in the truth, from the evidence that you have been purged from your old sins; you shall never fall into that darkness of mind and blindness in which you cannot see afar off, and in which you forget that you have been purged, washed, cleansed, sanctified and set apart from the world to be a disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ. When all these things are abounding in us we feel a blessed assurance that we are born of God, a joyful reliance on the great and precious promises which are given unto us.

The apostle adds, “For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.” In the absence of these aboundings we feel barren and unfruitful, and find it hard to enter into the precious privileges of the kingdom, and we sometimes doubt whether we have any right or inheritance there; but when they abound in us we do sweetly and experimentally enter in through the gates into the city of our God; and the entrance is ministered unto us abundantly by the Spirit, in our spiritual exercises of mind, in our enjoyment of our gospel privileges, and by the brethren and kindred in Christ, who soon discover the evidence that these things are truly in us and abound, and our entrance into their hearts, their confidence, their love and their fellowship is most abundant.

II PETER 2:20,21.

Elder Beebe: Will you please give us your views through the "Signs of the Times," on II Peter 2:20,21. "For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning. For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them." If you will grant me an answer you will favor one who at least desires to know and love the truth. Yours truly,

M.J. Pierce.
Leavenworth, Ind., April 25, 1869.

Reply: The seeming obscurity in which this chapter is veiled to the minds of some honest enquirers after the truth, will be measurably removed by a careful observance of the different classes or description of characters spoken of by the apostle. While admonishing the saints to add to their faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, with all diligence, and so to demonstrate their calling and election, he proposes to put them in remembrance of some things that should be of importance to them after his decease.

In thus stirring up their pure minds so that his admonitions might be held in perpetual remembrance throughout all time, he first assures them of the perfection of the Scriptures as a record of divine truth; not like the cunningly devised fables or doctrines of men, but a revelation from the immutable God, and so perfect and unchangeable that they can admit of no improvement, amendment or alteration, which men may deem necessary to adapt them to the state or condition of any succeeding ages or contingencies. God who has spoken by his prophets in times past, and through his dear Son, in the inspiration of the New Testament, is of one mind and none can turn him; therefore when he speaks the word, it stands fast, and cannot be altered in the least and still be his word. Not even the evidence of our eyes and ears, our frames or feelings, our depressions or transporting joys, are to be held by the saints as of equal authenticity with that more sure word of prophecy to which the saints shall do well that they take heed. The holy Scriptures are a light to the children of God, which shineth in a dark place, and shall continue to shine with ever increasing refulgence, until the perfect day.

In solemnly warning the saints to steadfastly adhere to the Scriptures as their only reliable rule of faith and practice, this apostle took occasion in the chapter from which our subject is selected, to apprise them, as the other inspired apostles had done, of the corruptions, false doctrines and apostasies that should come in the last days; and among the important things which he would have them remember when he should be with them no more in the flesh, was that there should be false teachers among them, even as there were false prophets among the people of Israel. And that these false teachers should bring in [into the church] damnable heresies, of the most revolting kind, even denying the Lord that bought the church to which they stood united, and into which they should bring their heresies. And these false teachers should come in privately, slyly, and deceptively, as the false prophets had, by subtlety and deception insinuated their falsehoods on the people of the old dispensation. So should these false teachers creep in privately into the churches, bringing in their heresies. The venders of palpable error seldom present their heresies openly at the first, but cautiously, watching the manner in which they are regarded, and when they have “by much wantonness beguiled those who were clean escaped from them who live in error,” they are then emboldened to press their pernicious doctrines with more effrontery, until unstable souls are corrupted and allured into their snares, and divisions and disorders are brought into the church. In their wicked efforts they should succeed in drawing away, not only a few, but many shall follow their pernicious ways, and so many as to render the way of truth exceedingly unpopular, even with the professors of Christianity, so that the way of truth, as laid down in the holy Scriptures, and taught by the Spirit in the personal experience of all the saints, shall be evil spoken of. And through covetousness shall they [the false teachers] make merchandise of you, [who are thus allured and led away from the truth] whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not; that is the judgment and damnation of false teachers, which shall infest the church of God.

Following the words of admonition and instruction through this chapter, we should be careful to observe the discrimination made between the false teachers, and those who are allured and deceived by them. The false teachers spoken of are no doubt all of them like the false prophets, by whom they were prefigured, impostors; but of those who are allured by them, there are many of the dear children of God, but not all; for nominal professors, and carnal hypocrites who have a nominal standing in the church, but no vital relish for the truth as it is in Jesus, will be the most ready to receive with greediness the heresies which shall be introduced, and to use their influence with the false teachers to beguile unstable souls, who, although they know and love the truth, are not sufficiently stable and firm to resist the pernicious influence of their cunning adversaries. Some who had clean escaped from them that live in error, and who had purified their souls by obeying the truth, should be captivated, and follow the pernicious ways of their betrayers.

Observe, the apostle speaks of all these, including the false teachers with all who are drawn away from the truth, as being among the people of God; members held in standing in the churches of the saints. Of course, they have all professed to receive, to know, and to love and walk in the truth as stated and established by Christ and his apostles. Not even the false teachers could have imposed so far upon the saints as to have got into the churches, if they had not renounced the corruptions of Judaism, Paganism, and all the other wicked isms which were prevalent, and to do so through a knowledge of the truth as taught by the apostles, and this was called "purging their souls, by obeying the truth." As the errors of Paganism and Judaism had corrupted their souls, or minds, while they held them, when they renounced them, even though it were like the dog disgorging the filthy contents of a foul stomach, or a sow washed from the filth of the mire, but still retaining their peculiar natural propensities, yet the dog has ejected the filth, and has so far purified his stomach, and the sow being washed, has put off that defilement in which she was so polluted, still with their natural propensities unchanged, the one will soon return to his vomit, and the other to the mire, and thus demonstrate that in their cleansing there has been no radical change in their nature or propensities.

We do not believe that God's people are either dogs or swine; but so far this true proverb is applied by the apostle, we are constrained to believe that they sometimes act like them, in the particulars to which the apostle applied the figure; and hence we regard the proverb as applicable to all, whether nominal or real disciples, who after having renounced the corruptions which had defiled them, relapse into them again.

A pagan who is rationally convinced of the absurdity of worshipping a god that he has made with his own hands, and renounces Paganism, or a Jew, who like the five thousand when they had eaten of the loaves and fishes, were rationally convinced that Jesus was the true Messiah that was to come, and enrolled themselves as his disciples, and desired to have him for their king; when they heard his doctrine, and learned that his subjects were to live alone on him, and eat his flesh and drink his blood, immediately relapsed into their former condition, returned to their ejected vomit, and to the filth of the mire.

Our country now fairly swarms with false teachers, who once publicly renounced the world and its pollutions, and professed faith in our Lord, who have gone to their vomit again, and are now zealously engaged in efforts to draw away disciples after them.

And is it our privilege to say that there are now none of the dear children of God, who after having received the knowledge and the love of the truth, have turned back to the beggarly elements of the world of which they were once so thoroughly sickened as to eject, and renounce them? And can it be said in truth that their course in this is altogether unlike the dog and the swine in the true proverb?

Let us now see how far the words of the apostle in our text will apply to these unstable characters described. “For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end of them is worse with them than the beginning.” A spiritual knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ is eternal life. Matthew 11:27, John 17:3. But natural conviction, like that of Nicodemus, and those who crucified Christ, when they witnessed the wonderful demonstrations at his crucifixion, and such as devils evinced, when they confessed that he was the Son of God, may be brought home to the natural understanding of graceless men; as though the mental, or traditional convictions of the natural judgment of men, by external signs which they witness, they may be convinced of the absurdity of Judaism, or Paganism, or undisguised infidelity, and from that conviction, they may renounce some or all of these isms, reform their lives, so far as their outward practice is concerned, and thus escape the pollutions which are in the world; be orthodox in their creeds or professions of faith, and precise and circumspect in their deportment; the drunkard may quit his wine, the profane swearer may become more chaste in his language; and thus escape much of the pollution that is in the world; but when the day of trial comes, they will deny the faith to which they had subscribed, and apostatize from their profession, and their last end be worse than their beginning. They began by reformation, but have relapsed into the very abominations which they had discarded, and the canine proclivity of their unchanged nature will incline them back to their filthy vomit, and their swinish nature will desire the filthy slough. So that their last end is worse than their beginning.

And in the application of this admonition to those of the children of God who are unstable, irregular, and like children tossed about by every wind of doctrine, who, although they are not dogs, nor swine, are allured, deceived and betrayed by false teachers, until they are induced to act like them, their latter end is worse with them than the beginning. This is illustrated by many examples given in the Scriptures. The saints in the Galatian churches had begun well; but when false teachers had bewitched them, they were in a worse condition than when they were running well, at their beginning.

"For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than after they had known it to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them." We are told that, He that knoweth his Master's will and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes; but he that knoweth not, shall be beaten with fewer stripes. All who are received into the church of Christ assume the yoke of Jesus, receive the holy commandment which is given to all who are of the household of faith; and as long as they walk according to the holy commandment, they are held in fellowship; but when they depart from it, the discipline of the church, if faithfully administered, will cut them off, and cast them out, whether they be real or only nominal disciples. And they who do that which they know is a violation of the law of Christ, and a transgression of the holy commandment which they have received, are far more reprehensible than those who have only mistaken the track, and made a misstep through ignorance, or from want of better instruction. We may illustrate this by adverting to the case of many who stood with us, battling manfully against the pollutions which are in the world, and the innovations which were being made upon our faith and order before the New School Baptists were expelled from the church of God, who with a full view of the abominations of anti-christ, which they once so clearly pointed out, with their eyes open, like those who count it pleasure to riot in the day-time, have plunged into the very depth of the wickedness against which they once so ably protested. Is not their case far worse than that of those who have been trained in Sunday Schools, and the like institutions of human invention, where every ray of the light of truth is excluded? “But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb. The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire.”

The times foretold by the holy apostles of the Lamb, in which false teachers and false doctrines should abound, and in which many shall depart from the truth, and be turned unto fables, are now open to us, and it becomes us to seriously consider the solemn admonitions which are given us in the Scriptures. We know that the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And that he will never suffer one of them to finally be lost; and that should only cheer and encourage us in this dark and trying hour, but it should stimulate us to give the more earnest heed to the admonitions given, lest at any time, or under any circumstance we should let them slip. Not to secure our final inheritance in glory, for that is secured already in the ample provisions of grace given us in Christ Jesus our Lord; but rather that we may escape the pollutions that are in the world and honor our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. If indeed we have the spirit of Christ, it will be our meat and our drink to do his will; and if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. A mere profession will not suffice, to have a name to live, when we are dead, will avail us nothing; for all such will probably be soon scourged out of the church by the faithful administration of the laws of the kingdom, or allured by the spreading abominations which prevail. If we, or any of us love the wages of unrighteousness, as they that count it pleasure to sport in the day-time, the mark is a fearful mark, for it is a mark of the beast. But if we love holiness for holiness sake, and mourn because of the depravity of our corrupt nature, it is a reliable evidence that we are born of God, taught by his Spirit and shall ultimately reign in glory.

II PETER 3:13

The text on which we are requested to write reads thus:

"Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Not any the less do we look for the fulfillment of the promise of God, because that change and decay are so strongly marked upon all things pertaining to this world. In the context the apostle stirs up the pure minds of the saints by way of remembrance of the words of the holy prophets, and of the commandments of the apostles of the Lord and Saviour, in which they had been faithfully admonished of the transitory nature of all earthly things, of the great apostasy from the faith that should precede the final dissolution of nature and indicate the near approach of the great day of the Lord, which should surely come suddenly, like a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up. How appropriate is the appeal: "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness; looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens, being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens, and a new earth," etc. Some writers have supposed that the day of the Lord, in this chapter, was the day when the judgments of the Lord should be executed upon Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, when the old Jewish heavens should be dissolved and all the elements of Judaism should melt away, and that the new heavens and earth which were to succeed was the establishment of the gospel kingdom among the Gentiles. It is very possible that the apostle had some allusion to those events, which were then upon the eve of being fulfilled when this epistle was written. Certain it is that the Jewish heavens and earth, with all their elements, did then pass away, and not one stone was suffered to remain on another. It is also true that that new organization, or gospel kingdom, is one in which dwelleth righteousness, as it is the dwelling-place of Christ, who is our righteousness. But the declarations of the apostle in this case were prospective and prophetic, not only as to the dissolution of the old heavens and earth, but also in regard to the new heavens and earth, which were to succeed. Although the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus, was subsequent to the date of this epistle, it must be conceded that the kingdom of Christ was duly organized on the day of Pentecost, some thirty years before Peter wrote this letter. Again, others have supposed that the apostle was here speaking of what is called the millennium, when it is supposed the present condition of the world will be essentially changed, the earth purified by fire, sin banished, Satan bound for a thousand years, and Christ shall reign personally with his saints on earth. But as we know nothing of this theory we must be excused from offering any opinion. To our mind the obvious meaning of the apostle is to stir up the pure minds of the saints in reference to the final destruction of this world, with all its elements and all its works. This day of the Lord is particularly characterized in verse seven as the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men. When, according to our understanding of the subject, the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and when the dead shall be raised, and all who are, or then shall be, in the graves, shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth, when the kingdom of God in its fullness shall be delivered up to God, even the Father, and all the ungodly shall receive their final and everlasting doom and sink down into irretrievable perdition. Whatever grand events may be predicted to transpire before that great day when God shall come to raise the dead and judge the world, should not divert our attention from what God has spoken to us by his inspired servants in relation to the certain coming of that period in which the wheels of nature shall cease their revolutions, when the natural heavens shall wax old as doth a garment, and as a vesture shall be folded and be laid away. The solemn grandeur of that day we have no ability to describe. The most sublime language is employed by inspired men; Paul says, "And to you who are troubled, rest with us; when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day." While wicked men and devils may dread the approach of that great day of our God, the saints who love the appearing of their Lord will hail its approach with joy and gladness, looking for and hasting to the coming of it, because "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation." (Heb. 9:28) "But we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." (I John 3:2) While we contemplate the final dissolution of all earthly things, we are not only hasting to, but looking for the event with peculiar joy, for resting upon the promise of our God, who cannot lie, we are looking for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. The heavens and earth are figuratively used, to signify that happy state to which all the saints shall be brought. The new heavens will not require the glittering scenery of the natural heavens; sun, moon and stars will not be required, for God himself, and the Lamb, are the light and glory of that happy place.

"Its skies are not like earthly skies,
With varied hues of shade and light;
It hath no need of suns to rise,
To dissipate the gloom of night."

The irresistible attractions of the new heavens and earth for which we look are such as earth cannot present. Here we have to use the lamentation of the psalmist: "Woe to me, that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar! My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace. I am for peace; but when I speak, they are for war." (Psalms 120:5-7) But these, peace and joy, shall forever reign without intermission or interruption while immortality endures.

"Long nights and darkness dwell below,
With scarce a twinkling ray;
But the bright world to which I go,
Hath everlasting day."

Sickness and sorrow, pain and death attend us here, but there the inhabitants shall no more say, I am sick. There shall be no death there, mortality shall be swallowed up of life. In this Bochim, or place of weeping, floods of grief gush unbidden from our streaming eyes, but there, "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." (Rev. 7:16,17) Our present trouble is that this earth is polluted with sin, our own lips are unclean, and we dwell among a people of unclean lips; but in the new heavens and earth to which we go there dwelleth righteousness. Nothing unholy, nothing unrighteous, can enter there. The psalmist said, "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." (Psalms 17:15) Upon this glorious prospect the apostle grounds an exhortation: "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless." And, "Seeing that all these things [of earth] shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness." None but the children of God have the promise of such things; none but they are looking for such things. God has taught them by his word and Spirit to look within the veil--to look on the things which are not seen, which are eternal, and soon, according to the rich provisions of his grace, shall they all come up out of great tribulation, with garments washed and made white and clean in the blood of the adorable Lamb. Can such a prospect fail to stimulate them to vigilance, to diligence, in the cause of God and truth? To be found of him in peace, not murmuring, fretting or impatient, without spot, unblemished by the spots of the pollutions of the flesh, but crucifying the old man with his affections and lusts, and putting on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. He has warned his children to come out of Babylon, to touch not her unclean things, and if we would be found blameless of him at his coming, blameless in our walk and deportment, we should, as we desire his approval, bow to his authority and walk in all his institutions, that we may walk worthy of the high and holy vocation wherewith we are called.

One important consideration in connection with this subject, to which Peter calls attention of the saints, is that before the coming of this day of the Lord, "There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts." And in closing his exhortation in verses seventeen and eighteen, he says, "Ye therefore beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory both now and for ever. Amen."

All the admonitions of the apostles to the saints in regard to the peculiar developments of the last days, treat of the great apostasy which shall in these last days be seen among those who have at least been professors of the faith, and of the great temptations the children of God should encounter, as calculated to shake them in regard to their steadfastness. Who have formerly seemed valiant for the truth begin to show alarming symptoms of instability, and others seem to have tasted the wine of the cup of her who reigns over the kings of the earth, the intoxicating poison of which has maddened the nations of the earth. The apostle bids us beware. "Touch not; taste not; handle not;" and let him that thinketh that he stands, take heed. And let us, one and all, watch and pray, lest we fall into temptation.

PARABLE OF THE MARRIAGE FEAST.

Brother William Smith, of Lewis County, N. Y., has desired our views on the parable of the Marriage feast, Matthew xxii. 1-14. The repeated calls of brethren and friends, for our views on numerous portions of the scriptures, have certainly had a tendency to make us feel how little we know of divine things; nothing indeed, only as the Lord by his gracious Spirit is pleased to give us light from time to time, as he is want to bestow it upon all the subjects of his grace. In view of our own insufficiency to expound the deep and delightful mysteries of the book of God, we feel ready to decline offering our thoughts upon those passages, even when called on by brethren and friends, and to leave the exposition of difficult subjects to those who are far more competent than ourself. But still we do not feel altogether satisfied to withhold such views as we have, and if we err, let those who are spiritually taught correct us.

The parable in question was spoken by our Lord to certain Jews, who were taking counsel together how they might entangle him in his talk. This parable and those preceding it evidently has allusions to them. By “The kingdom of heaven” spoken of, we think was intended the elements of that kingdom, as existing throughout the old dispensation among the children of Israel, and afterwards brought to light among the gentiles. The marriage supper we understand to mean the gospel. The preparation of that feast required the slaughter of oxen and fatlings, or the sacrifice of bullocks and lambs, &c., as appointed in the law. The supper could not be announced as ready until the blood of Jewish sacrifices, as required by the law, should cease to flow. Predictions had been made by the prophets of the Lord, that such a feast should be made on that mountain – a feast of fat things, full of marrow, of wines on the lees, and well refined; but the time of it should not be until the vail of the covering which was over all flesh should be taken away, or until the handwriting of ordinances should be nailed to the cross. The Jews are represented in this figure as having been bidden to the feast, and so they were. All the types and figures of the good things to come pointed to it. All the Jewish festivals were typical of it; and the voices of all the prophets speaking to the house of Israel, bade them be in readiness to receive the Messiah at his advent, and enter into the marriage chamber, &c. So distinctly were the words of the prophets spoken, and so clearly were they understood, that the Jews were looking for a time to come when they should realize a fulfilment of the words of the Lord; but still they were not able to discern the signs of the times, when these things were actually fulfilled.

This kingdom of heaven is compared to a certain king. It held dominion over the destinies of the house of Israel. And in the figure this king had a son. So is Christ regarded as the seed of the woman. “Unto us a child is born; unto us a son is given.” The marriage was made for this son, even as all the rites and sacrifices of the old dispensation were preparatory to the marriage festival of Christ, with that body which should become dead to the law, and married unto Christ.

At the time appointed, when all the fatlings were killed, and the time for the feast had arrived, the king to whom the kingdom is likened, sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding, and they would not come. The law and the prophets were until John, and when he came he proclaimed to the Jews who had been bidden, in the sense implied, that the time was at hand. Other servants were also sent out, and commanded to go not into Samaria, nor among the gentiles, but rather to cities of Judah; and those also proclaimed that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, that the oxen and the fatlings were killed, and all things were ready for the assembling of the guests who were to witness the nuptial rites of the illustrious marriage. In both instances, the Jews were reproved, for in the first they rejected the counsel of God, not being baptized with the baptism of John, and when the seventy were sent out, they also made light of it; they had unfinished business of their own to do, and were by no means ready to leave the drudgery of the worldly sanctuary for the banqueting house of the King. Some among the Jews betrayed their enmity by raising persecution against, and even saying the servants which were sent unto them. But when the king hard thereof, he was wroth, and sent forth his armies and destroyed those murderers, and burnt up their cities. All this was eventually accomplished, as a nation they were destroyed, and the cities of Judah were literally destroyed in an awful manner.

Then saith he to his servants, the wedding is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy: Go ye therefore into the highways, &c. This accords with the Apostle’s words, when he asserted It was necessary that the gospel should be first preached to you; but seeing ye count yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we turn unto the Gentile, for so hath God commanded, &c. This stone must be first refused by the builders, and God would make it the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to them that stumble at the word, being disobedient; whereunto also they were appointed. After the Jews had fulfilled what was written of them in relation to Christ, and stoning and slaying his disciples, and the messengers which were sent unto them, the great commission was given to the Apostles, by our Lord Jesus Christ, to go to an other people, among the gentiles, into the highways, and as many as ye find (they that believe and are baptized,) bid to the marriage. The Jews as a people were utterly rejected, and gentile sinners are compelled to come in, that his house may be full.

The parable, as understand it, was designed to set forth what those in the preceding chapter were employed to do, namely, that the kingdom was about to be taken away from the Jews and given to a nation, (the gentiles) bringing forth the fruit thereof. See chap. xxi. 43.

That party of the parable which relates to the king's surveying his guests, and the detection, arrest and punishment of him who had not the wedding garment, we defer for want of time and space for another's number.

PARABLE OF THE TALENTS.

WE feel some hesitancy in offering an opinion upon the parables spoken by our Lord on various occasions during his incarnation. One prominent reason assigned by our Redeemer for using parables was to display the discriminating nature of his grace; that to his people it was given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God, while to them which are without all these things are presented in parables. Parables, it should be remembered, are used for illustration, rather than for demonstrating the things to which they are applied. In order to receive instruction from them it is important we should observe the occasions on which they are particularly applied in the scriptures. We have been pained sometimes at witnessing their misconstruction and misapplication by well meaning brethren, as for instance when we have heard the three parables in the 25th chapter of Matt. applied to the final judgment after the resurrection of the dead, &c., without regard to the subject or circumstances on which they were spoken. For ourself, we do not claim superior light on the parables, nor do we feel prepared to settle all the questions arising in our own mind in regard to the parable on which our comment is desired; we may therefore become the occasion of as much pain to others in the remarks which we are about to make, as others have inflicted on us. But to the subject.

In the xxiii. chapter an awful catalogue of woes is denounced on a generation of vipers known in the cities of Judea as scribes, pharisees, lawyers, and hypocrites. In the commencement of chapter xxiv. Christ assured his disciples of the utter destruction of the buildings of the temple at Jerusalem, and shortly afterwards they came to him on the Mount of Olives, and asked when these fearful predictions should be accomplished, what should be the sing of his coming, and of the end of the world. The reply of our Lord to these questions occupies the whole remaining part of this chapter and the three parables in the xxv. chapter. It would be a wide departure from the subject of the destruction of the buildings of the temple, and the visitation of wrath upon the cities of Judea, on which our Lord was treating, for us to apply his parables so as to make the talents to represent the saving grace of God which he has bestowed on his children. That grace cannot be intended is evident,

First, Because he was not speaking on that subject.

Second, Because the grace of God cannot be increased in quantity or quality by the application, faithfulness or industry of its recipients and,

Third, Because the grace of God bestowed on souls cannot be withdrawn from them and applied to others.

By taking this parable in its connection with the whole subject of the three chapters, it will appear that it was designed to enforce the admonitions given to the disciples in the latter part of the xxiv. chapter. “Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come.” These words were addressed to those disciples unto whom our Lord had given a special charge concerning the impending judgments which hung over Jerusalem and the cities of Judea; the instructions and admonitions given were committed to them as stewards of their Lord, and to be dealt out or communicated to those of his spiritual household in due time. These instructions are called goods, meats, and talents, and these were given in fives, in twos and in one, according to the several ability of every disciple; for some of his disciples possessed abilities differing from others, some greater and some less, but according to their ability they were every one required to make these instructions (or goods, or talents) profitable to the household, or church of their Lord. The variety of ability to improve these instructions to the profit of all the household of Christ, referred to the different capacity to the communicate, to speak, admonish and stir up the minds of the disciples to a profitable use of the warning which he had given them. Then, as now, there were among the disciples those who were more eminently qualified to impart instruction than others, and according to their qualifications the goods were distributed, and each required to occupy until their Lord should come to take account of their respective stewardships. Jesus had informed them that he was going away into a far country to receive a kingdom, and to return again; and during this interval of time they were to be in charge of the affairs of his household, so far as related to their stewardship; that at his return his steward which were faithful in the discharge of their trust in the few or minor things which related to the preservation of his disciples from the temporal calamities which were ripening for the devoted cities of Judea, should be promoted to higher stations in the organization of his spiritual kingdom. Having thus given to them, his own servants, or disciples, his goods, he straightway took his journey. The admonition of the parable of the talents shows that those who were not in possession of abilities equal to those of others, were no more excusable for slothfulness than those of superior gifts would be.

The hiding of the one talent is clearly described in chapter xxiv., verses 48 and 49, “But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken,” &c. Instead of adhering to the instructions received, and the solemn admonitions by which they were enforced, he dug into the earth of carnal reason, and in the argument of “My Lord delayeth his coming,” or, since the fathers have fallen asleep all the things remain as they were from the beginning; and where is the promise, (or fulfillment of the promise,) of his coming? These earthly, sensual reasonings prevailing bury the instructions, the charge, the warning, and he begins to eat and drink with the drunken, the intoxicated and infatuated scribes, pharisees, and carnal Jews, drinking in their poisonous doctrines and thereby opposing and smiting those servants who were faithful in the discharge of their duty, and wounding them; in an unexpected moment, as the lightning darts from the east, and shineth even to the west, shall the Lord of that servant come, and shall appoint him his portion, in regard to the temporal calamities which awaited Jerusalem, with hypocrites in the famine, pestilence and suffering, which should be visited on Jerusalem and the cities of Judea, where the mightiest of the works of Christ had been performed. The talent shall be taken from him; no longer should he have opportunity, even if he desired it, to speak to the household of our Lord to remind them of the talent shall be transferred to more faithful hands, who will not cease to improve it.

An important lesson may be inferred from these parables for the admonition and instruction of the disciples of Christ in all ages of the church in her militant state. Those of us who possess but small abilities for feeding our Lord’s household, are not at liberty to say, our Lord is austere, and that in requiring us to speak of his goodness, testify of his truth, and bear testimony against the hidden things of dishonesty so as to edify his people and give them meat in due season, inasmuch as he has not given us as great abilities as we think we ought to have, he reapeth where he hath not sown, and gathereth where he hath not strewed. Is it not too frequently the case in our churches that brethren who feel impressed to speak in testimony of truth, or in exhortation or prayer, have reasoned upon the subject in this way: If the Lord requires of me to occupy any gift in the church, why has he not given me suitable abilities? He is a hard master if he would reap or gather from my improvement any benefit to his saints, for he has not sown, or strewed, or bestowed on me such abilities as I think are necessary. With this conclusion do they not reason themselves into the conclusion that it is better that the time which they have felt impressed to occupy, should be filled by brethren of superior gifts, by the minister or the deacons who have the five or the two talents? These things should be duly considered, that we may profit by the things set forth in the parables of our Lord.

PARABLE OF THE TALENTS.

PLEASANT HILL, Ga., Dec. 2, 1839.

BROTHER BEEBE: - In consequence of attending our associations, &c., this fall, I have not read all the numbers of the "Signs of the Times;" and I do not know whether you have yet given your views upon the talents, according to my request. I feel anxious to see them in the" Signs of the Times," and hope the Lord will direct your mind, for the satisfaction of his Zion.

The Upate Association met on Saturday last, and there were twenty-five churches represented, .and several votes taken; but through the transaction of all the business, there was not a no, and yes; but union of heart seemed to prevail, brotherly love to fill each heart, and the preaching was all of one kind, viz: Salvation by grace; and I think I can say, the Lord was in the place. Yours, as ever,

JOHN W. TURNER.

REPLY: By the above extract of a letter from brother Turner, our readers will perceive that he has repeated his request that we publish our views on the parable of the talents, Matt. xxv. 14-30. We have thus far delayed a compliance with the request of our brother, not so much for want of views to express, as from the conviction that our views will be considered somewhat novel, and perhaps speculative, by many of our readers whom we love and respect; yet, being a second time called on for them, such as we have are at the service of our brethren, subject to such animadversions as they may feel themselves warranted by the scriptures of truth, to make through our columns. It is the opinion of many of our readers, that, taking into consideration the comparatively destitute condition of our churches of the stated preaching of the word, the devotion of a greater share of our paper to the expounding, illustrating, and comparing of views on the scriptures, might better subserve the cause of truth and righteousness. In their opinion we fully concur, with the provision, that in all our dicussions, a spirit of tenderness towards each other, where difference of opinion may be found, and a singleness of heart for the declarative glory of God, and the general edification of the saints, shall govern in those who write, and in those who read. But to the parable.

There is, in our opinion, an evident connection between the twenty-fourth and this twenty-fifth chapter; and the several parables are employed by our Lord to enforce the solemn admonitions given to the disciples in the former chapter, concerning the judgments which were soon to be experienced by the Jews, when God should execute his indignation, in a temporal point of view, on Jerusalem. Hence we believe the whole discourse of our Lord in the two chapters, was founded on the text. "Tell us, when shall these things be?" (to wit, the destruction of Jerusalem) "And what shall be the sign of thy coming," (to execute these things) "and of the end of the world?" That is, the passing away of the cid heaven, and of the old earth, &c. In these two chapters, Christ informed his disciples that all these judgments would surely take place; that for the special benefit of his elect, they should be preceded by such signs as should be a sufficient warning to his disciples to retire to the mountains; that the precise time of the execution of these things, although they should take place before some among them should see death, was not then a matter of revelation, but was only known to God. The solemn admonitions expressed in this connection, and enforced by these well adapted parables, with sufficient clearness, taught the disciples that there was danger of their being involved in the temporal calamities which should at that day burst upon the Jews; and hence the necessity of their watching the accomplishment of those signs, which should signify to them that the time was at hand. There should be false christs, and false prophets, and heresies7 wars, earthquakes, &c. But when they should see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel, standing in the holy place, they should then have but barely time to flee to the mountains; for then the coming of the Son of Man, in the revelation of power and great glory, revealed in flaming fire, and taking vengeance on them that knew him not, should not be as when he came in incarnation to bear the sins of his people; and consequently was not then revealed in that power; but in this revelation, he would come without sin, to receive his kingdom, and destroy those in Israel who would not that he should reign over them. This coming should be with the velocity of lightning; and, therefore, let him that readeth understand. And after making these statements to his disciples, our Lord repeated the admonition, (xxiv. 42) "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord cometh2' That is, watch those signs which should be given to them. From this (42) verse, to the end of the subject, the relation of lord and servant takes the place of teacher and disciple; showing that in this visitation on Israel, he was to be revealed as the Lord and King; his humiliation would then be past, and he revealed in his reigning power and glory. From verse forty-five, to fifty-one inclusive, of chapter twenty-five, is found the key to the parable of the talents. "Who, then," (at the time of his coming) "is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord has made ruler over his household, to give them their meat in due season; blessed is that servant whom his lord when he cometh shall find him so doing. Verily, I say unto you, that he shall make him ruler over all his goods." But we will revert to this again, presently.

Here the connection seems broken, by the division which our translators have made of the chapters; but every one must necessarily see that the same subject is continued in chapter twenty-five. The twenty fourth chapter closes with a declaration of what the Lord will do with his servants at his coming, as above spoken of', which have, and those which have not obeyed him; the former should be made rulers of all his goods, and the disobedient should be companions with hypocrites, in the temporal judgments which were to be executed on the Jews. The next chapter commences, "Then;" which certainly signifies, at that very time. But what shall then be developed? Then shall the kingdom of heaven, the nominal church of Christ, be likened unto ten virgins; agreeing with the circumstances connected with the first coming of Christ; for this parable is evidently based upon the event of, and circumstances attending his first appearing in the flesh and among the Jews. In that instance when it was announced by John the Baptist, that Christ, as the long waited for Bridegroom, was come, there went out to meet him as such, Jerusalem and Judea, and all the regions round about Jordan; but alas! their lamps were gone out. Their having Abraham to their father could no longer serve them; they were sent away to buy oil, or fruits meet for repentance; and have not yet returned to their place among the virgins; but from late accounts, they are still trading in oil; their prospect is as cheerless as is theirs who expect salvation by the deeds of the law, or from the modern anxious-bench system. Now we say, such had been the case of Israel in the days of John the Baptist, and at that day when Christ should be revealed in the destruction of Jerusalem, it should be in like manner with the kingdom of heaven; at that time the division of his nominal disciples should as completely answer to the figurative import of the parable, as the parable answered to the former events. As national Israel traveled down through all the generations appointed them, to meet the advent of Christ, and were looking for his coming, were expecting to meet him, and be recognized as his bride, and as very many of them were not able to stand when he appeared, (Mal. iii. 2) so the kingdom of Christ, after his ascension to glory, should look for his return. He had frequently taught them that he would in their day return to them again, that he was only going into a far country to receive a kingdom, and would shortly come to preside over them; also, that at his return, all the hand-writing of ordinances should be blotted out, Jerusalem that then was, and which was in bondage with her children, should be destroyed, and the elect among the Gentiles be gathered in. At that time, his professed disciples should experience such a division and final separation, as should correspond with the type, as set forth in the parable of the virgins.

The two sexes, male and female, implied in these solemn warnings, as, men in the field, women gringing at the mill, men servants and maid servants, servants and virgins, appear to have been designed to inforce these words, "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!"

In justification of his application of the parable of the virgins, our Lord introduced the parable of the talents. "For the kingdom of heaven is as a man traveling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods." To our mind, nothing can be more clear than that this parable is given as a further illustration of the parable and warnings before expressed in the connection of the subject. Then shall the kingdom be likened; but why shall it be thus compared? For the kingdom, &c., is as a man traveling into a far country.

Having, as briefly as the nature of the case would admit, shown to what particular period this cluster of parables related, we will endeavor to show the analogy this parable bears to the subject to which we believe it was applied by the Master.

By the kingdom of heaven, we understand the church of our Redeemer, in her connection with him, as her Head and King. Our brother will observe that this parable does not commence like the preceding one. Then shall; but the present tense is used; and therefore embraces all that period of time from the date of these instructions, until the time when this kingdom should be likened to ten virgins, or to what is implied in that of the sheep and the goats. Christ was himself the man traveling into a far country; he was at this very moment making his arrangements to go to his Father, and to their Father, by calling unto him his own servants, these disciples, which he was addressing, some of whom were not to see death until all these things were fulfilled. In John xv, his intention to perform this journey was announced; and the nature and object of it was explained to the disconsolate saints, and the promise of his return, and the final establishment of his kingdom, together with the promise of the Holy Ghost, to preside over them during so much of his absence as extended from the day of pentecost, until his return; also in John xvi. and xvii., this subject is more fully expounded. His Father had appointed unto him a kingdom, and he had also appointed unto them .a kingdom; he therefore goes into this far country, to receive a kingdom, to prepare a place, &c. And if I go away, he says, I will come again. It is needful for you that I go away. The necessity of his going away is fully set forth in these remarkable words: "Whom the heavens must receive." And again, that by his own blood he should enter, not into the holy place made with hands, as did the eons of Aaron, but into heaven itself; ceasing from his own works, or legal service under the law, observing its precepts and bearing its penalty, thereby expiating the guilt of his people, as God did rest from the works of creation, on the seventh day, having obtained eternal redemption for us.

"Who called his own servants, and delivered to them his goods." Here we are to inquire, Who were his own servants, and what were the goods delivered to them? We cannot believe with the arminians, that these servants included all mankind; for some portion of the human family were at that time suffering the vengeance of eternal fire, and therefore were not at that time called together; nor can we believe with others, that the Jews, as such, were intended; for they were not recognized in any sense as the servants of Christ; nor were the Jewish ritual formerly delivered to them, any part of the goods of Christ, as the Mediator or the King. But, by his own servants, we understand those very disciples unto whom he was at that time administering these instructions. The Lord, the servants, the journey, the goods, or talents, with the use made of the latter, were all necessary to describe the then present state of the kingdom of heaven.

As we promised to revert to the close of the twenty-fourth chapter, as a key to the parable; a little attention will convince the reader that the service of those persons called "his own 5ervants," was to rule over his household, by giving them meat in due season; and consequently none were in this sense his own servants, but such as stood in this connection with his household. The goods which he delivered unto them, we think, had reference to the gifts bestowed for the edification, succor and support of those who are of the household of faith. When he escended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. - Eph. iv. 8, 11, 14. "And he gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ," &c. Those who are distinguished as Christ's own servants, are frequently brought to view, as in the parable of the talents before us, as being stewards of their Lord's goods. A good man, out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man, evil things, &c.; for of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. - Luke vi. 45. And again, we are taught that the preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue, are of the Lord - they are his goods.

The next expression of the parable claiming our attention, is the manner of distributing these gifts. This distribution, we are informed, was made with reference to the several abilities of the servants left in charge with their Lord's goods. And so it has ever been in the churches; the Lord has not given equal abilities, and therefore has not committed the same amount of his goods to all his servants; there are a diversity of gifts now, and there was then; but all by the same spirit; and those who have but inferior gifts, are as inexcusable for neglecting to improve them, as are those who have the five talents. But in the immediate sense of this parable, we understand our Lord had left in charge with his servants, those admonitions in regard to the great and terrible day which was then at hand; these signs, admonitions, parables, &c., were his goods, delivered to them according to their several capacity. Some of these servants were apostles, and consequently had a capacity for a greater degree of usefulness than those who could only make advantageous use of two talents; and some of them were ordinary ministers of the word, and hence were in advance of those, for general usefulness, which were not called to stand in that responsible relation to the household; others, again, were disciples of Christ, who, though they were not called publicly to preach, yet having received these admonitions, were in possession of at least one talent of their Lord's goods; and such were solemnly obligated to exhort one another, and so much the more as they should see the day approaching.

Now, then, with this distribution of gifts, for stirring up the minds of the saints, in regard to the tokens which should indicate the near approach of the promised return of their Lord, and the day of reckoning, which he had informed them of, he straightway took his journey. "God went up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet," leaving the impressive charge, "Be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh2' Who then is that wise servant whom his Lord hath made ruler, or, to whom he bath committed talents, viz: to give meat, or instruction, to his household, seasonably, in relation to his return, and of those fearful judgments then to be realized? Blessed is that servant whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing. Verily, he shall make him ruler over all his goods. But, and if that evil servant shall soy in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to smite his fellow servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken, the Lord of that servant shall come in a day when lie 1ook~th not for him, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Can there be any difficulty in perceiving that the above quotation is in substance the very subject, more fully illustrated in the parable of the talents?

These views are sustained by the faithful record made in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the epistles, particularly in those written by James, Peter, John and Jude, to those Jewish disciples, in stirring up their minds to a remembrance of these things, and in giving us a historical account of these servants or disciples, how they conducted themselves during that space of time from the ascension of Christ until the epistles were all written.

The actual event of Christ's coming, in the destruction of Jerusalem, is not, of course, given in the New Testament; for the canon of scripture was completed before this event occurred; but the certainty that he did come, and that some of his disciples who heard his admonitions, as stated in Matt. xxiv, did live to witness that event, is founded on the infallible truth of Christ himself. The testimony that Christ's words, in regard to this visitation, were literally fulfilled, is first found in detail in the history written by Josephus, and corroborated by the fact that not one stone can be found on the top of another, of all that magnificent temple, or of the buildings therewith connected.

PARABLE OF THE TALENTS CONCLUDED.

THAT, at the time of his coming, Christ found some of his professed servants, to whom talents, according to the view we have taken of them, were committed, answering the description of the evil servants, foolish virgins, and the servant with the one talent, we have not the smallest doubt. The consequence to them of their being thus found, may with certainty be calculated from the declarations of Christ. They were cut assunder, that is, from those who were mindful of his admonitions, and had their portion literally with the hypocrites, and those unbelieving Jews in the temporal calamities which befel them at that time. We are inclined to the opinion that some of the disciples or servants answering to the character of the servant with one talent, like very many disciples at this day, so construed the Lord's words as to lead them to say in their hearts, "My Lord delayeth his coming," by supposing that all he had said on that subject had reference to the end of this material world, and the general resurrection of the dead; and under the infatuation of this delusion began to beat the men-servants and maid-servants, instead of giving them meat in due season, and to eat and drink with the drunken (those who were intoxicated with the strong delusions which prevailed among the carnal Jews.) But how were they surprised when, in an hour unthought of, they found themselves cut asunder from the faithful saints, and without the possibility of escaping the dreadful sufferings of the Jews. But how different the case of the *faithful and wise*servant, (xxiv. 45), those wise virgins, (xxv. 4); and those good and faithful servants in our parable! In the first example it is said – "He shall make him ruler over all his. Goods;"* in the second, they were admitted into the marriage; and the door was shut; and in the parable before us, those good and faithful servants were found faithful in a few things; and were made rulers over many things, and entered into the joys of their Lord. The very talent of the slothful servant who perished, Is taken from him and given to him that had the ten. By which we understand that although such of the disciples as had made an unprofitable use of these solemn admonitions, (their Lord's money,) now had to share the temporal judgment of hypocrites, and thus be filled with their own ways; yet, those very admonitions which they had neglected, are added to the instruction of those who profit by the record of the Lord's dealings with his own unfaithful servants; and for the profit of all the saints, in all subsequent ages, these things are left on record. We will, therefore, endeavor to draw from the whole subject such wholesome instruction and admonition, as it is calculated to furnish.

Improvement. As the talent was taken from the slothful servant and given to the other, we infer that the manner of God's dealings with those who in that instance, having been often reproved, hardened their necks and were destroyed with those in whose company and revellings they had connected themselves - the giving this talent to the others, shows that the very example of their chastisements adds one talent W him who had ten.

As in the case above treated on, in regard to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the admonitions, chastisements, &c., of those who were found disobedient to the Savior's special charge, the words of Christ stood more permanently than did the pillars of that heaven and earth mentioned verse 35, chap. xxiv; so we should learn that all the admonitions given to the people of God, in regard to the developement of the man of sin, the son of perdition, are also faithful and true, and none of the righteous judgments of God provided in his word for the chastisement of his disobedient children shall in any wise fail. The same disobedient and uneasy disposition which marked the character of the evil and unfaithful servants in the foregoing subject, is also to be found among those of the present day, and the same propensity to treat with indifference the most solemn admonitions of our blessed Lord. Now the spirit speaketh expressly that in the last days shall come perilous times; many shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing Spirits and doctrines of devils, &c.; and many shall follow their pernicious ways. Again, even of your ownselves shall many rise up drawing away disciples after them. Indeed, nearly all the things which were aforetime predicted concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, and saying to God's children, "Save yourselves from this untoward generation," &c.; are now said of the approaching destruction of Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and the Abominations of the Earth and very similar admonitions are given to the Lord's people, "Come out of her, my people" - (But why? Certainly not to secure the eternal salvation of their souls; for this was secure in Christ from everlasting) – "That ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." As the veracity of him that speaketh from heaven was given in regard to the certain destruction of Jerusalem, so is the truth of Jehovah now pledged that Babylon shall sink like a millstone, and be found no more at all; and as many signs were given to the saints, by which they could as easily understand the near approach of that divine visitation; so are equally prominent signs given to teach us of the near approach of the downfall of the anti-christian beast. How stands the case now? Who are improving the talents or warnings Christ has given us, and who are now answering to the description given of evil servants, of foolish virgins, and of wicked and slothful servants? There are at this day some who are watching the signs of the times, and marking with the utmost attention the progress of the man of sin; such are improving the talents given them, by giving seasonable warning to the household of Christ, and such of them as shall endure the scorn, ridicule and reproach of gainsayers unto the end of those things, shall be saved from the calamities or plagues which are written against Babylon. But, Alas! how many are they who among the nominal people of God, are saying, Since the fathers have fallen asleep, all things remain as they were, and where is the promise of his coming? or, My Lord delayeth his coming; we must usher in the latter day glory ourselves, and we must hasten the coming of the Lord by our efforts or he will never come - for he delayeth his coming: henceforth they begin to eat and drink with the drunken. That very class of Baptists to whom these expressions apply, are now mingling with the infatuated, drunken Babylonians, or anti-christian denominations around about them, uniting in all their modern systems of what they call effort, &c. And they are at this very moment smiting the men-servants - (ministers and other servants who are improving their Lord's money by warning the saints), and the maid-servants, gospel churches which adhere to the Old School principles in faith and practice. They also, like the foolish virgins, have their lamps, but nothing in them which can enlighten the people of God, or give seasonable warning to the saints; no oil: they are only Baptists now by name; having submitted to the external ordinance of baptism; but the sound doctrine once held in these professions is now gone out; nothing of it now remains. They think and talk of purchasing some light of those Theological institutions which profess to keep it for sale; but they will be too late, for they are and ever will be, "ever learning, and. never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." Again, they answer the description given of the slothful servant. They say in substance, Lord, we knew thee, thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strewed; and we were afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth; or in other words, We knew thee, that thou didst require of thy servants to go out and preach, and warn the people, and that thou didst not allow them to take their purse or scrip, nor even to make previous arrangements with a Missionary Board, to pay them for their labor; that thou didst require of them to blow the trumpet, and sound the alarm, and give the trumpet a certain sound; and didst not make provision for them to get a classical education, by providing colleges and schools where they might qualify themselves for usefulness; and hence to require usefulness of them and not allow them the means to make themselves useful, is to reap where thou hast not sown. And furthermore, for us to go and preach and beg money to live upon, and for thee to claim the glory of the salvation of all that are saved by our efforts, is to gather where thou has not strewed. We have, on the whole, thought it best to bury thy talent (doctrine, admonitions and instructions) in the earth, (that is, cover up and conceal it under our own earthly, humanly invented schemes, &c.) and go upon our own footing. We have fallen on plans which in our judgment will make us a better living, entitle us to greater respect and less persecution, and will also, we think, secure the salvation of many more precious souls than such an hard man as thou art, had made provisions for saving. We have therefore set thee and thy Old School followers down as a set of anti-benevolent people, and modestly claim for ourselves the right to monopolize all the benevolence in the world. Here is thy talent, the doctrine which we have suppressed, because we found it unprofitable to preach it, take that is thine! But how will the insolence of these characters be surprised when they shall find the Lord has kept a different reckoning from their own, and that out of their own mouths they shall be judged. According to their own showing, they should have put this talent to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. If they had no disposition to profit by the solemn warning of Christ themselves as honest men, they should have confessed the truth - acknowledged that such warnings were given, that others might have profited by

it. Or perhaps this part of the subject may more appropriately describe the men who have stood as thousands do now stand in the relation of pastors to the flock. If they were not satisfied to preach the doctrine of Christ, and trust in him to sustain it and them, they should. have withdrawn from the place they have occupied and made room for others who, like Paul, would not shun to declare the whole counsel of God. The punishment of such wretches is, that they shall be stripped of the livery of the ministers of Christ, and as they have been partakers of the sins of Babylon, so they shall receive of her plagues. Such, by the decision of Christ the Righteous Judge, shall be cast into outer darknes: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

*We understand the terms, all his goods, and many things, to have reference to the gospel with all its fullness of doctrine, ordinances and consolations with those who endured unto the end of those days of tribulation, and entered with their Lord into his joys; in the New Jerusalem, which then came down, adorned as a bride for her husband, enjoyed. That is, after the tribulation of those days, when Jewish rites were fully abolished, and the middle wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles was thrown down, and the Gentile saints brought in; these faithful servants had an enlarged sphere of action, were rulers of all the goods, were to teach with all, or with full authority to both Jew and Greek, the unsearchable riches of the gospel of Christ.

PATENT RIGHT FOR GETTING UP REVIVALS.

IN the professedly orthodox American Baptist, we are greeted with an extract from a Pastor's sketch-book, showing by what sort of machinery a drunkard was converted, by the effort of said pastor, assisted by two females, extracted from the N. Y. Evangelist; to which are added the following remarks:

1. "If any church are wishing to have a revival of religion, let them pray for it; let all the members agree that morning, noon, and evening, they will set apart some time to pray especially for a revival. And they will not pray long, before their hearts will be stirred up to labor for the same blessed object.

2. When a sinner under conviction lingers, it is generally some one darling sin that is keeping him out of the kingdom of Christ. Search out that sin, and persuade him to forsake it; and the work is done. He will immediately submit his heart to God, and follow the leadings of the Holy Spirit.

3. If a minister wishes to do his duty, and have his labor blessed when going out to talk with a hardened sinner, let him engage two or three pious females to pray for him while he is gone; and he will not dare to be unfaithful; and the Lord will bless his work."

These three simple rules are published to the world, and particularly, by Dr. Going, to the Baptists of America; as calculated infallibly to secure the conversion of the most hardened sinner. These rules too, are not the mere conjecture of an enthusiast, but a matter which has been actually tested, by a pastor and two praying females, in the case of the drunkard above alluded to, as is fully shown by "A Pastor's Sketck-book." This drunkard, we are informed by the same authority, was an Universalist, and also a Deist! Nor is this all: he lived within twenty rods of a meeting-house, and in a district where christians had pledged themselves to pray three times a day for the outpouring of the Spirit, and to labor for a revival of religion. Being thus situated, we are told by the sketch-book, the prayer-hearing God sent his Holy Spirit to strive with him while he was digging a grave. Now the striving of the Spirit, together with a powerful sermon prepared and delivered by the pastor himself, drew from this thrice-hardened drunkard, Universalist, and Deist, a resolution "never to neglect the worship of God's house on the holy Sabbath day;" and to the wonder of all, his resolution to worship God's house once a week was by him regularly executed for about the space of one week, on the Sabbath day; but alas! the next day proved a damper - the half-made convert got drunk again! This was awful! The pastor was discouraged, and had well nigh concluded to let Satan have him, when two praying sisters came and prayed the pastor, saying, "O don't give him up so. Do go and see him now." The pastor consented, upon condition that the two females would pledge themselves to stop and pray for him while he was gone; they agreed. He went, and the result, as stated by the pastor himself, was, the conversion of the poor sinner from Universalism, Deism, and drunkenness, to the same kind of religion which the pastor and his praying assistants possessed.

Who, then, can entertain a doubt of the efficiency of these three rules for converting drunkards, &c., when they have been so fully and clearly tested in this very agravated case? And here let it be observed, according to the above statement, God had tried his power; the Holy Spirit had strived, the sinner himself had resolved; but all in vain; the washed sow was back again in the mire; the dog had returned to his vomit; and all hopes had fled. But these blessed females - O what salvation in their names! - jealous for the honor of the Lord, could not bear the thought that the wicked should have occasion to reproach the cause. To give their own words, "We almost forgot the salvation of that man's soul in our supplications, for the burden of our prayer was, that God would save his own cause from the reproaches of the devil, so that it need not be said that the enemy, by the aid of intoxicating drink, has destroyed a man with whom the Holy Spirit had began to strive' And the pastor adds, "God heard that prayer; for from that hour, that man became a strictly temperate man; and soon after, a decided christian; and for three months past, he, and his wife, and one son, have been worthy members of the Presbyterian Church."

We never found ourselves in want of demonstrative arguments to convince us that Presbyterians may be made of infants or idiots, by a very simple process. The application of a small quantity of water from the hand of their clergy to the face of their victim, with the repetition 6f certain words, will be amply sufficient without their knowledge or consent; but to make Presbyterians, or what is infinitely more, to make christians of old, hardened drunkards, Universalists, and Deists, and especially such as omnipotence itself could not effect, must be a secret not only hidden from ages, but from the apostles of the Lamb. And if it be a fact, that christians can be made in this manner, surely none need be lost. One minister and two praying females can bid defiance to the most desperate case of hardened depravity that the world can produce; and by the application of these three simple rules, can get up revivals of religion at pleasure, convert whomsoever they will, head and rebut the Catholics, abolish Universalism, and exterminate Deism from the world. Seeing, then, the novelty of this engine for revival making, and the great utility which it claims, should not the Pastor Reverend Doctor apply to the instituted authorities for a patent right, in order that while they apply their scheme to the salvation, they may be able to show withal that the laborer is worthy of his hire?

But irony aside. Had we met with this article in the Evangelist, or any other arminian print not professing the Baptist name, we should have passed it by in silence; but as Dr. Jonathan Going, Corresponding Secretary of the American Home Mission Society, and editor of their paper, National Baptist and Home Mission Record, has culled it from the Evangelist, and would palm it upon professed Baptists, we are unwilling to let it pass, at least without our decided veto.

THE PATH WHICH NO FOWL KNOWETH.

“There is a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture’s eye hath not seen; the lion’s whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it.” - Job xxviii. 7, 8.

IN his communication on another page of this number, brother Meredith requests the views of brother Trott, or our own, on the passage quoted above. We have no disposition to anticipate brother Trott, or to prevent him from giving his views on the subject; but while we wait for his communication we will offer a few thoughts on the text, keeping in view the object of our brother’s inquiry, viz: Whether there is or is not a way passing between the sand bars of Arminanism and the granite rocks of Antinomianisin.

What we mean to express by the term Arminianism is spoken of (Prov. vii.) in the plural number, denoting, first, the way or path leading to the house of the anti-christian harlot; and second, denoting her house, which is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death, while the admonition is given to the children of wisdom. “Let not thine heart decline to her ways, go not astray in her paths.” - Verse 25. We will notice these two wars:

First, the way to her house, which is, we understand, the way by which the children of men are introduced into the various anti-christian religious establishments called christian churches, but which are in reality only the way which our Lord informs us is broad and the gate thereof is wide. In illustration of this way we might very readily refer our readers to all the religious trickery, doctrines, efforts, seductions and ordinances of men which are at this day employed in the business of convert-making and filling the numerous branches of anti-christ with members, a few only of which we have time and space now to remark upon.

The first way-mark connected with the Arminian path which we will remark upon is its contigiousness to the street or corner of her house. By a street we understand a public thoroughfare, a very public place. Such places were of old selected by the Pharisees for the performance of their ostentatious devotions; they prayed in the corner of the streets and in the market places, to be heard of men. Such a street fitly represents the path which every fowl knoweth; the place where we have all strayed while alienated from God, like the young man void of understanding, mentioned in verse 7th.

Secondly, this way leads directly to her house. - Verse 8th. "And he went the way to her house," by which we understand that no change is requisite from what we are by nature to bring us into any branch of anti-christ. We are born and live, until changed by grace, in the very path which leads to her broad gate; and many thousands have, by the Popish institution of infant sprinkling, been placed within her pales and lodged upon her lap. In the broad way of Arminianism there are no such stumbling stones and rocks of offence as divine sovereignty, discriminating grace, distinguishing love, special atonement, irresistible calling, &c., to trouble those who stumble at the word, whereunto also they were appointed. Arminianism is as clear from every sentiment of truth which is offensive to fallen sinners as the depraved sinner is of every principle of spirituality and holiness.

We notice, thirdly, the path leading to her house is a dark way, notwithstanding those who walk therein call it light; for they call light darkness, and darkness they call light. The sable shades of a darker night than the present have never enveloped the kingdom of Satan, yet we hear in their camp the universal shout of millennial glory dawning! The ninth verse shows that the time of fastening the anti-christian spell or charm on the simple ones is in the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night. This figurative language holds good in reference to the modus operandi convert making at protracted and camp meetings, on anxious benches or on the straw. The victim to be operated on must be in a twilight state as it regards his intellectual powers; for there are seasons when, even as rational beings, men would know better than to become the silly dupes of such gross priestcraft and fanaticism; but becoming somewhat intoxicated with the allurements presented, reason forsakes her empire, and the young man is quite destitute of understanding. Thus, in the progress of the work, first twilight, then evening, and finally the dark and black night. By this time we have the silly goat far advanced in the path to her house; he is now upon the anxious bench or the submission chair - here we will leave him a moment getting religion, in the direct way to her house, and pay some attention to the description which Wisdom has given us of her ladyship, by whom this work goes on, and also of her house.

She is briefly described (verse 5) as the strange woman, the stranger which flattereth with her words. In every description given of anti-christ in the scriptures, she is represented as a strange woman, a mystery of iniquity; and the very name now written on her forehead is Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and the Abominations of the Earth. She flattereth with her Words.

Reader, did you never hear her say to a poor, lost, ruined sinner, "I invite you to come; you can come; you have the power to come to Christ; the price is in your hand; it is for you to say whether you will be saved or lost; you have power to pray, to repent, to exercise faith, to use the means, to close in with the overtures of mercy, to make your peace with God, and to become at once a christian." This language is flattery, and not a word of truth in it; for "no man can come unto Jesus except the Father draw him." By her flattering words the sinner is led to conceive that he is some and mighty agent, having power to please or disappoint Jehovah; to let him into his heart, or prevent his entering! and he is flattered to that degree that he verily thinks he is able to perform for himself what he supposes the gracious Spirit of God might labor in vain to perform.

But this woman is not only a lying flatterer, but she is also loud and stubborn, and her feet abide not in her house. Now is she without, now in the streets, and lieth in wait at every corner. (Verses 11 and 12.) Her missionary operations have ever been a very prominent trait in her character - she abideth not in her house; she carries on extensive speculations in the foreign mission business; and although she has a house which is peculiarly her own, viz: her own religious establishments, yet she lieth in wait at every corner, creeps into some of our Baptist churches unawares, and leads captive silly women, laden with iniquity; and we are peculiarly happy if she does not find her way occasionally even among the Old School Baptists. But let the children of Wisdom beware of her; let not their hearts decline to her ways, go not astray in her paths. Her doctrine is with much fair speech, and with such persuasive expressions as can only be uttered by Arminians.

Hear her language to the silly half-made convert to her religion, which we left in the blackness and darkness of night sitting on her anxious stool a little while ago: "So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face said unto him, I have peace offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows; therefore came I forth to meet thee, dilligently to seek thy face, and I have found thee. I have decked my bed with tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt; I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes and cinnamon; come, let us take our fill of love." Is not this the very spirit of the language used by all the revivalists of our day? Do not they claim to have peace offerings with then! Come up to the altar, say they, we pray for you. We have the peace offerings to make; for we paid our vows; we have settled the account for ourselves, and we have room enough, religion enough, and rest and solace enough to supply all demands. Don't wait for the Lord to convert you; for the good man gone a long journey.

True there was once a time of miracles; then the Lord made converts to the christian religion, and added to his people such as shall be saved; but the day of miracles is past and gone. "The good man is not at home; he has taken a bag of money with him, and will return on the day appointed. Now hear the result of her efforts. "With her much fair speech she caused him to yield, with the flattering of her lips she forced him; he goeth after her straightway, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks."

Thus we have traced the process of the New School or Arminian methodism of making converts, illustrative of the way to her house; the way which seemeth right to a man; but the end whereof are the ways of death. But the victim knoweth not that the dead are there; he probably supposes that her inmates are living, are christians, and enjoying the vital power of the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ; he enters her house by the path which the vulture's eye can discern, and dwells among the dead. "She hath cast down many wounded, yea, many strong men have been slain by her." She never cast down any but the wounded, for sound christians know better than to listen to the flattering of her words. Strong self-conceited work-mongers are frequently slain by her.

As to our brother's allusion to Antinomianism we presume he means those doctrinal views which are frequently so denominated, viz: that sin is not a vice nor holiness a virtue, and that the children of God. are at liberty to sin that grace may abound. We do not consider these views properly involved in Antinomianism, as the term more appropriately signifies a difference between two laws; or anti against, nomia law; and in its appropriate definition was charged upon the apostle Paul by the orthodox party. Acts xxi. 28. Men of Israel, help! this is the man that teaches all men against the people and the law, &c. If therefore to preach as did the apostle Paul, that the church of Christ is not under the law of Moses, as a rule of life, but under grace, be Antinomianism, then that sentiment may be justly imputed to us; for it matters not to us by what epithet the enemies of the cross arc pleased to designate us. But if by Antinomianism we are to understand what is frequently intended by the use of that term, viz: that christians should sin that grace may abound, then the term will by no means apply to Old School Baptists, but rather to all the New School tribes who preach and practice that doctrine. For instance, they hold that it is proper to get up all the institutions of the day, and thereby amalgamate the church with the world in order to convert the heathen and evangelize the world, although God has positively forbidden all such amalgamation, and commanded his children to come out and be separate from them: also to withhold such points of truth in preaching, as would offend the multitude and drive them away, lest grace should not so much abound, and in in a thousand other particulars in which we could show that the spirit of what is called Antinomianism, exists only with the Arminians, and is in truth but Arminianism in another form.

Hence we come to the conclusion, after the most critical search we are capable of that if Arminianism be sand-bars, and Antonianism be granate rocks, that the path which no fowl knoweth cannot pass between them, as there is not room enough to crowd a needle point between them.

We cannot conceive that the way or path of holiness has any connection with either of the ways above described; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are God's ways higher than the ways and thoughts of man; the same disparity exists between the way of life and salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, and the paths marked out by human wisdom; the former as far transcends the latter as the heavdo the earth. The path intended in our text, cannot mean any middle ground system of divinity; but evidently signifies the unsearchable wisdom of God as demonstrated in the way of holiness, which is visible only to the wayfaring man, for whom it was cast up.

The glorious economy of grace - of salvation through Jesus Christ, as the only name given under heaven or among men by which we must be saved, is, as we intend briefly to show, a path which no fowl knoweth, and in every particular answering to the description given in the text.

By fowls we understand those high flyers in religion which are brought to view in the parable of the mustard seed, which come and lodge in the branches of the kingdom of heaven; not because they are any part of that kingdom, but because they wish there to build their nests, lay their eggs, and propagate, under the shadow and name of that kingdom, their species; and therefore may appropriately apply to all such as hang about the branches of Christ's kingdom while they do not belong to it; for, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God, in its spirituality. The vulture's eye hath not seen: the vulture's eye is remarkable for its keen preception, it can discry objects afar off; such as victims, carron, &c.; for the vulture is a bird of prey, and justly represents the wisdom of this world, which is very keen in natural things, and when brought into connection with religious matters, as the history of all past ages will prove, can only serve to search out the disciples of Christ as objects of their hatred and persecutions and victims of their wrath; and as the vulture's eye can perceive carron at a distance, so those worldly wise men connected with a religious profession can and do make great proficiency in the dead languages, can pounce upon dead men's brains, the dead body of Moses, &c., and so in the cunning subtlety of satan, make a great flourish in the world. But with all their cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive the hearts of the simple, they cannot see the things of the Spirit which are only spirdiscerned. God has hidden these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them unto babes; even so, for so it seemed good in his sight. Hence the way of holiness,. which is the path of all such as follow our Lord in the regeneration, is a way which the vulture's eye has not seen, the lion's whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it; for Isaiah has informed us that no lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast go up thereon, but it shall be for those the wayfaring men, &c., and by it the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion. By lions lions' whelps understand the same that brother Meredeth calls sand-bar & granate rocks, self-conceited, self-sufficient workmongers, who, like the lion and her whelps, feel amply sufficient to act as free agents. Such characters have never been able to set their paw into the plan of grace or the spirituality of the gospel; for none but such as are converted and become as little children can enter the strait gate, or walk the narrow road. Marvel not, said the Redeemer, that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again.

PATRICK HENRY.

WE find in the Baptist Register the following, and, to us, it is new. It appears that soon after Henry's noted case of "Tobacco and the Preserves," as it was sometimes called, he heard of a case of oppression for conscience sake. The English church having been established by law in Virginia, became, as all such establishments are wont to do, exceedingly intolerant towards other sects. In prosecution of this system of conversion, three Baptist clergymen had been indicted at Fredericksburgh, for preaching the gospel of God, contrary to the statute. Henry hearing of this, rode some fifty miles to volunteer his services in defence of the oppressed. He entered the court, being unknown to all present save the bench and the bar, while the indictment was being read by the clerk. He sat within the bar unti1 the reading was finished and the kings attorney had concluded some remarks in defence of the prosecution, when he rose, reached out his hand for the paper, and without more ceremony, proceeded with the following speech:

"May it please your worships: I think I heard read by the prosecutor, as I entered this house, the paper I now hold in my hand. If I have rightly understood, the king's attorney of the colony has framed an indictment for the purpose of arraigning and punishing by imprisonment, three inoffensive persons before the bar of this court, for a crime of great magnitude, as disturbers of the peace. May it please the court, what did I hear read? Did I hear it distinctly, or was it a mistake of my own? Did I hear an expression, as if a crime, that these men whom your worships are about to try for misdemeanor, are charged with – what?" and continuing in a low, solemn, heavy tone, "Preaching the gospel of the Son of God?" Pausing amidst the most profound silence and breathless astonishment, he slowly waved the paper three times around his head, when, lifting his hands and eyes to heaven, with peculiar and impressive energy he exclaimed: "Great God." The exclamation, the burst of feeling from the audience, were all overpowering. Mr. Henry resumed:

"May it please your worships: In a day like this, when truth is about to burst her fetters, when mankind are about to be aroused o claim their natura1 and unalienable rights, when the yoke of oppression, that has reached the wilderness of America, and the unnatural alliance of ecclesiastical and civil power are about to be dissevered, at such a period when liberty, liberty of conscience, is about to awake from her slumberings, and to inquire into the reason of such charges as I find exhibited here to-day in this indictment!" Another long pause, while he again waved the indictment round his head, while a deeper impression was made on the auditory. Resuming his speech: "May it please your worships: There are periods in the history of man, when corruption and depravity have so long debased the human character, that man sinks under the oppressor's hand, becomes his servile, his abject slave; he licks the hand that smites him; he bows in passive obedience to the mandates of the despot; and, in this state of servility, he receives his fetters of perpetual bondage. But, may it please your worships, such a day has passed away! From that period when our fathers left the land of their nativity for settlement in these American wilds, for liberty, for civil and religious liberty, for liberty of conscience to worship their Creator according to their own conceptions of heaven's revealed will, from the moment they placed their feet upon the American continent, and, in the deeply imbedded forest, sought an asylum from persecution and tyranny, from that moment despotism was crushed, the fetters of darkness were broken, and heaven decreed that man should be free, free to worship God according to the bible. Were it not for this, in vain were all their sufferings and bloodshed to subjugate this New World, if we, their offspring, must still be oppressed and persecuted. But, may it please your worships, permit me to ask once more, For what are these men about to be tried l This paper says, for preaching the gospel of the Savior to Adam’s fallen race.’ And, in tones of thunder, he exclaimed: “What law have they violated?” While the third time, in a low, dignified manner, he lifted his eyes to heaven, and waved the indictment round his head. The court and audience were now wrought up to the most intense pitch of excitement. The face of the prosecuting attorney was pallid and ghastly, and he seemed unconscious that his whole frame was agitated with alarm; while the judge, in a tremulous voice, put an end to the scene, now becoming excessively painful, by the authoritative declaration: “Sheriff, discharge those men.”

PEACE.

THE apostle to the Gentiles, in his epistle to the church of God, at Rome, has given us the following salutary exhortation, “If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men;” and this exhortation applies with equal force, to all the sons of God; not only are they to be at peace among themselves, in their social and religious relations, but as much as in them lieth, to live peacebly with all men. It is certainly very far from the disposition, temper, and spirit of the christian, to wish to indulge in broils, tumults, contentions, and warfare with any; but they are more especially averse to disunion in the church of God; there they find it good and pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity. But the question arises, to what extent, or how far doth it lie in the saints to live peaceably with all men? Christians may be involved in contentions from various causes, sometimes from their own injudicious movements, or their errors in faith or practice, they may be thus involved; and when this is their case, they are admonished to correct the wrong. This correction devolves upon them. The apostle would even sacrifice some things which were, under other circumstances, lawful to him, as eating of meats, &c., rather than break the peace of Zion. But contentions more generally arise between the humble followers of the Lamb, and false professors and the world, from causes far, very far from their control. When, for instance, the truth or order of the gospel of Christ, becomes the ‘matter of contention, there is no compromise to be made of truth and gospel order for the sake of peace with men. This lieth not in them. That is, there is no power or authority vested in them as christians, to accommodate their faith and practice to the views of others, to insure peace. Such peace would be exceedingly dishonorable to the cause in which they are engaged, and a direct violation of the laws of the kingdom of Christ.

The people of God are commanded to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. Earnestly, not carnally, by the use of carnal weapons, or by inflicting injuries upon the persons of their enemies. Recompense to no man evil for evil. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath, for it is written; "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." Therefore, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink, &c. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." From these scriptures it will, it does appear, how far it lieth in the christian to preserve peace. He is required to live soberly, righteously and godly, in the present world, to abstain from all appearance of evil, giving no occasion to Jew or Greek to speak reproachfully of the cause; but to go beyond this they have no right: and any peace which they can eflfect by forsaking the cause of truth and righteousness, is not worth a name. We know by our own experience, and by divine revelation, that all who are so favored of the Lord as to be able to live godly, shall suffer persecution.

Let it be remembered since the fall of man from his original purity and innocence, there has never been enjoyed among his fallen race, anything like a solid peace, either civil or religious, which has not been generally obtained at the expense of blood. To obtain the civil and religions rights which we now enjoy in this country, our fathers' blood was poured forth in torrents, and their bones were scattered over the soil of our widely extended country. That peace which has flowed unto the people of God like a river, cost the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the sweet communion, peace and fellowship, now prevailent among the Old School Baptists, has cost a long and sore conflict with the armies of the aliens.

Bitter as time world and anti-christ are against God, and against all that is good and holy in the divine estimation, they are now, and have been, ready to make a treaty with the church, providing she would accede to the terms proposed by the world. Eighteen hundred years ago, the world pronounced their terms, “Let him come down from the cross and we will believe on him.” But these terms were not accepted by the good Master then, nor by the apostle, who said, if he yet pleased men, he was not the servant of Christ. The offense of the cross had not ceased among the Baptists in the apostolic age. We are well persuaded that the new light Baptists are grossly mistaken in supposing that the world is becoming evangelized, and less averse to the gospel of Christ, than formerly; less at war, and more at peace. The true secret is, instead of the world’s making peace with the church, the professed church, has made peace with the world, and that by accepting the dishonorable terms so long ago rejected by the Lord and his apostles. Instead of the world joining the church, the professed church has joined the world; the world has corrupted the church. So far from resulting in the peace of Zion, these amalgamations have served to organize all the united powers of earth and hell under a religious, and professedly christian name, to wage war with the remnant of the saints, who keep the commandments and have the testimony of Jesus Christ. It is therefore impossible that the people of God should live peaceably with all men, while the abominations of Jezebel are so many. 2 Kings ix. 22.

PENNIES! PENNIES!! PENNIES!!!

WHO that heard the old apostle Peter declare that the people of God were not redeemed with such corruptible things as silver and gold, would have anticipated the astonishing change which a few brief centuries would develop in the creed of those who profess to be members of the same church with that distinguished apostle of the Lamb? - with those who profess to be governed alone in all their religious faith and practice by the doctrine of the apostles and the precepts of Christ? The following verses, which we copy from the Cross and Journal, are going the round of the New School Baptist papers, with high commendation for their beauty and adaption to the modern mission cause. We soil a column of our present number with these filthy rhymes, to show our readers how much more real value and efficiency they attribute to a single penny, than they do to the blood of Christ and quickening power of the Holy Ghost:

“PART I.

A grain of corn an infant’s hand
May plant upon an inch of land,
Whence twenty stalks may spring and yield Enough to stock a little field.

The harvest of that field might then
Be multiplied to ten times ten,
Which, sown thrice more would furnish bread
Wherewith an army might be fed.

PART II.

A penny is a little thing,
Which e’en a poor man’s child may fling

Into the treasury of heaven,
And make it worth as much as seven.

As seven! nay, worth its weight in gold,
And that increased a million fold;
For lo! a penny tract if well
Applied, may save a soul from hell.

That soul can scarce be saved alone,
It must, it will, its bliss make known;
'Come,' it will cry, 'and you shall see
What great things God has done for me.'

Hundreds that joyful sound may hear:
Hear with their hearts as well as ear;
And these to thousands more proclaim,
Salvation in 'the only name.'*

That 'Only Name' above, below,
Let Jews, and Turks, and Pagans know;
Till every tongue and tribe shall call
On 'Jesus' as the Lord of all!"

* Of pennies.
 Should read "pennies" to make sense.

A poor man's child may be induced to approach one step nearer to the point of starvation, or to endure still keener sufferings of hunger, cold and distressing want, and throw his hard wrung penny, (the last farthing of all his earthly possessions, which should go to alleviate the wretchedness of his widowed mother or fellow suffering orphan babes) into the devouring jaws of these greedy wolves, under the delusive notion that he is enriching God, by casting a mite into the treasury of heaven, which if rightly applied by the fiscal agent of the heavenly treasury, will effect the eternal salvation of hundreds and thousands, who would otherwise be eternally lost, meager the provisions of grace and redemption by Christ.

The New School Baptists represent God as having as little to do with the salvation of sinners, as he has in the tilling of the earth, ploughing, sowing, &c. In agriculture, one seed may vegetate and produce ten again and again, until multiplied to an indefinite amount. The quickening of dead souls, with them, is quite as mechanically performed by men, as the production of corn.

PERSECUTIONS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

THE first settlers of the New England states, as is pretty well known, were men who fled from civil and religious persecution in England in the early part of the seventeenth century. As they had felt in their own persons and fortunes the sorrows of oppression for conscience sake, it might naturally be expected that they would have had some sympathy for others in like circumstances. In this respect, however, the Pilgrim Fathers, as they have been termed, were no better than the men before whom they had fled. A volume might be written of their doings in the way of intolerance, but the following short chapter may suffice:

In the year 1656, when the colonist of Massachusetts were complacently congratulating themselves on having established a vigorous system of uniformity in religious matters, and expressing great thankfulness for having escaped from the troubles which had lately agitated England, they were very much surprised that two women of the sect which had begun to be called Quakers were arrived at Boston from Barbadoes. There was no law in the colony against such persons; but that was considered unimportant; it was easy to make a little law for the occasion, or easier still to act without any law at all. This last alternative was adopted. The two unfortunate women against whose character there was no reproach, were seized and put in prison; a few books found in their trunks were burnt by the hangman; and after suffering various indignities, they were turned out of the country. Persecution requires only a little spark to kindle it into a great flame. It would almost seem as if the misusage of the two women caused a flocking of the Quakers from all points of the compass to Boston, only for the sake of getting ill-treated. In a short time eight made their appearance, and they in like manner were imprisoned and banished. Thinking it now time to have a little law to regulate proceedings, a local court passed an enactment, declaring that any Quakers who should hereafter arrive in the colony should be severely whipped, and confined at hard labor in the house of correction. Immediately afterwards several came, were whipped, confined, and dismissed; and others took their place. It was evident the law was too lenient, so a fresh enactment was passed. Fines were imposed on every person who gave house room to Quakers, or who attended their meetings, or otherwise sanctioned their pernicious opinions. Every Quaker after the first conviction, if a man, was to lose one ear, and the second time the other; if a woman, she was each time to be severely whipped; and for the third offence, both men and women were to have their tongues bored through with a red hot iron. Quakers now arrived in the colony in great numbers. Glorying in their sufferings, the more they were persecuted, the more they came to testify their sincerity in their belief. Whippings, confinements, hard labor, fines, cutting off the ears, and boring the tongue being thus found ineffectual, a new law was passed in 1668, declaring that in future all Quakers who intruded themselves into Massachusetts should be banished on pain of death. Three Quakers forthwith offered themselves as the first victims; they had returned from banishment. Their names were Mary Dyer, Marmaduke Stephenson, and Wìlliam Robinson. From their defence at their trial, nothing is more plain than they were persons in a state of frenzy: their general argument was, that by means of visions they were induced to come to Massachusetts and brave the worst that could be done to them. Mary Dyer saw her two brethren die before her eyes; and she was on the point of meeting the same dreadful doom, the rope being already around her neck, “when a faint shout was heard in the distance, which grew stronger and stronger, and was soon caught and repeated by a hundred willing hearts. ‘A reprieve, a reprieve!’ was the cry, and the execution was stopped; but she whose mind was intently fastened on another world, cried out that she desired to suffer with her brethren, unless the magistrates would repeal their wicked law.

“She was saved by the intercession of her son, but on the express condition that she should be carried to the place of execution, and stand upon the gallows with a rope about her neck, and then be carried out of the colony. She was acrdingly taken to Rhode Island; but her resolution was still unshaken, and she was again moved to return to the ‘bloody town of Boston,’ where she arrived in the spring of 1650. This determination of a feeble and aged woman, to brave all the terrors of their laws, might well fill the magistrate with astonishment; but the pride of consistency had already involved them in acts of extreme cruelty, and thought it impossible now to recede. The other executions were considered acts of stern necessity, and caused much discontent; a hope was entertained until the last moment that the condemned would consent to depart from jurisdiction: and which Mary Dyer was sent for by the court, after her second return, Governor Endicott said, ‘Are you the same Mary Dyer that was here before?’ giving her an opportunity to escape by a denial of the fact, there having been another of the name returned from England. But she would make no evasion. ‘I am the same Mary Dyer that was here at the last general court.’ ‘You will own yourself a Quaker, will you not?’ “I own myself to be reproachfully called so;’ and she was sentenced to be hanged on the morning of the next day. ‘This is no more than thou saidest before,’ was her intrepid reply, when the sentence of death was pronounced. ‘ But now,’ said the Governor, ‘it is to be executed, therefore prepare yourself, for to-morrow at nine o’clock you die.!’ ‘I came,’ was the reply, ‘in obedience to the will of God, to the last general court, desiring you to repeal your unrighteous law of banishment on pain of death, and the same is my work now, and earnest request; although I told you if you refused to repeal them the Lord would send others of his servants to witness against them.'

"At the appointed time on the next day she was brought forth, and, with a band of soldiers, led through town about a mile to the place of execution, the drums beating before and behind her the whole way. When she was on the gallows, it was told her if she would return home she might come down and save her life; to which she replied, 'Nay, I cannot, for in obedience to the will of the Lord I came, and in his will I abide faithful unto death.' Another said that she had been there before; she had the sentence of banishment upon pain of death, and had broken the law in coming again now, and therefore she was guilty of her own blood. 'Nay,' she answered, 'I came to keep blood guiltiness from you, desiring you to repeal the unrighteous and unjust law of banishment upon pain of death, made against the innocent servants of the Lord; therefore my blood will be required at your hands, who willfully do it; but for those who do it in the simplicity of their hearts, I desire the Lord to forgive them. I came to do the will of my Father, and in obedience to his will I stand even till death.' A minister who was present then said, 'Mary Dyer, repent, oh repent, and be not so deluded and carried away by the deceit of the devil!' But she answered, 'Nay, man, I am not now to repent.' She added that she desired the prayers of all the people of God. 'Perhaps,' said one, scoffingly, 'she thinks there is none here.' Then, looking around, she said, 'I know but few here.' Being again asked to have one of the elders pray for her, she said, 'Nay, first a child, then a young man, then a strong man, before an Elder in Christ Jesus.' She spoke of the other world and of the eternal happiness into which she was about to enter; and 'in this well disposed condition was turned off, and died a martyr of Christ, being twice led to death, which the first time she expected with undaunted courage, and now suffered with christian fortitude.’ ‘ She hangs as a flag for others to take example by, said a member of the court, as the lifeless body hung suspended from the gallows.”

Intead of being a warning, her death was only an encouragement. Another Quaker, named William Leddra, soon made his appearance, and after a tedious imprisonment, during which he was chained to a log of wood, he was brought to trial on the usual charge of returning from banishment. There was a dash of the ludicrous in the proceedings. One of the charges against him was that he refused to take off his hat in court, and another was that he persevered in saying “thee” and “thou.” “Will you put me to death,” he asked, “ for speaking good English, and for not putting off my clothes!” “A man may speak treason in good English,” was the reply. “Is it treason to say ‘thee’ and ‘thou’ to single persons?” No good rejoinder could here be made by the judges, and while they were trying to stop his mouth by a few more questions, to their exceeding dismay another Quaker, named Winlock Christison, who had also returned from banishment, entered the court and placed himself beside the prisoner. The case of Leddra was at first despatched, by condemning him to be executed, and this atrocity was committed on the 14th of March. Christison at a second appearance, before ‘the court, received a like sentence, but leaving, him the choice of voluntary banishment, and this latter alternative he appears to have embraced. The next culprits of the same class were Judah Browne and Peter Pierson, who, for no offence that we can perceive but that of being Quakers, were condemned to be tied to a cart’s tail and whipped through several towns in the colony. Immediately after, as appears from the records of the court, a day of thanksgiving was appointed to be kept in acknowledgement of the many mercies enjoyed for years past “in this remote wilderness.”

According to Mr. Cliaudler,* from whose interesting work we have derived these in melancholy details, the persecutions in Massachusetts gave offence to Charles II., who had other reasons to be dissatisfied with the colonists. He therefore enjoined all the governors of New England to proceed no farther with corporal punishments against Quakers, but to send them to England with their respective crimes specifically set forth, in order that they might be disposed of according to law. The Quakers in London immediately chartered a vessel, and the mandamus being committed to Samuel Shattock, who had been banished from Massachusetts on pain of death, he arrived in the harbor of Boston in six weeks. The king’s messenger and the commander of the ship landed on the day after their arrival, and proceeded directly to the governor’s house. Admitted to his presence, He ordered Shattock’s hat to be removed, but, after perusing the letters, restored it and took off his own. After consultation with the deputy-governor, he informed the messenger that they should obey the king’s command. In the evening the pasengers of the ship came on shore, and, with their friends in the town, held a meeting, “where they returned praises to God for his mercy, manifested in their wonderful deliverance.”

The colonial laws against Quakers were now abolished, and there were no more executions of this unhappy class of persons; but the magistracy were hostile to the sect, and for years afterwards they contrived to whip and otherwise maltreat any Quakers who fell into their hands; it would indeed seem doubtful whether the tortures and indignities they occasionally inflicted, particularly on the persons of females, were not worse than death. The authority to which we have referred observes with justice that the Quakers who exposed themselves to these seventies were not by any means blameless. Unlike the orderly society of Friends in the present day, they appear to have taken a delight in annoying the constituted authorities, and disturbing the public peace.

Much of this, however, was produced by their sufferings in the first instance; and the more violent amongst them, from a variety of causes, were evidently wrought up to a state of religious insanity. Allowing that the were as troublesome as their worst enemies can possibly represent them, there can now be but one sentiment respecting their treatment – unqualified condemnation of their oppressors. It is true there were laws equally severe against Quakers in Virginia and elsewhere; but this does not lessen the crime of the magistracy of Massachusetts. Descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers who fled to the wilderness from persecution, if not themselves refugees, they ought to have sympathized in the eccentricities Or convictions of others when placed in similar circumstances. How true is the remark of our author that "Religious intolerance was the mistake of that age!"

PERSONAL CORRESPONDENCE.

The following correspondence was not written for publication; nor have we asked or obtained the consent of our correspondent to expose it in our columns; but as the entire subject matter of her letter, and our reply, is of common interest to all the tried, trembling, doubting lambs of the flock, in the hope that its perusal will be useful to others, we take the liberty to present it to our readers. As we suppress her signature and her place of date, we think the writer will not charge us with a breach of trust. Having bad some previous correspondence and personal acquaintance with the writer, we fully believe she is a subject of grace, and an heir of glory, not withstanding all her doubts and fears.

Dear Elder Beebe: - Many times I have thought I would never again write to one on the subject of religion, then I feel how very ungrateful it is in me to your kindness in this way. But which is the worse crime, write and perhaps deceive those whom you have the least desire to deceive, or be silent and let them you know not what the feeling of gratitude is? I often think, dear Elder that I have deceived you, though I do not think it has been my intention to. I think the animal feelings can become excited when there is really no of heart. I have felt for the last few weeks indifferent to everything; my heart, as it were, has lost its feeling; there is a hopelessness connected with the future, and I often feel that it matters but little whether I live or die. I think of all states of the mind, this is the most to be deplored. In reading the other evening I came to this passage:

"So we see they could not enter in because of unbelief (Hebrews 3:19)."

What has this reference to? Does it refer to any members of the church of God? If so, what rest is meant? It cannot be their final rest, for the Bible says, "they rest from their labors and their works do follow them." And we know that all the saints will attain that rest; none will fall short of it.

I often desire rest, feeling weary and heavy laden. Christ says, "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Now if I could feel that the weariness that I feel is the weariness spoken of by the Savior, then this promise would be very precious; but every thing to me is uncertain. I cannot allow myself to hope, for fear I may at last find myself doomed to hell. You think it is because I look for perfection in myself that I do not find that consolation in the gospel that the subjects of grace receive. I do not think I look for perfection in myself; I know there is no good in me; though I think if I were a Christian I would be different from what I am. Still, what right have Ito look to Christ; I have no claim there? From the hour of my birth to the present time I have sinned against him. My heart sickens at the thought of my hopeless condition. I often feel that if I could exchange places with any one in the world, there would be some hope. You will ask why there is not as much hope for me as for others? I know not; God is so far off he never hears my cry; beside he knows what a wicked deceitful heart I have, and he knows I am unworthy of any notice. I try to give up thinking of the future, but I cannot. I endeavor to find pleasure in my old pursuits, but I have lost my relish for them. I used to take great pleasure in politics; was well posted on all the issues of the day. Now I cannot endure the subject; I feel but little interest in the welfare of the country, I know God will rule it for his own glory; he undoubtedly has a people here, and when they are gathered home, the balance will soon be disposed of. I used to think the acquisition of knowledge was the great object of life, but that also has lost its charm. I visited a lecture at Rome the other day but found my interest in such had passed away. When I think of these things I feel there has been a change, but Oh! What right have Ito hope this is the change I desire? You will think I am a strange being; but do not, if it is any trouble, write me any more. I fully appreciate your kindness and would gladly repay you if I could, but all that my friends can say to me cannot relieve me of troubles, it is there to remain till God lifts the burden, and I fear that may never be. You say in your letter that you hope I may be an obedient child. O! how willingly I would follow in the footsteps of the blessed Savior did I feel that I dare claim him as mine. If I knew one drop of his precious blood was shed for me, I would rejoice all the days of my life; but you will not ask me to follow in the footsteps of the flock when I feel to have no place there. I would rather remain without always, and have a little enjoyment lingering around the fold, than to enter in and know I were a wolf in sheep's clothing. I have the greatest fear of being a hypocrite. I feel it would be a great pleasure to me if no one knew any thing about my feelings, then I think I would not deceive any one, but as it is, so many have spoken to me on the subject that if I am deceived, my deception has been extensive.

Is it possible for one to feel any spiritual enjoyment who has never had a full and complete Savior presented to their view?

Is it possible for any one to receive a change of heart who is not aware of such change?

Does the Christian ever feel sure of his acceptance in Christ?

I would like to ask many more questions but fear I may weary you. When I used to read the many experiences in the "Signs of the Times," I thought how strange it was the writers did not know it was the Lord dealing with them. I felt if I should ever become troubled I would immediately know the cause. How very wise we are in our own estimation. Trouble has since overtaken me and I find my worldly wisdom of no avail.

Last fall when my mind first became interested in my future welfare, I thought if I only could become well enough acquainted with some of the ministers to tell them how I felt, they could tell if my feelings were those of a Christian. I have had that pleasure; have become acquainted with some I have the greatest confidence in; have talked freely with them; they have all spoken words of encouragement, and yet, dear Elder Beebe, I have no more hope than I had before I was acquainted with them. I feel that it is possible in my case that they are deceived. I would be willing to receive their judgments in regard to others, but myself I cannot. My desire to attend the association was gratified; I heard what should have comforted any one, except they be so deep in sin that their case is hopeless. You see I have been gratified in many things, but have not found that consolation I was seeking. Dear Elder Beebe, for the last four or five years I have been unable listen with any degree of patience to an Arminian sermon. I felt in my heart what they preached was false. I would try not to listen to it, yet my mind would be keenly alive to every word; again when I would have an opportunity to hear the gospel, my mind perhaps would wander so I would not hear a dozen words. Now why was this, if my dislike for the doctrine of salvation by works had arisen from a love for the truth, would not I have appreciated the truth when I heard it? Is it not all prejudice from first to last? I have been taught to believe that salvation is of grace. I have learned the letter and know nothing of the Spirit. I cannot remember the time when I could not detect the difference between a gospel sermon and one that was not. I never hated the gospel; I may not have loved it, but I never hated. If I had, and had been made to love it, then I would know what I am. When no more than nine years of age, I have heard sermons that impressed me deeply. At about this time I heard you preach from the text: "Christ, to the Jews a stumbling block, and to the Greeks foolishness," etc. The sermon troubled me a great deal, but I have lived twenty years since then, and still without hope and without God in the world. If you think this worthy of an answer, I should be very glad to hear from you. But do not allow me to weary your patience. My ideas are very disconnected, but I am not able to write a nicely connected letter.

Believe me as ever your unworthy friend.

Reply: - My esteemed, tried, tempted, tempest-tossed friend; your letter of the inst. is received, describing, to my judgment, a quickened, living child of God; but in a state of severe trial occasioned by doubts and unbelief. If you have never passed from death unto life, how shall we account for this state of things? You "think the animal feelings can become excited, when there is really no change of heart." And so do

I. Our physical powers and nervous system are subject to excitements; such as are common to all our race: but it is equally true that when the cause of such agitation is removed the excitement ceases, and the mind settles back to its former tranquility. But such is not your case. Your love for the society of the saints, and for the doctrine which gives God all the glory of the eternal salvation of his people is not an effect resulting from excitement of animal passions. No excitement can change our nature so as to make us love that which our carnal nature always hates. It cannot make us love God, his cause, his people, his truth, or his ordinances. The children of Israel had no less right to declare that the golden calf which they had made was the god that brought them out of Egypt than you have to ascribe the change which has been wrought in you to animal excitement. With them it was idolatry. God's glory he will not give to another, nor his praise to graven images.

There have been times when you have felt a comfortable assurance that you were born again; and at such times you were disposed to seek the society of the children of God, and follow and obey your Lord and Master. But because you are not permitted to feel the same assurance at all times, you cast aside all that God has done for you, and almost deny that he has done anything for you. Is this right? Would you really choose rather to walk by sight than to live by faith? If not, why appeal from faith to sense; and insist on having some evidence that can be demonstrated to your reasoning powers? Do you think if an angel were sent down from heaven, and with your eyes you could see him, and with your ears could hear him say you were a child of God and an heir of glory, that that would satisfy you? If all that were done, your confidence would not result from faith, but sight. "For what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?" God's people must live by faith and not walk by sight. The passage in Hebrews 3, to which you refer, is full of instruction for you. The children of Israel were typical of the people of God. They could not enter into rest because of unbelief. The land of Canaan was a type of gospel rest; but they disbelieved the promise of God, and came short of that rest; and their carcasses fell in the wilderness. It is even so with the spiritual children of God; it is only so far as our faith triumphs over our fears and unbelief that we can enter into and enjoy that Sabbath of rest wherein we cease from all our own works-from thinking our own thoughts, and from speaking our own words. You cannot deny that whenever you have been enabled to believe that you were a subject of grace, you have felt at rest. You could rest in the promises which God has spoken, in the oaths which he has sworn, and in the sweet consolations this hope has afforded you. And you continued to rest securely, and sweetly, until your unbelief arose to dispute your faith and confidence in God. But as soon as you began to doubt, you became disquieted and restless. How is it possible for a child to rest in the Redeemer when he does not believe in him as his Redeemer?

All our faith is the fruit of the Spirit which is born of God. And all our doubts are from our carnal minds which are not subject to the law of God; neither indeed can be. In every heaven-born child, both of these opposite and conflicting natures exist. The flesh warring against the spirit, the spirit against the flesh. But remember, they cannot possibly both be found in any one that is not born of the Spirit. Hence the very conflicts in your mind which you regard as witnesses against you are positive evidence that you are born again. Your fleshly powers resist the evidences of your heavenly birth, and it is not possible it should be otherwise; for your natural mind cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God, nor know them, for they are only spiritually discerned. But you, like a fretful child, cherish and nurse your doubts, fears, and unbelief, and refuse to be comforted by the testimony which the word presents to your faith. And why? Only because your natural mind cannot perceive them.

Could you and I be entirely divested of the selfishness of our carnal nature, and raised above it, we should have no trouble, toil or labor about our own personal interest in Jesus; all that we should leave in better, safer hands than ours and we should gaze with joy and admiration on what faith presents to our minds-of the uncreated glory of our adorable God and Savior. There would be rest. All our care he bids us cast on him: he assumes it all; he careth for us. Why then, if we can trust him, should we care for ourselves? Who is it that feeds the ravens, clothes in beauty the lilies, and protects the sparrows? Can we by taking thought add to our stature one cubit, or make a hair black or white?

"Then doubting child, forbid your fears,
For all he has, and is, are yours."

That hopelessness in regard to the future which settles heavily upon your mind, of which you speak, is but the natural consequence of unbelief; cherished unbelief. Faith reviving in your heart will say, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, [not in thyself, nor in thy frames and feelings! for I shall yet praise him; who is the health of my countenance and my God."

If yours is not the uneasiness spoken of by the Savior, of what kind does he speak, and to what class does your weariness belong? Is yours a kind that can find relief any where else but in Jesus? Why allow your unbelief and the tempter to criticize, pervert, and cast from you the blessed words on which God's children feed and thrive?

You cannot allow yourself to hope for fear that at last you will find yourself doomed to hell! Poor child! What have you to do with hell; or hell to do with you? If Jesus had not redeemed you from hell, you would never have been sensible of your lost estate; you never would have been weary and heavy laden; you would never have hungered and thirsted after righteousness; you never would have lost your relish for sin; you never would have loved the company of the saints or desired to be one; you never would have seen a beauty in the holy ordinances of the gospel, nor seen the kingdom of God. The fear of hell could never make you love holiness or desire companionship with the children of the living God. Nothing but the love of God himself shed abroad in your heart could make you love God, his word, his people or his ordinances.

You say, you do not look for perfection in yourself; but think if you were a Christian you would be different from what you are. Just so would say every Christian on earth. Ask any of them; even Paul has told you that, to will was present with him, but how to perform that which is good he found not. He could not do the things that he would. And you ask, "What right have Ito look to Christ?" The best possible right; for he has commanded you to do so. "Look unto me, and be ye saved, for I am God, and there is none else (Isaiah 45:22)." It takes a God to save a sinner; you are a sinner, and as there is no other God, it is vain to look to any other source for salvation. He says, I am God, and beside me there is no Savior. This constitutes your right; and the very fact that you have no claim on God proves that you are the very sinner that he has thus called: for Jesus came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. And yet another unmistakable mark you have that you are the very sinner Jesus came to save is that you are the chief of sinners, sickened at heart in view of your vileness, and so much worse than anybody else that you often feel that if you could exchange places with anyone in the world, there would then be some hope in your case. Do you not believe it is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save the very chief of sinners?

What right have you to say that God is so far off he does not hear your cry? You no doubt feel that you are far off from God; because he is so holy, and you feel so vile; but it is God that works in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure. And if he did not know how wicked and deceitful a heart you have, and that of yourself you are utterly unworthy of his notice, your case would be hopeless indeed; for if he knew not our malady how would he know how to cure? Who but God has caused you to see and feel and acknowledge how vile and sinful you are? Who but God has sent a famine upon all the vanities on earth in which you once delighted? Who but God has given you a longing desire to be a Christian? Do you ascribe the work to any other than the God that made you? You say, He undoubtedly has a people here, and when they are gathered home, the balance will soon be disposed of. This you do not doubt, of this you are fully satisfied; and so am I. But what evidence have you that this is true, more than you have that you are one of that very people: for without an exception they all have the very same experience in every essential particular that you relate? How much easier it is for us to be satisfied with the experience of others than with our own. You are compelled to admit that in your own case there has been a change. The things you once loved now you hate; your views, and taste, and desires, and hopes, and fears are none of them such as you once had; and yet you ask, what right have you to hope that this is the change that you desire? Precisely the same that any other quickened one has to hope: and my impression is that in spite of yourself you are obliged to hope, and do hope; but the trouble is, like all others who have this hope, you find it opposed by the darkness and unbelief of your own unrenewed nature; by doubts and fears that you will have to battle with as long as you remain here in the flesh. Truly the words of all your friends are powerless unless God by his Spirit shall apply them with comfort to your heart.

I would by no means urge any one to profess faith in the Lord Jesus who does not possess such faith, nor to be baptized who has never felt a sincere love to the people of God; but we hold that it is not possible that one can truly love the brethren who has not passed from death unto life, or that any can love the brethren who do not love the Lord Jesus Christ: and his command is, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." He does not say, If ye feel worthy, if ye have no doubts and fears, or if ye know that one drop of his precious blood was shed especially for you; but simply, if ye love me, for if you love him, it is positive proof that he first loved you, and gave himself for you, and that not merely one drop, but all the rich fountain of his blood was shed for the remission of your sins.

If you were a hypocrite, you would be trying to deceive. A fear of deceiving and being deceived is a mark of sincerity and truth. And certainly no hypocrite or wolf in sheep's clothing could find any enjoyment in lingering around the fold of Christ, except for the purpose of devouring the flock. You cannot conceal your love for the people of God, and desire to be numbered with them, for your speech, looks, and actions all betray you.

To your questions I answer, It is not possible that one can feel a particle of spiritual enjoyment, who is not born of God. For, as before quoted, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." That measure of spiritual enjoyment is an earnest of an incorruptible inheritance of glory; and we may add, in the words of the poet,

"Yes, I to the end shall endure
As sure as the earnest is given;
More happy, but not more secure
Are the glorified spirits in heaven."

Is it possible, you ask, for any one to receive a change of heart who is not aware of such a change? There are evidences given to all who have passed from death unto life, such as I have already enumerated; but there are thousands who like yourself are distrustful of such evidences as the Scriptures warrant them to rely upon; such as a love of the brethren, desire after holiness, a disrelish for carnal enjoyments in which they have once delighted: and the seeing a beauty in the ordinances of the church of God.

Some are very suddenly ushered into the light and liberty of the gospel, and can tell the day and hour, the place and circumstances when their deliverance came; but others who may be numbered by thousands have been led in such a manner as never to be able to tell when they ceased to hate, and when they began to love the Savior, and his people. But the fact that they do love Christ and desire to honor and obey him are equally as reliable and scriptural evidences that they are born of God, as though an angel came down from heaven and declared it.

Again you ask, "Does a Christian ever feel sure of his acceptance in Christ?" Yes. There are times when Christians enjoy the faith of assurance; but as a general thing, those precious seasons are few and far between. Whenever they confer with flesh and blood, doubts arise, fears prevail, and unbelief is master of the field. When faith revives and looks within the vail; then it puts our doubts to flight, and again we enter into rest.

Again, your case is not unlike all the children of God in being keenly sensitive when you hear the truth of God blasphemed by Arminians; and often sluggish and inattentive while sitting under the preaching of the gospel. The rantings of Arminians are understood and repelled by our knowledge of the truth; but the preaching of the gospel must be sent home by the Spirit before it can animate and feed us. Prejudice never taught any one to know that salvation is of grace; nor can the letter of that doctrine be so acquired as to qualify one to detect error, unless the error be so gross as to be apparent to our natural judgment. You may not be conscious of a time when you ever hated the gospel, but you certainly came into the world with a hatred to it. Your change of heart may have been as early, or even before you were nine years of age; and your being troubled in hearing me preach at that early period may have been in consequence of the word being sent home with divine power to your quickened heart.

In conclusion, let me say, it cannot be right for us to cherish the unbelief and infidelity of our carnal reason, and reject the evidences which God has warranted us to rely upon. Nor are we justifiable, if we love God and his people, and his truth, and see a beauty in the ordinances which he has enjoined on all who love him, to tempt God by saying, unless he shall give us greater evidences than he has given to others, or such as will be tangible to our mental powers, we will not obey his precepts. Thomas said, "Except I see the prints of the nails," etc., I will not believe that Christ is risen. Was that commendable in Thomas? Is the like commendable in us?

Here I must leave the subject for the present; for the conversation I have had with you, and the evidences received, I cannot doubt that you are a subject of saving grace; and although the tempter may strive to make you think that it is wise and prudent in you to cast away or under rate the evidence you have of your acceptance with God, to demand more, or a different kind of testimony, I will only remind you that you will find that the way of the transgressor is hard.

Deeply solicitous for your spiritual welfare, I am your sincere friend and kindred in Christ.

PHILIPPIANS I. 15-19

DEAR ELDER BEEBE: – When you have opportunity, please give your views through the SIGNS on Philippians i. 15-19. I ask for information. There is something in this declaration that I cannot understand. Your compliance with this request will greatly oblige a poor, ignorant worm, who is the least of all saints, of one at all.

REPLY: – We have not so clear an understanding of the apostle's meaning in regard to those of whom he speaks in this passage as we could wish, and greatly fear that what we may write will fail to satisfy the inquiring mind of our highly esteemed brother; but such thoughts as we have on the subject we do not feel at liberty to withhold.

The apostle in this chapter speaks of being in bonds, and being opposed by envious and malicious opposers, who were ready to add affliction to his bonds. At the time of writing, Paul was a prisoner at Rome. But in his exile from the land of his nativity, and from many of his kindred in Christ, he had the consoling assurance that the cruel persecution he suffered from the vagabond Jews, who had bound themselves under a curse that they would silence his preaching Christ – that they would neither eat nor drink until they had killed him, and all other enemies who had occasioned his arrest, God had overruled it all, in a manner that it had fallen out rather into the furtherance of the gospel. Instead of hindering or restricting its promulgation, it had been, by the overruling power and providence of God, the occasion of spreading it even in the very capital of the Roman Empire. Not only were their wicked intentions thwarted by the spread of the gospel ministry into the city of Rome, but it had stimulated many of the brethren, who, waxing confident by Paul's bonds, became much more bold and preserving to speak the word without fear. This has generally been the result of persecution which has been raised against the preaching of the gospel. In the early persecutions the saints were scattered into distant places; and we are told that they were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word. – Acts viii. 4. Before his conversion, Saul had himself unintentionally contributed to the dissemination of the preaching of the word, which he labored so zealously to suppress.

Some indeed preach or publish Christ even of envy and strife; or by their violent efforts to suppress its proclamation, they occasioned its more extended spread. We are not without instances at the present time of those who have by their envy and strife against some portions at least of the preached word, for instance, the eternity of the vital union of the head and body of the church, the distinct nature of that which is born of incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth foever, from that which is born of the flesh, and of corruptible seed, that is mortal, and must die; but the opposition made, whether from envy, strife, or from a lack of a clearer understanding of the truth, has resulted in a more full investigation and a clearer understanding of the truth involved.

But while some thus preach, or contribute to the publication of Christ, from unrighteous and envious motives, there are others who are emboldened by the violent opposition to contend the more earnestly for the faith, and from good will, which is given to and wrought in them by him who worketh in them both to will and to do of his own good pleasure.

Others again are alluded to in our text who in pretence, not sincerely, were thus engaged, and although their deceptive and hypocritical motives were reprehensible, still they could do nothing against the truth or its promulgation; and although supposing or intending to add affliction to Paul's bonds, and to worry him, even in this they missed their aim, for in the final result God's purpose was accomplished, Christ was preached, and Paul rejoiced; yea, and would rejoice, not that they were envious, malicious and hypocritical, but that their opposition, under the overruling hand of God, turned out unto the furtherance of the gospel. Whether these insincere men rally pretended to preach Christ, in the common acceptation of the words, or really preached him by being the occasion of emboldening the brethren who were truly ministers of Christ, we are not told, nor is it necessary for us to know; but their wrath was overruled to the praise of God, and the remainder of their wrath was restrained. But notwithstanding every way, Paul rejoiced that Christ was preached. And he also knew that this should turn to his salvation. We understand Paul to mean by this last expression, the assurance which he felt that the preaching of Christ, by the prayers of the saints at Philippi, and the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ, should ultimately result, ass it really did, in his deliverance from prison, or at least in his being allowed liberty to preach in his own hired house two years, "preaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence; no man forbidding him." This was according to his earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing he should be ashamed; but with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ should be magnified in his body, whether by life or by death.

It seemed to have been with Paul a matter of secondary importance in what manner he should be disposed of, if Christ were magnified; whether it should be by restoration of his life and liberty, or his death even by martyrdom, it would compass his desire and hope if Christ were honored by either his life or his death. As he said to the Elders of the church of Ephesus, “But none of these things move me, neither county I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God.” – Acts xx. 24.

PERSONAL REMINISCENCE.

"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." - PAUL.

WE are acquainted with an individual whose history we will give in the following words:

He was, like all the race of which he is a member, conceived in sin, and shapen in iniquity. He was born in the eastern part of the State of Connecticut. He was a religionist from his birth, yet an enemy to God, and a stranger to grace during the first seven years of his natural life; for he was alive before the commandment came. He had at this period been taught to say his prayers, but had never been taught to pray; he had made some progress in the Westminster Catechism, and in short, as touching the religion of the Pharisees, he excelled many of his equals. It would have terrified him exceedingly to have gone to sleep at night without counterbalancing all the sins of the day by a repetition of his forms of worship; but on all occasions when he had "paid his vows, he had peace offerings at home." Up to about this period of life he was led to suppose that as touching the righteousness of the law he was blameless. We cannot describe to our readers the mortification and disappointment of this young lad, when being suddenly arrested by an arrow from the quiver of the Lord, he was summoned to stand at the dreadful bar of divine justice, and give the reason, if any he had, why the tremendous sentence of the law of God should not be executed upon his guilty soul. Great was his consternation when he cast his eager glance around in search of those fancied treasures of personal holiness which he had believed himself to be in possession of. Alas! his stronghold failed him in this very critical moment, he felt that he was ruined. But like Edom he said, “I am impoverished, but I will return and build again my waste places.” Great were his efforts, his labors, toils and pains to mend again that holy law which he had broken. He would have prayed, but he could no longer view the great, the dreadful God as a being that might be trifled with, or pacified by what he could do. He struggled, but the harder he struggled the deeper he seemed to be involved in a horrible pit, and in miry clay. These exercises continued for many days and weeks. Sometimes he meditated a retreat from this awfully wretched state, but whither could he flee? If on the wings of the morning he should fly to the uttermost sea, God was there, everywhere present, beholding the evil and the good; there could be no retreating from God, before whose flaming eyes all things are naked and open.

At length the day seemed to arrive when the dreadful sentence of the inexorable law of God must be put in execution. Now blackness and darkness and tempests gathered round his frighted soul. Hell yawned before him; justice stood with uplifted arm, and the flaming sword of vengeance was drawn from its scabbard, and brandished over his guilty head. The books were brought. The arch accuser was also there, and what was to him more dreadful still than all, the piercing eye of God brought the black crimes of years to light, and what had been transacted in midnight darkness. was now exposed upon the housetop. Chilled thus with horror, and pressed down to death with intense despair, remorse, guilt and keen anguish throbbing in his breast: tell us, dear reader, did he need an anxious bench, or knives, or lancets, to secure his conviction? Or would it have comforted him to have been informed by some Universalist that there was no hell, when the very pains of hell had got hold of him? As well might he be told, when writhing on a bed of embers, that there was no heat in fire. The spell of such delusion was now broken. The Spirit had moved upon the face of the great deep of his inmost soul, and although all had been without form and void, yet God had said, Let there be light; and light broke in upon him; and in this light, that heart which he had thought was a temple meet for the Holy Ghost to dwell in, was now manifestly the habitation of dragons, and the hold of every unclean and hateful bird. It was thus, when in or about his seventh year, he went to a distant barn, under an impression like that expressed by the poet:

"I can but perish if I go,
I am resolved to try;
For if I stay away, I know
I must forever die."

He fell upon his bended knees, but he could not pray; a rustling leaf, a turning straw, frightened his guilty soul, and chained his speechless tongue; awful apprehensions and fearful forebodings pursued him back to his chamber, when despairing of mercy he threw himself upon a bed to die and meet his fiery doom. Worn out with labor and want of rest, nature sank beneath the load, and he fell into a sleep. Unconscious of what passed while sleeping, he awoke himself singing these words:

"How glorious is our heavenly King,
Who reigns above the sky;
How shall a child presume to sing
His dreadful majesty?"

He seemed indeed in a new world, his load of guilt and sin were gone, the love of God shed abroad in his heart.

"His tongue broke out in unknown strains,
And sang surprising grace."

At the age of eleven years and four weeks, on the second Sunday in December, 1811, he was permitted to be buried with his precious Lord in baptism, in the river Thames, in the city of Norwich, Connecticut, by Eld. John Sterry, who has since fallen asleep.

After remaining eight years a member of the Baptist church in Norwich, he removed his relation to the church in the city of New York, then under the pastoral care of that champion for the truth, Eld. Jonathan Van Velsen, who a1so has fallen asleep. While a member of the Ebenezer Church in New York, the subject of our narrative, when in his twentieth year, was licensed to preach the gospel. The peculiar circumstances of his call to the work of the ministry our present limits will not admit. Let it suffice to say, that being experimentally, he could not help being doctrinally a Predestinarian. For more than fourteen years he has been lisping the name of Jesus with such abilities as the Lord has been pleased to bestow, without any of the polish of Gamaliel’s school; and although it has been his privilege to suffer some persecution, yet he has not resisted unto blood, striving against sin. He finds by every day’s experience that he is a sinner yet, his nature is still as evil as ever it was. “To will is present with him, but how to perform that which is good, he finds not.” He is still the chief of sinners, and if a saint, the least of all.

PHILIPPIANS I. 15-19

DEAR ELDER BEEBE: – When you have opportunity, please give your views through the SIGNS on Philippians i. 15-19. I ask for information. There is something in this declaration that I cannot understand. Your compliance with this request will greatly oblige a poor, ignorant worm, who is the least of all saints, of one at all.

REPLY: – We have not so clear an understanding of the apostle's meaning in regard to those of whom he speaks in this passage as we could wish, and greatly fear that what we may write will fail to satisfy the inquiring mind of our highly esteemed brother; but such thoughts as we have on the subject we do not feel at liberty to withhold.

The apostle in this chapter speaks of being in bonds, and being opposed by envious and malicious opposers, who were ready to add affliction to his bonds. At the time of writing, Paul was a prisoner at Rome. But in his exile from the land of his nativity, and from many of his kindred in Christ, he had the consoling assurance that the cruel persecution he suffered from the vagabond Jews, who had bound themselves under a curse that they would silence his preaching Christ – that they would neither eat nor drink until they had killed him, and all other enemies who had occasioned his arrest, God had overruled it all, in a manner that it had fallen out rather into the furtherance of the gospel. Instead of hindering or restricting its promulgation, it had been, by the overruling power and providence of God, the occasion of spreading it even in the very capital of the Roman Empire. Not only were their wicked intentions thwarted by the spread of the gospel ministry into the city of Rome, but it had stimulated many of the brethren, who, waxing confident by Paul's bonds, became much more bold and preserving to speak the word without fear. This has generally been the result of persecution which has been raised against the preaching of the gospel. In the early persecutions the saints were scattered into distant places; and we are told that they were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word. – Acts viii. 4. Before his conversion, Saul had himself unintentionally contributed to the dissemination of the preaching of the word, which he labored so zealously to suppress.

Some indeed preach or publish Christ even of envy and strife; or by their violent efforts to suppress its proclamation, they occasioned its more extended spread. We are not without instances at the present time of those who have by their envy and strife against some portions at least of the preached word, for instance, the eternity of the vital union of the head and body of the church, the distinct nature of that which is born of incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth foever, from that which is born of the flesh, and of corruptible seed, that is mortal, and must die; but the opposition made, whether from envy, strife, or from a lack of a clearer understanding of the truth, has resulted in a more full investigation and a clearer understanding of the truth involved.

But while some thus preach, or contribute to the publication of Christ, from unrighteous and envious motives, there are others who are emboldened by the violent opposition to contend the more earnestly for the faith, and from good will, which is given to and wrought in them by him who worketh in them both to will and to do of his own good pleasure.

Others again are alluded to in our text who in pretence, not sincerely, were thus engaged, and although their deceptive

and hypocritical motives were reprehensible, still they could do nothing against the truth or its promulgation; and although supposing or intending to add affliction to Paul's bonds, and to worry him, even in this they missed their aim, for in the final result God's purpose was accomplished, Christ was preached, and Paul rejoiced; yea, and would rejoice, not that they were envious, malicious and hypocritical, but that their opposition, under the overruling hand of God, turned out unto the furtherance of the gospel. Whether these insincere men rally pretended to preach Christ, in the common acceptation of the words, or really preached him by being the occasion of emboldening the brethren who were truly ministers of Christ, we are not told, nor is it necessary for us to know; but their wrath was overruled to the praise of God, and the remainder of their wrath was restrained. But notwithstanding every way, Paul rejoiced that Christ was preached. And he also knew that this should turn to his salvation. We understand Paul to mean by this last expression, the assurance which he felt that the preaching of Christ, by the prayers of the saints at Philippi, and the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ, should ultimately result, ass it really did, in his deliverance from prison, or at least in his being allowed liberty to preach in his own hired house two years, "preaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence; no man forbidding him." This was according to his earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing he should be ashamed; but with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ should be magnified in his body, whether by life or by death.

It seemed to have been with Paul a matter of secondary importance in what manner he should be disposed of, if Christ were magnified; whether it should be by restoration of his life and liberty, or his death even by martyrdom, it would compass his desire and hope if Christ were honored by either his life or his death. As he said to the Elders of the church of Ephesus, “But none of these things move me, neither county I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God.” – Acts xx. 24.

PHILIPPIANS I. 27.

"ONLY let your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ." - Phil. I. 27

THIS exhortation to the Philippian church, is equally applicable to the children of the kingdom of Jesus Christ to the end of time. With a singleness of heart and purpose, it becomes all the followers of our Lord Jesus Christ to walk worthy the vocation wherewith they are called of God. We know that it has frequently been slandersously reported of the saints of God that they say, "Let us sin, that grace may abound;" and is it becoming those who bear the name of Jesus to give the least currency to this calumny, by the careless indifference in regard to our daily deportment? God has called us unto holiness, and if we have passed from death unto life, we cannot live comfortably in the indulgence of sin. Perhaps no greater reproach can be inflicted on the cause of truth, than for men of corrupt minds and licentious habits to embrace the profession of it. Their unrighteous course is frequently brought forward by the enemy, to the deep mortification of the children of God, and urged as the legitimate consequence of adhering to the doctrine which we profess. The church of God is bound to maintain a strict discipline over her members, and every individual member is bound to watch over his deportment, and not suffer sin to rest on any brother unreproved. Every soul that has been taught of God, knows that the true tendency of the doctrine which we profess is to swell the heart with love and gratitude to God as the Author of our salvation. To contemplate the eternal, discriminating and invincible love of God towards us, without feeling our souls drawn out in fervent desire to glorify, love, bless, adore and praise that Savior who hath loved us and given himself for us, would be a strange thing indeed. It does not require that we should live under the false impression that our final acceptance with God depends on our works, in order to impel us to action.

"Not by the terrors of a slave
Do we perform his will;
But with the noblest powers we have,
His sweet commands fulfill."

Men who profess our faith have no claims on our fellowship while their faith is dead; and that faith which does not produce a conformity to the laws of Jesus, is dead, being alone.

While we as a people reject works as a ground of acceptance with God, we are bound also to reject that description of faith, in whatever form it may be presented, which does not dictate to us a correspondence between our profession and our conversation or practice.

PHLEGON

PHLEGON, alias Eld. J. Mathias, has written and published in the American Baptist an article in which he objects to the following language, which was used in an article copied by the American Baptist from the Boston Recorder, signed "H. E. W.,"viz:

"GOD FURNISHED THE CHURCH WITH AMPLE MEANS TO BRING THIS WORLD INTO SUBJECT TO CHRIST. God never requires of the church anything which he does not give her the means to accomplish. The subjection of which I speak is purely of a moral nature, and the power by which it is to be done is purely a moral power. The work is great – the redemption of HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS OF IMMORTAL SOULS from the grossest ignorance and pollution to wisdom and purity; the REGENERATION and SALVATION of a lost WORLD. Yet the church has power to do it, and that too in a short time!"

To the above extravagant language Phlegon enters his solemn protest, and closes his communication, (the insertion of which in full is prevented for want of room,) in the following words: "And now, Mr. Editor, (C. C. P. Crosby,) a word to you in the close. While such departures from old-fashioned Baptist principles are countenanced and sent forth by you, how can it be expected that those who love the truth can relish, fellowship or lend their aid in support of such preposterous errors?"

Mr. Crosby says: "We readily admit the article from an aged and reverened minister but feel impelled, however, to append a few remarks;" among which we notice the following:

"By the way, as Phlegon informs us in a letter accompanying his communication, that he, though "an Old School Baptist, is not one of the Beebe Signs of the Times-men, but has entered the lists with them," we take the liberty of suggesting that he may find this argument turned against him, in defending missions, &c., as they allege as their chief, and in their opinion, sufficient objection to these, that they are not mentioned in the bible."

Now we wish to enquire of the venerable Phlegon, alias Eld. J. Mathias, of Pennsylvania., what definite idea he intended to convey to Mr. Crosby in this note, which accompanied his communication? To us it is somewhat ambiguous; and since Mr. Crosby has betrayed his trust in publishing that which was confidential, and our name and publication is implicated by his treachery, we consider ourself entitled to an explanation at least; and we are confident that if Elder Mathias is the same man that he appeared to be a few years ago, he will not hesitate to advise us on this point, through the columns of the Am. Baptist, if he is fearful of becoming identified with Beebe and the "Signs of the Times."

To be more explicit in the statement of our question, we ask, What is meant by a "Beebe Signs of the Times-man?" Can it be possible that Eld. M. would throw out the insinuation that there is an organized body of men under the command, control, or bearing the name of Beebe, and connected with the "Signs of the Times?" If so, we need not say the insinuation is gratuitous and untrue. Or does he wish to disclaim all fellowship for, and union with the doctrine published in the "Signs of the Times?" If so, his favorite editor, Crosby, is a swift witness against him; for it will be seen that Mr. Crosby has in the above extract consigned him to us, as a stickler for bible authority in support of the doctrine and practice of the Baptists, accusing him at the same time of inconsistency, in being an advocate for bible authority in all things, and yet a defender of missions.

We can hardly bring ourself to believe that Eld. M. does not believe the doctrine advocated in the “Signs of the Times;” for we have heard him defend it strenuously, both before this paper was even published, and in his strictures on the communication of H. E. W., which when compared with the general tenor of the “Signs of the Times,” will exhibit no great discrepancy.

But again we will enquire, Did Phlegon intend to cast a stigma on those brethren throughout the United States who have sustained the publication of the “Signs of the Times,” by their subscription and by their communications, as being led away into error by its editor? We confess that to us his remarks plainly imply as much; for in telling Mr. C. confidentially that he was not a Beebe Signs of the Times-man, implies that others are; and if so, who are they? Certainly not those who are opposed to and pursecutors of the “Signs of the Times,” and we can infer no less than that the patrons of this paper are intended.

But if this was the design, what must we think of Phlegon, who has been personally acquainted with many of the writers for this paper, whose locks are white in the service ot their Lord and Master, and to his certain knowledge have contended for the doctrine and practice, to the interest of which this paper is devoted, before Beebe was born or this paper ever was thought of. Or could it have been the design of Phlegon to purchase the smiles of the editor of the national paper by contributing his mite of scurrility on us? Did he suppose that we had not yet suffered a sufficient quantum of abuse from Mr. Crosby, and the fraternity of his popular editorial brotherhood?

Eld. Mathias will greatly relieve our mind on this subject if he will at his earliest leisure answer these inquiries – and if it should be impracticable to communicate them through the

Am. Bap., by some means forward them to us, and he may rest assured they shall have an early Insertion in our persecuted paper.

Mr. Crosby, in retorting on Phlegon, is right in saying that we consider that the utter want of bible authority in support of the modern system of missions is a sufficient reason why they should be rejected by the children of the kingdom of God, who cannot go beyond the word of the Lord to do less or more. But he is wrong in saying that we allege this as our chief objection to the mission system; we have one still heavier to which we choose to give the precedency, viz: That those systems as contended for by himself and others are expressly forbidden by the law of Christ, and are a reflection on the wisdom, power and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, as we have formerly shown, and if spared shall repeat from time to time, as we may have opportunity.

PLEA FOR NEW INVENTIONS.

THE EVIDENCES USED IN SUPPORT OF THE NEW RELIGIOUS INVENTIONS OF THE DAY, BRIEFLY CONSIDERED.

By new religious inventions, we have special allusion to those modern innovations upon the faith and practice of the Baptist Church, by those who profess to be missionists, benevolent, &c., in distinction from the old-fashioned order of Baptists. These consist, in part, of Missionary, Bible, Tract, Education, (Theological) and other kindred Societies; the doctrine of indefinite atonement, the obligation and ability of sinners to repent, believe, and comply with what they denominate the requisitions of the gospel; together with the modern practice of protracted meetings, anxious benches, magic lanterns, national and state conventions, &c., &c. In testimony that these are approved of God, we are frequently told of their astonishing success, the multitudes converted to their views; and in further confirmation that they enjoy the smiles of heaven, we are referred to the zeal, activity, and liberality of their converts. But all this testimony is urged in the absence of any direct authority found in the scriptures of truth to sustain them. This fact has been frequently admitted by the advocates of these new things; the Convention of Western Baptists, some years since, reported that we might search the bible in vain, for direct authority; such authority was not there; and they have also assured us, that the bible was never designed to embrace a precept for every thing which was obligatory on christians. And although some have pretended to assert the abundance of scriptural authority with which they say the bible abounds, yet they have invariably failed to produce any; and the more candid among them frankly acknowledge, with their western brethren, that they find none. They are necessarily driven, therefore, to hinge all their arguments on the ground of what they consider indications of divine approbation. The most prominent indication which they bring forward, is that of the great increase of their number, and the apparent success which has attended their efforts. This argument standing first, and being, for aught we know, as plausible as any they have ever produced, claims our first consideration.

We readily admit that prior to the introduction of these things among them, the Baptists were by no means what they now are. A retrospect of the Baptist Church for eighteen hundred years, will present them as a poor and afflicted people, trusting in the name of the Lord; persecuted, despised, illiterate, embracing the poorest and most ignoble of the earth; her branches are few and far between; her ministers, from necessity, driving the plough, smiting the anvil, making tents, or in some similar employment, to minister to the necessities of themselves, and such as were with them; not because the churches were unwilling to relieve them from the distracting cares of this life, but because they were generally unable. The high arch of the heavens was, in many instances, the roof of their meeting-houses, the rugged ledges of Piedmont and elsewhere, were the cushions of their pews, the priestly robes of their ministers were composed of the cheapest materials, their mode of conveyance was on foot, their incentives to speed were persecution behind, and the hope of enjoying the sweet privilege of feeding and comforting the dear people of God before them; their salaries were often paid off at the whipping-post, but sometimes at the stake. They were not then thought suitable society for the affluent, the polite, the learned, or the noble. There was then very little among them to invite hypocrites to a connection with them. If we confine our observations within the boundaries of our own country, and only to the last century, while other denominations of professed christians were supported by legal patronage, the poor Baptists were compelled to pay tribute to them. Read the history of a Roger Williams, a Moss, a Warren, and a thousand more, of whom the world was not worthy, who have scaled the loftiest mountains, penetrated the wildest forests, stemmed the most appalling discouragements, have traveled thousands and thousands of miles bare-footed, and destitute of comfortable apparel or food to satisfy the cravings of nature, and have baptized among the poor of such as God by his grace had brought to a knowledge of the truth, the constituent members of all our early churches. In those times, the Baptists had no organs in their meeting-houses, no fiddles to worship with, no velvet cushions in their pulpits or pews.

None will presume to say the Baptists are now what once they were. In point of respectability, how have they improved! In the exulting language of Andrew Fuller, may it not be said, that prior to the introduction of his new system, the Baptists were "a mere dung-hill in society!" But as fine feathers make fine birds, the Baptists have changed their plumage, and now appear among the peacocks of the age. Now the Baptists have their Doctors of Divinity, their Colleges, their National and State Conventions; their churches occupy stately mansions with sounding bells and towering domes. Their energy (a name unknown among the saints of God before) equipped in all the trappings of fashion and extravagance, dash on in their carriages, and make a show not to be eclipsed by the gay sons of Lucifer. No longer are they willing to wait for the Lord to build them up, to convert sinners, or to give them ministers to go in and out among them. They have acquired the art of getting up revivals, of preparing men for the ministry, of making converts to their faith and accessions to their number. The Baptists - a name despised among men, because it once designated a - sect which were every where spoken against, are now courted by those very daughters of old Rome which used to whip, imprison, and sometimes even put to death the Baptists of former ages.

But we set out to consider the weight of argument brought forward by the New School Baptists. It has been more than once asserted through their prints, that the Old School or Anti-mission Baptists are losing ground, dwindling away, and will in another generation become extinct, or, as Waller says, "be annihilated;" while the Missionary Baptists are gaining, that the increase of some one or two of their associations in one year, will out number all that are baptized by all the Old School in the same time. And why do they make this boast? Surely, to prove that God has manifested his approbation of their new inventions, and his displeasure in the Old Anti-missionary Baptists.

But let us soberly consider, in the light of divine revelation and in the fear of God, to what extent this argument may avail them. If it holds good in reference to New School Baptists, will it not prove quite as much for the Methodists, who have only now reached the first hundred years of their existence; if they in one brief century have accumulated almost as great a number of members as the Baptists have in almost eighteen, would not the argument prove more for them than for the New School Baptists? What is to hinder the Mormons from urging the same testimony? their rapid increase in number during the few years of their existence, has perhaps outstripped all other orders, Read the following scrap, from the New School Baptist organ at Philadelphia:

"THE MORMONS. - This fanatic sect have established regular meetings in our city. We have heard of late, of several unstable professors from our churches, who are being deluded by their ruinous errors, which in this enlightened age must astonish every reflecting mind. It is scarcely to be believed that they have crowded audiences every time they hold forth; many, we dare to say, go for the love of novelty; but the greater number are led there through ignorance, and become their followers. This singular people profess to have the power of working miracles - and declare that they have received a new revelation from God. Joe Smith, a raving, ignorant fanatic, is their leader; and he it is who pretends to have received the message from on high. It would be well if our churches would look up the straying sheep of their folds, lest they wander into forbidden paths." - Philadelphia Baptist Register.

The Mormons of Philadelphia, we are told, are making and baptizing nearly as many disciples as are the Baptists; and many of the front bench converts from the Baptists, have recanted and gone over to the Mormons. Mark the lamentations of the former, expressed in the above extract. If indeed this argument weighs any thing, in point of demonstrating the divine approbation, certainly that sect, whether Jews, Pagans, Christians or Mormons, which can produce the greatest number, gains the point. We, the Old School Baptists, cannot, therefore, yield, on this argument, to the New School, who have assumed our name; for, if their argument proves any thing, it proves too much for their purpose.

Again. The New School often bring forward their zeal in the missionary cause, as an evidence of their piety: but will not the same argument hold equally good in reference to the Jews, the Mahometans, the Catholics, and the Mormons? The Jews compassed sea and land to make proselytes; the Mahometans sent their missionaries into far countries, with great success; the Catholics also had their Jesuits in all parts of the world; and now we learn from the New School papers, that the Mormons have their domestic missionaries in all the principal cities of our country; and that they have recently sent twelve of their apostles to England. Should not the New School Baptists give the right hand of fellowship to their Mormon Missionary brethren? If zeal in the mission cause is of God, this witness of divine approbation speaks more for the Mormons than for the Baptists; for the former have greater impediments to encounter, and therefore display a much warmer zeal, and a greater degree of industry, than the former.

The success which has attended the distribution of Tracts, and Sunday Schools, &c., is also a main pillar in sustaining the New School Baptists. In our last number, we copied an article from the S. S. Journal, showing that the indefatigable Owen, and his brotherhood of Fanny Wright men, were zealously engaged in the same business. "In some places," says the article alluded to, "Sunday and Infant Schools have been established, for the inculcating of infidel principles. A Tract Society has been formed, and six Tracts issued;" and they are very active in the distribution of these, among those whom they deem heretics. "There is a regular organized Central Board," says the Journal, "with a President, Vice President and Secretary, and a great number of salaried emmisaries, whose whole time is devoted to the advancement of Socialism." Shocking! What right have Infidels to have Sunday, or Infant Schools, or Presidents, or, above all, to pay salaries? But we suppose they have the presumption to think, "Quod dem onstrat vobis, demonstrat nobis." And as the New School Baptists have acknowledged that the plan of disseminating doctrine by the use of Tracts, originated with the Infidels in France, and as Mr. Owen's party make no more pretention to scriptural authority for their Sunday and Infant Schools, and flattering titles for men, than the New School Baptists do, we presume they think they have about as much right to practice these anti-christian inventions, as though they acted under the cover of a christian profession. Another complaint urged against Mr. Owen's party is, that they are patronized by the nobles of Europe, and by the liberality of the affluent - They are filling England with their magnificent temples, &c. But after all, as we inquired in our last what is there in all their improvements, that would not pass off as pure divinity, if done under the name of religion? Is it said that Owen rejects the bible as a rule? This is granted; and so do the New School Baptists. Do Owen and his patrons promulgate damnable heresies and doctrines of dew us? So do the New School Baptists; and as we have before said, so we again say, and believe we can abundantly prove, that the very elements of which Deism and Socialism are composed, may be found among the New School Baptists.

Another argument sometimes used to prove the modern doctrines and practices of New Schoolism to be correct, is the liberality of those converted to it; witness, for instance, the late eulogiums lavished on the Baltimore and Albany converts, who gave one thousand dollars each, for missionary purposes. This was cried up through the papers, as the genuine fruits of repentance; and the editor of the N. Y. Baptist Register, is of the opinion that the system he advocates, if fully carried out, would produce so many such instances, that they would be passed by as common affairs. Now we cannot discover that it needs supernatural light to see that Owen's system produces the very same kinds of fruits, and in greater abundance, than that of Mr. Knapp. And finally, we challenge the New School Baptists to produce one solitary argument in support of their new order, that we cannot show, proves as much for Mormons and Infidels, as it can for them.

They are of late greatly occupied in controversy with their dear Pedo-Baptist brethren, on the subject of Baptism; and we have more than once felt disposed to say to them, "Sirs, ye are brethren; why strive ye one with the other?" But the Baptists say their anti-christian brethren have no scripture for sprinkling. True, they have not; nor have they any for christian baptism; that sacred ordinance belongs exclusively to the family of God. But let us ask, Have not the Pedo-Baptists the same authority for rantism, that the Baptists have for New Schoolism? The former plead that they have a right to rantize, and save souls in that way, because it is not forbidden; and the latter admit there is no direct authority for their New School craft; but plead their right to it, upon the same ground as do the others for sprinkling.

POLITICS AND RELIGION.

WHILE admonished by our highly esteemed brother Hughes in his letter in this paper, and also by other brethren, whose kindness we appreciate, we are led to inquire how far it is proper that a paper, professing, as this does, to chronicle the signs of the times, should be restricted? If we are to reject all communications which in any way, directly or indirectly allude to or involve the consideration of political subjects, we shall not be at liberty to protest against Mystery, Babylon, for she has committed abominations with the kings of the earth, and the kings of the earth hold a political standing in the organization of human governments. We are certain that our brethren would not wish us thus to be restricted. While on the one hand it would be improper to enter the area of party political strife, and use our humble sheet to urge the claims of one set of men and measures, and to the disparagement of others, which have only a political bearing, we are led to believe that it would also be wrong to withhold our protest against the prevailing abominations of anti-christ, because her imperial ladyship claims to sit a queen, and hold a power over the kings and governments of the world. In short, it has been our conviction that the course pursued by the apostles and primitive saints, should be regarded as a pattern for us in these last days. They fought against principalities and powers, and against the rulers of the darkness of this world; and while they became subject to the powers that were, and yielded obedience to those in authority as unto God, they withheld that obedience when their magistrates required them to disobey the laws of the kingdom of Christ. They not only appealed unto their rulers, saying, “Whether it be right for us to obey God or men, judge ye;” but they enjoined upon the christian church to “Let no man judge you in meats, or in drinks, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath,” or in respect to the things of religion in general. To the civil department, we conceive, belongs the right to enact laws, and to enforce them for the civil government of the people; but the right to regulate the religious course of men, belongs only to God. Neither the church or the clergy should interfere with, or dictate to the powers which are properly vested in the legislatures of this world; nor should the legislatures of this world assume the right to regulate the affairs of Christ's spiritual kingdom. Let the decision of our Redeemer concerning the payment of tribute money be regarded, and christians will learn their duty to God, and to human rulers. There are things which in this respect belong only to God, and with which we are not permitted to suffer even Caesar to interfere; and there are also things which God has commanded us to render to earthly potentates or powers, to disobey which would be to resist an ordinance of God. With the foregoing remarks premised, we appeal to our brethren in general; but especially to those who have flit alarmed at our course. Should we, or should we not protest against the efforts that are now being made throughout our country, to induce our legislatures to legislate upon the laws of God, to define and enforce a Sabbath, to compel the reading and expounding of the scriptures, the singing of psalms and prayers, &c., in our public schools, on forfeiture of our equitable share of the money for which we have been taxed? Is it right or wrong for us to apprize our brethren of the rapid advance of the man of sin, in drawing around us the fetters of priestcraft, because, forsooth, they are effecting this through their political schemes of intrigue? But few of our Our School brethren have the same opportunity to know the movements of the popular religious orders at this time that we have had; exchanging, as we do, with many of their organs of communication. They have proposed the organization of what they call "A Christian party in politics;" they have held several state and national conventions, for the expressed and openly avowed object of creating public sentiment in favor of their ambitious designs; they have their presses and societies engaged in facilitating their measures; they are now publishing a paper which they denominate The Christian Politician, and they have openly avowed their design to monopolize the tract and book making business, and force out of all our schools all such books as do not suit them, by making their books so cheap as to bring them into universal use. And they have boasted that "in ten years - certainly in twenty" - they are, through a monopoly of the schools, to control the government as they please. In harmony with this threat, they have applied to our legislatures and have obtained all the power they can at present desire. And in this state, (New York,) although the constitution expressly provides that no minister of the gospel or priest of any denomination, shall ever hold any office or place, either civil or military in its bounds, our legislature has sanctioned the appointment of two "Reverend Doctors of Divinity," (so called,) to govern the Normal Schools; in connection with two others and tile State Superintendent; and that Normal School contemplates preparing teachers to take the charge of more than seven hundred thousand children of this state! Thus virtually the whole rising generation is chained down by legislative enactment under the control of clergymen of the popular order, and into their clerical hands is placed by constitutional legislation, more power than is held by any other officers of our government. Such are only some of the startling facts of the case. And shall we seal our lips in silence and restrain our pen and press? Or shall we not rather speak out while we are at liberty to speak, and improve every moment that remains, before that liberty of speech and of the press is gone irretrievably and forever?

Our brethren who have supposed that this subject as it is agitated, is of a political party bearing, have been in error. Those among us of every political party, have taken ground together upon this subject; without yielding their political party views on any of the leading points which divide them into parties in what properly belongs to politics; those who have investigated the subject stand shoulder to shoulder in Opposing the prevalence of this anti-christian monster. To us it appears to be a duty imperiously devolving on us to leave our testimony against the hidden things of dishonesty; and if in this we are judged to be in error, we think we shall not be considered obstinate. We would gladly consult with our brethren upon the subject, and profit by their superior judgment. But we earnestly desire such of our brethren as have entertained fears as to the propriety of our course in this matter, to investigate the subject and see if there is not a cause for alarm. It is certainly not an enviable position which we occupy, bearing the frowns of the clergy and their dupes, and if our exposure to reproach and persecution in this matter is uncalled for, only make it so appear, and we will cease to fight the “poor bears.”

We would again remark, that the course we have pursued has not been dictated by any political party feeling, but rather from a desire as a watchman upon the walls of Zion, to inform our brethren of the approaching danger.

A QUESTION OF ORDER.

December 23, 1879.

ELDER G. BEEBE – DEAR BROTHER: – It is with fear and much trembling that I approach you on a point of order.

Suppose that two brethren, A and B, have a disagreement; A is the offended brother, and B waits, as he supposes, a sufficient length of time for A to come and see him; but A does not come, and B then goes to see A, and tells A that he (B) is in the affirmative, and intends dealing with him, and takes as he believes, the rule laid down in Matt. xviii., for his course. In the absence of half the members, the case was brought before the church, and by a vote of three, including B and one of the witnesses, (the other three members present not voting at all) A was excluded. Was A legally excluded?

Again: Suppose B is in the habit of exercising a gift, should he go on and exercise his gift at home and abroad, or should he leave his gift at the altar until reconciliation is made?

Again: Suppose that some of the dissatisfied members withdraw from the church, would it be in order for some other church to receive them, there being no charge preferred against them?

Please answer through the SIGNS, and oblige one who greatly desires the peace and welfare of Zion.

REPLY. – We would greatly prefer that those who desire our views would give us their names, as we do not like to labor in the dark.

According to the statement of the case as supposed in the foregoing, we give as our judgment that the whole proceeding is wrong and disorderly. A lamentable lack of humility, meekness and brotherly love is clearly manifested by all the parties involved. The member submitting the charge against the accused brother, should allow the church to decide the matter without his vote, and the members are inexcusable in refusing to vote; also in leaving the church to avoid the trouble resulting from their own neglect. We see nothing orderly in the whole proceeding as stated in the query. We would advise that the whole matter should be reconsidered and that the spirit and counsel of the Lord should be earnestly and solemnly invoked by all the parties involved, and a far greater degree of forbearance and gospel charity manifested. Hasty and harsh dealings may for a time seem to triumph; but the eye of him who searches the heart is upon us; and “It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of a living God.”

POISON OF DRAGONS AND VENOM OF ASPS.

“Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps.” - Deut. xxxii. 33.

WHEN Moses, the servant and prophet of the Lord, was about to die, in taking leave of the children of Israel, he summoned both the heavens and the earth to hear the words of his mouth; while in a retrospective glance at their history, he recapitulated the wonderful work of God towards them; and knowing as he did most assuredly, that after his death, Israel would corrupt themselves with the abominations of the nations among whom they were destined to dwell, (see chapter xxxi. 29,) he spake in prophetic language of future events concerning them; and while he portrayed the rebellion, idolatry, and wicked departures of that stiff-necked people, from the law of their God, and of God’s righteous judgments, which should overtake them in their wickedness; he also sets forth in the spirit of this song, the rise and progress of the visible church of our Lord Jesus Christ, of which Jeshurun was a type.

Our readers are invited to read this chapter, and then follow us in a few remarks which we design to make on the application of the subject to present times and things; for whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, for our admonition, reproof, and instruction in righteousness, &c.

It was judged expedient that Israel should, and they were commanded (verse 7th) to “Remember the days of old,” &c. The ample display of divine sovereignty on the part of the Most High exemplified in the division of the nations, and in the separation of the sons of Adam, and in the establishing of the immovable bounds of his people, together with the reason assigned for this divine display, viz: “For the Lord’s portion is his people: and Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.” How vitally important it is that the spiritual Israel should forever keep in mind their calling, and their election of God, the sovereign display of God’s electing love, and distinguishing grace to the inward, because this people he has formed for himself, and they shall show forth his praise.

The Lord found Israel in a desert land, and in a waste howling wilderness. How striking is the application of this figure to the case of the spiritual Israel whom he found in the land and shadow of death, and in the wilderness where the voice of one crying was heard, and desert where the way of the Lord was prepared; that wilderness from which the spouse of Christ emerged like pillars of smoke, and came forth leaning on her beloved. “He led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye.” When our Lord Jesus Christ received his church from the wilderness of Judea, and from the barren deserts of the covenant of works he led them about; mark! they did not lead him about. He was the leader, and his disciples were the followers, and there was no strange god among them. And when he by abolishing the law of commandments, tore away the old Jewish nest from under his infant brood, after the similitude of the eagle, in verse eleventh, he taught them the inefficiency of their own unfledged wings to bear them up in the day of trial. He, like the eagle, spread abroad his gracious wings, and carried them; yea, he bore them all the days of old. Real christians, even down to the present day, often witness the work of the Lord in stirring up their nests, and teaching them the necessity of depending on his wings, to bear them upward; while all who wait on him do mount up on wings as eagles, and are made like the chariots of Aminadab. - Song vi. 12. Even thus the primitive saints were made to ride upon the high places, and to suck honey out of the rock;

“Butter of kine, milk of sheep, and fat of lambs,” &c., were the food of the people of God. But, alas, we see in the anti-type, as well as the type, that the people of God are not able in this world to bear prosperity. Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked! and as soon as he had grown thick he. Forsook God and lightly esteemed the rock of his salvation, provoked the Lord to jealousy with strange gods, sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they knew not, to new gods which came newly up, whom their fathers knew not, and forgot the rock that begat them. Can language more forcibly set forth the early history of the visible or professed gospel church? In almost the precise words of Moses, as given above, Paul made the same prediction concerning; the church that Moses had concerning the Jews. He knew that after his departure grevious wolves would come among them, not sparing the flock; and even of themselves, some should rise up speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them for he knew full well that the end of the world, and the ultimate glory of the people of God could not come, except there come a falling away first, and the man of sin be revealed whose coming was after the working of Satan, with signs and lying wonders, and all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish. Forgetful of the rock of their salvation, Israel went on to multiply their vanities, and at the time of their visitation referred to in this chapter, had become enlarged and fat, and among them were found those whose spot was not the spot of God’s children; and whose rock was not the rock of Jeshurun, the enemies themselves being judges; for they were a crooked generation, like those who ‘wished to join the Baptist church in the days of John - a generation of vipers; crooked of course. But by some means these crooked animals found their way in amongst the ancient tribes, and brought with them some sprouts of the vine of Sodom, which had been taken from the fields of Gomorrah, with grapes of gall, and clusters of bitterness, and from which their wine was extracted. And so, also, the enemy has come in upon the christian church, like a flood; and they have brought with them, of the vine of spiritual Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified, and where the dead bodies of the witnesses must o'er long lie unburied; they have brought in from the fields of Gomorrah damnable heresies and doctrines of devils. The true church of God is planted in a very fruitful hill, (Zion,) wholly of a right seed. Christ is the true vine, his Father is the husbandman, and the spiritual family are the legitimate branches of that true vine; but under the gospel profession, now we find those who, by their spot, by their rock, by their faith and practice give awful demonstration that they are not of the true vine; by their fruit we know them; their grapes are· grapes of gall, and their clusters are bitter. Many of the dear saints have, when tasting their grapes of gall, responded aloud, Amen, to the prayer of Paul, "I would that they were cut off," &c. And in this day in which we live, this state of things is developed to a far greater extent than at any former period. God has evidently broken up the nest of his people, by persecution in the European nations, in years which have gone by, and gave them two wings of a great eagle, (providence and grace) for on these he took them, and brought them into this country to a place to nourish them from the face of the dragon, for a season; but like their type they could not bear their prosperity - they forgot the Rock that begat them; and from Sodom, and the fields of Gomorrah, (Papistry and Protestantism) they have borrowed the degenerate plants of a strange vine; and strange as the vine may be, it is by no means barren; it is indeed prolific in its productions of gall and bitterness, to the saints of God. But we rejoice in the divine assurance that we shall yet be delivered from this strange plant; for every plant which God has not planted shall be rooted up.

But passing to a more direct illustration of the figure at the head of this article, will lead us to enquire more particularly after the introduction of the productions of the vine of Sodom and Gomorrah among the Baptist churches. After about half a century of civil and religious prosperity had been allowed in America, for the spiritual Jeshurun to fatten, the Baptists began to kick. And very different from that lean, meagre figure, which they presented when they first came to this country, for then they were a poor and afflicted people, who trusted in the name of the Lord, and so thin and feeble that the Protestants (Congregationalists) thought to crush them at a blow. The blow was truly struck, and the blood of the Baptists stained the shore of Massachusetts; they then appeared the least of all seeds - a little leaven, as it were. Ephraim was then small - he spake tremblingly - he trembled at the word of God, and would suffer all the wrath of men, rather than turn from the law of Christ, or yield one inch of gospel truth or order to the foe. Butter of kine was their food, for they could not fill themselves with the husks which the Congregationalists were eating; nor would any man give them of the government pap on which the churches of the law established religion were then gormandizing. But now, where shall we look for that feeble, trembling, despised, and persecuted people? The last vestige of them can only be seen among those, who by way of distinction from the corpulent body, are now denominated Old School Baptists; whilst the great body of the Baptist churches in America have become so puffed up that they challenge a comparison of numbers, and of Sodomitish productions, with the greatest religious denominations round about thorn. They have within the last thirty years become enamored with the strange gods - gods which have come newly up - (observe, these gods are of hellish production; they never come down; there is no pattern for them in the Mount) gods which their fathers, the Primitive Baptists, knew not.

There were various descriptions of the idols with ancient Israel; some were made of borrowed jewels, others of gold, lavished out of the bag, and he that was too poor to provide himself with such splendid gods, chose him a tree that would not rot. The jewels, gold, and tree, were not in themselves idols, neither did their fashion or shape constitute them such, but the use which was made of them. The abomination consisted in setting them up as gods, and ascribing salvation to them, contrary to the commands of God, and offering that praise to them which was due only to God. There are now among the Baptist churches, various descriptions of institutions set up, unto which salvation is ascribed, and a variety of forms; some are amazingly splendid, composed of gold, lavished out of the bag, like the National Baptist Societies, called Bible, Tract, Missionary, &c. And who will dare deny that those who set up these idols, and who for that purpose lavish gold, ascribe salvation to these institutions? Let any of them deny this, and we will prove our assertion from their own mouths. Some are composed of borrowed jewelry from Egypt. The jewels in which the daughters of. the old mother of harlots have flourished, lire such as learned and graceless ministers, taught in literary schools, and not taught in the school of Christ. This livery of an harlot has been borrowed from other denominations, and this Babylonish garment and golden wedge has been secreted among the stuff in our camp, until at length it has produced a number of calves, one on College Hill, in this District, one at Hamilton, N. Y., and others in various parts of our country. It is not necessary for us to say that these idols were unknown by our fathers, the Primitive Baptists; none will attempt the task of proving them scriptural.

But some of our idolatrous Baptists are so impoverished that they cannot raise the oblation (cash) requisite to entitle them to the privilege of worshiping these splendid idols - they choose them a tree. If they cannot pay one hundred dollars for a seat. in the General U. S. Convention, nor thirty dollars for a seat in the Home Mission Society, they may perhaps get a birth as teacher of some Sabbath School, or a mission to peddle tracts, or become a member of a Mite Society, or a Rag Bag Institution. These various systems of idolatry have been stealing in upon the Baptists for several years past, until the Baptists of our day can by no means come down to the dimensions of a gospel church; this would be in their imagination far, very far behind the spirit of the age; and they hesitate not to avow their desire to keep pace with the world.

The vine introduced among us by this system of idolatry, must have reference to those strange children, nominal professors of christianity, mocking Ishmaels, and graceless hypocrites, brought into the Baptist profession by the use of these inventions. We have shown that Christ and his church are the true vine, and the branches of the true Vine, consequently all the branches that do not proceed from, nor grow out of him, must be of a false vine, as there is but one true Vine; hence all those who are converted by these institutions of men, or are ferried into the Baptist profession by A. D. Gillett's "Life Boat," with all others who enter not by Christ the door, but climb up some other way, are most assuredly of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah.

From what has been said of Israel, as being typical of the christian church, we are unavoidably brought to the conclusion that those characters, whose wine is called the venom of dragons, are those illegitimates or strange children among the people of God, whose spot is not the spot of the peculiar people of God, and whose rock is not our rock, themselves being judges. Their wine, in the figure before us, must necessarily mean the production of their grapes of gall, from the vine of Sodom; and if we are correct in supposing that antichrist is the vine of Sodom, and that the vines composed of nominal professors, and carnal hypocrites among us, are of that stock, or are sprouts from that abominable vine, we must of course conclude that their wine, the intoxicating juice of their grapes of bitterness, is the product of innovations upon our, faith and practice, as the people of the living God; and comprising the entire mass of human inventions, false doctrine, and practices borrowed from spiritual Sodom. Their wine is that which they wish to substitute in the place of the pure wine of the kingdom of Christ, which Christ has given "as wine on the lees, and well refined;" for which the spouse of Christ prayed for flagons, and which goeth down sweetly, and which is Christ's blood, in the New Testament, which wins shed for many; that wine which Christ has provided, and of which he welcomes his church to drink abundantly, and which is given to him that is of a heavy heart, that he may "drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more." That system of works, doctrines, and means, employed by nominal professors of christianity, to exhilarate, bewilder, and intoxicate their Ishmaels with, and with which they wish to supercede the doctrine of God our Savior; and with which to set aside his atonement and his legislation, by teaching tor doctrines the commandments of men, and to make void the law of Christ, by their own traditions, must assuredly be intended by their wine.

It will be proper for us here to inquire, whether the doctrines and institutions of men, as introduced among the Baptists under the name of religion, and urged upon us as the choice wine of the Kingdom of Christ, does or does not, possess the qualities expressed in the metaphorical language of our text; to this end, we will attend to the following inquiries, viz:

First. - Are the doctrines and measures imposed on the churches at the present day, by the New School Baptists, to be found in the original or primitive faith and practice of the church of Christ, or are they not of foreign production, borrowed from other denominations, Sodom, Gomorrah, &c.?

Second. - Are innovations upon the faith and practice of God's people, in the scriptures compared to wine?

Third. - In what respects are the doctrine and order of the New School Baptists set forth by this figure? And Fourth. - How are we to understand that their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps?

1. - Are the doctrines of the New School Baptists of foreign production? We are free to admit that with the greater portion of the New School Baptists of our day, there are some sentiments on doctrine and practice retained, which are not borrowed, but which properly belong to the faith and. practice of the church of God; while the great mass of their distinguishing doctrines, and practices are evidently anti-scriptural, and consequently anti-christian. Among the doctrines of this class, we will name, general or universal atonement; free agency, (so called,) meaning a power lodged in the hands of unregenerate men, by which they are able, if they choose, to appease the wrath of Divine justice, and satisfy the law of God. Salvation, not by the deeds of the law, but by deeds which are neither required by law or gospel - such as joining their humanly devised institutions, by the payment of stipulated sums of filthy lucre, for which they promise them, in this life, an hundred fold, and in the world to come, life everlasting; and for which they sell them life memberships, and even everlasting life membership in what they term religious benevolent societies.

Will argument be required of us to prove that these doctrines and practices are unwarranted in the scriptures? Does it devolve on us to prove the negative? Long, long, have we challenged the new order of Baptists among us, to show us a "thus saith the Lord" for their doctrines; but how have they treated our inquiries? Hear them. Mr. Crosby, (late editor of the American Baptist and Home Mission Record,) says the best way to treat us, is to let us alone. Mr. Canfield, of the Christian Secretary, recommends for us the salutary advantages of a penitentiary! That poor trifling thing, the editor of the Religious herald, upbraids us for presuming to question the propriety of what is practiced by so large a majority of the Baptists. Mr. Wailer, of the Banner, after challenging a discussion on the subject with us, says, he will not respond to our arguments; whilst our more honest opponents of the Cross and Baptist Journal, inform us plainly, that the Bible contains no such authority, and that it was never intended to embrace all the duties incumbent on christians. We prove, thus, from their own confession, that their grapes are not from the heavenly vine, Christ; and as they are not of Christ, who declares himself to be the true Vine, they must be of a false vine, of the vine of Sodom. Neither the old mother Arminianism, nor any of her brood of human inventions, are natives of the Zion of God, but have been by the Baptists borrowed from the fields of Gomarrah; they were not found in the primitive church, but have been brought in by those whom the apostle advised the church, would bring in damnable heresies and doctrines of devils. - 2 Peter ii. 1.

2. Are innovations in doctrine and practice, comparable to wine? This figure is of very frequent recurrence in the scriptures; the fifth chapter of Isaiah is not the least forcible on this subject. After pointing out the abominations of the corrupted daughters of Zion, in the preceding chapters, as shown by the numbers being published by Brother Trott, in this chapter, portraying with astonishing exactness those greedy advocates of the new fangled proselyting systems of our day, who join house to house, and lay field to field, and who cannot rest while they conceive there is more laud, to be possessed; says, “Wo unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night till wine inflame them.” And again in verse 20th, the same characters are charged with calling evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter.” And in denouncing the fearful curses upon them, he says, verses 22 - 25, “Wo unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink, which justify the wicked for reward, and take away the righteousness of the righteous from him.”

Can our readers be at a loss to find men in this our day, who for a reward will justify the wicked, promise them in the world to come, life everlasting, for reward, and who will, like the executive of the American Bible Society, who congratulated a successful horse racer, on having swept the stakes, and gained the purse; and at the same time solicited of him, with thirty dollars of his ill-gotten booty, to constitute himself a life member of that religious institution; which was accordingly done. We say, who, while they will thus justify the wicked for thirty dollars reward, will rob, if possible, the righteous of their characters, by saying all manner of evil against them falsely, because they smite with their fist, and stamp with the foot, and show unto God’s people their transgressions, and to Israel their sins. “Therefore,” continues the prophet of the Lord, “as the fire devoureth the stubble, and the flame consumeth the chaff, so their root shall be as rottenness, and their blossom shall go up to dust; because they have cast away the law of the Lord of Hosts, and despised the word of the Holy One of Israel.” And in chapter lvi. 12, the figure of wine and strong drink is repeated by way of illustrating the doctrines and base insinuations of these blind, ignorant, sleepy (or lazy) and greedy (logs, which can never have enough. “Come ye, they say, I will fetch wine? and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant."

3. In what respects is wine a proper emblem of the false doctrines and corrupt practice of the New School professors?

Let the word of God answer. "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging." Prov. xx. 1. So, also, are the systems of which we complain; they in many respects mimic the truth, and ape some of the ordinances of the church of Christ. Those who advocate and practice them, will generally assume solemn airs and gestures, use good words and fair speeches, in order to deceive the hearts of the simple, professing extraordinary zeal for God, and love for souls; it is a mocker because it is deceitful and full of hypocrisy; and it is also raging when mixed; it requires mighty men, such as are not afraid of the thunderbolts of Jehovah, to mingle it, giants of arminianism, who are nerved (in their mock pretensions at least) with strength enough to save themselves and others, anti who think themselves able to save the heathen, and to evangelize the world; who dare to brave the word of God and, defy the armies of the Most high. These are the men who mix the strong drink, and who, for their strength and industry in mingling the doctrines of the day, are frequently dubbed D. D., or with some other mark of their Sodomitish breeding. Their strong drink is raging; when once they become able to drop into the bowl, a sufficient proportion of legislative power, their drink becomes so maddening as to cause the blood of the saints of God to flow in torrents.

Again, wine in its intoxicating qualities, is a suitable emblem of false doctrines and practices. This figure is most clearly traced by the prophet Isaiah (xxviii. and 8,) in speaking of the drunkards of Ephraim, "But they also have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way; the priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in Judgment; for all tables are full of vomit and filthiness, so that there is no place clean." If by the tables in this text we are at liberty to understand the pulpits of these drunken Ephraimites, as the place where the children have been wont to go to receive their spiritual food, how awfully true the declaration that they are defiled, that there is no clean place to be found among all that portion of the Baptists of the present day, who are represented by these intoxicated Ephraimites, but upon them is brought to pass the fearful prediction of Jeremiah xxv. 27, that they should drink and be drunken, and spew, &c. But the drunkenness of the new-lights is not only demonstrated by the abundance of wretched, filthy arminian corruption, vomited upon all their tables, and spread out as a repast for their churches, but it also discovers itself in its inebriating effects upon themselves and their adherents: hence how very common for us to witness among this class of wine-bibbers, when they have continued long at the Theological School, even until wine has inflamed them, with what a grace they will act off the drunken man, swaggering and boasting, and saying, "I am rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing;" that all the necessary means for saving themselves and all the rest of mankind, is in their possession, and if they do not boast with the Pope, of holding the keys of the kingdom of heaven, yet they hold that the keys of what they presumptiously call the Lord's treasury are with them, to draw upon, exhaust, and replenish at their pleasure.

But once more. The drunkard, when overcome with wine, is liable to rush on in that state into all manner of wickedness; and what crimes have not been literally perpetrated by men in this state of inebriation? Even so with spiritual drunkenness; when religionists have taken their toddy until.

forgetful of every principle of prudence, how ravingly will they assail the characters of their more temperate neighbors,. and at what will they stop? Surely at nothing short of the accomplishment of what one of their number once prayed foe, (as stated in a western religious periodical,) viz: “that those who were opposed to their systems might be laid aside, where their croaking would no more disturb the wheels of their missionary car,” &c.

4. How are we to understand that their wine is the poison of dragons, &c.? Dragons are a kind of serpentine monsters; the dragon mentioned in Revelations xii. 3, is represented with seven heads and ten horns, and is called the devil, and Satan, that deceiveth the whole world; and as all false doctrines are doctrines of devils, it follows that their wine is of the dragon; but it is called the poison of dragons; showing that these doctrines and practices not only emanate from him, but that they are the very poison of dragons. The dread of poisonous reptiles of the earth appears to consist in that deadly poison which they carry in their mouth, in their teeth, and under their tongues. Thus in his mouth the serpent carried the poisonous doctrine of the arminian creed into the garden of Eden in the morning of creation, and preached to our mother Eve, that by her own works she could make herself as God, &c., the word and truth of God to the contrary, notwithstanding; and the deadly character of that poison sentiment has ever since that moment been developing its malignancy among the sons of Adam. This rankling poison is still retained in all the doctrines of devils which are now, or ever have been, set afloat in the world. All who have ever witnessed the effects of the bite of a poison serpent, literally, know that the poison when communicated to the human system, is considered incurable. The person poisoned soon becomes swollen and inflamed, and in the process of its work of death, reason forsakes her empire over the mind, and the unhappy sufferer, raving in madness and pain, is left to terminate his miserable existence in the most horrible manner; but before he expires, it is said that the sufferer will assume all the colors, shapes and appearances, of the serpent by which he is bitten, which are possible for a human being to assume. Thus when the representatives of our human race received the poison from him that deceiveth the whole world, they became inflamed; the wound was unto death - that death passed upon all their unborn posterity - for all were poisoned; and so in like manner when men become corrupted by false doctrines from the old dragon, they invariably become inflated, and the poison extends to every part; the head, the heart, the hands, the eyes, the mouth, and particularly the tongue, the ear and feet, are all corrupted, and assume so much the appearance of serpents, that John the Baptist had no difficulty in detecting those who wished to join the Baptist church upon an old Abrahamic covenant platform.

But this wine or false doctrine is not only called the poison of dragons, but it is the cruel venom of asps. Those who tipple at it become cruel, unfeeling, brutish, and filled with venom, especially against those who will not consent to drink with them. In how many thousand instances have the Old School Baptists witnessed this result in cases of those who once stood shoulder to shoulder with us, striving against sin; but now, alas! how changed, how filled with venom; they seem as though they could bite and destroy. Cruel venom! how awfully has it been displayed on the thousands of our murdered brethren who have suffered martyrdom rather than drink of the deadly poison. For examples of this rankling poison in those who have gone out from us, witness their fury from the pulpit and press against all such as stand fast in the apostles’ doctrine; view the scattered bones of the dear disciples of the Lamb who have been cast out, persecuted and slandered by the New School. Witness the cased of our brethren in Oswego Co., N. Y., and at Enfield, N.

Y. Read in the preceding number our extract from the letter of Elder Blodget, and the communication of brother Salmon, who has survived all the envenomed fangs of that man, who in connection with others of the same crooked and perverse generation, were unyielding in their efforts to ruin him because he would not unite with them in their combination, as preachers, binding themselves that they would not preach for the churches in the Black River Association unless said churches would tax all their members ten dollars on every thousand dollars they possessed for their ministerial support. Mark the infected breath of Healy, Jones & Co., blown at the Baltimore Baptist Association because that association has refused to. hold fellowship with the new measures of the day. Note well the pestilential puffs of slander blown at the characters of elders who in that connection stood firm in the apostles' doctrine. Nay, look which way we will, from Georgia to Maine, and from the Atlantic to the remotest West, and we discover the traces of this poison of asps, this venom of dragons.

But perhaps it may be the inquiry of some, How is it possible that any of the children of God should be infected, or in any measure intoxicated with this deadly poison and yet live? The answer will be found in the blessed declaration of our Lord Jesus Christ, that they shall tread on serpents and scorpions without injury, and if they drink deadly poison he will still secure their lives. Were it not for their good and great Physician, they would drink death in every draught; but thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Our language in reference to the New School may sound harsh, and be thought, severe but we wish not to be unnecessarily harsh or severe with them. From our soul we pity them, and we pray God, if consistent with his holy purpose, he may deliver them from their delusions, but while they remain in their drunkenness we are bound to treat them as drunkards, and with them we are commanded to keep no company, not even to eat with them, that they may be ashamed.

A word of exhortation to the sons of Zion and we will close. Dear brethren, “Who hath wo? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? Who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They who tarry long at the wine; they who go to seek mixed wine. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright; at last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.” “Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things; yea, thou shalt be as he who lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast. Hearken unto me, therefore, O ye children, and attend to the words of my mouth, Let not thine heart decline unto her ways, go not astray in her paths. She hath cast down many wounded, yea, many strong men have been slain by her. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.” - Prov. xxiii. 29-34; vii. 24-27.

POPULAR INSTITUTIONS

BY THE EDITOR

It is very common with those who are in favor if (what are called) the Benevolent Institutions of the day, to represent us as being opposed. First, to the circulation of the Bible. Second to the publication of the Gospel. Third, to the general diffusion of Bible truth, through the press. Fourth, the education of Children, especially on the first day of the week. Fifth, that we are unwilling that the Ministers of the Gospel should be learned men. Sixth, we are sometimes represented, as being either lovers of Rum, or advocates of drunkenness – if we withold our name from their Associations which they call Temperance Societies.

Our object in this article, is not to complain of reproach, for we have (in measure) become accustomed to it. But our design is, to give a brief statement of our views on these points, for the information of those who do not know our sentiments in reference to them. And first, the Bible is in our estimation, the infallible record which God has been graciously pleased to give us of himself, and of the true state of mankind, and the only possible way of life and salvation. We cannot appreciate its value too highly. We have no objections to its circulation, so far indeed from it we are willing to furnish every person in our region with a copy – of it who stands in need, and are unable either to buy or to borrow one. Neither do we object to voluntary contributions for the purpose of supplying the poor with the Scriptures gratuitously. But what we protest against, is the organization of a great National Religious Society, unauthorised by the Lord, and uncalled for by the wants of Zion, under the ostentatious, pretention of Benevolence, picking the pockets of the ignorant and unsuspecting, and at the same time by their speculations on that best of all Books, becoming a wealthy and powerful body. We shall not be able here to give in detail our objections to the American Bible Society, as that is not our present object, but at some future period we intend to lay before our readers the reasons why we protest. And in the meantime we would refer them to the objections stated in the Address of the Old School Baptist, as answering our mind. See the first number of this Volume.

But second, we are so far from being opposed to the preaching of the Gospel, that we cannot consent to have any thing else preached in its place. We are not only engaged in preaching the Gospel ourselves, but are also ready to divide the last loaf of our bread and the last shilling of our money with any one of Christ's Ministers who may stand in need; only let us have an evidence that they are called of God to that important work, and we consider them entitled to a share of what God has made us the Stewards of.

But as for those Missionary Gentlemen, who do not own our Master as their Captain, or cannot trust him for their support; but go out under the authority of some Missionary Board, of President and Directors, &c., (who are made so for their money) and who instead of preaching Christ, and him crucified, are preaching up "union of effort," to get money in his name. We do not know them as Brethren, of the household of faith; for we have not so learned Christ.

In short, if by the term Missionary, we are to understand, one who is sent of God, to preach the Gospel; we are in favor of Missionaries. But we must protest loudly against all Missionary Societies, except "the Church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood."

Third, that we are not opposed to the use of a Printing Press, for the diffusion of the truth. Witness the Signs of the Times;

but we are opposed to Religious Tracts, when they are filled up with fables, or falsehoods, not when they publish truth. We are opposed to Tract Societies, on the same ground that we are opposed to every professedly Religious Society, except the Church of Christ. We protest against all such Institutions as profess to be the Lord's Treasury, and would make men believe that all that is given to them is given to the Lord, and that the Lord has authorised them to beg money in his name, for their own use, to enable him to save his people from their sins.

Fourth, we do not object to learn our children the necessary branches of Education, even on the first day of the week, when such instruction can be kept disconnected from the popular idea of learning them religion; and where the children of a City or Village, are so situated that they cannot be instructed as well in any other way, or at any other time, but when the children of any neighbourhood have the advantage of a common School six days in a week, we think the time set apart by the Church for the worship of God, ought not to be broke in upon.

Fifth, we have no objection to learned Ministers, provided they have learned in the School of Christ; nor do we care if they are conversant with the dead languages; provided they preach the living language to us, and not the dead carcass of Moses. We do not object to learned men when it is our good Master's pleasure to call them, but we do consider that a Theological Seminary, for the preparation of young men for the Ministry, is a work-shop of the Devil, and the hot-bed of all kinds of delusion. Perhaps the expression may have a harsh sound, and truly we would modify it if we could consistently, for we have no doubt it will make diviners mad. But what shall we call it? We challenge Creation to prove that they are of God? Nay, we stand prepared to prove they are not of God; and if not of God – they must be of Satan, – and if Satan does not work in them, we are confident he does not work any where. It is there he keeps his Library or Tool-chest, and there he Manufactures his Magicians.

We would use softer language if we could, but truly we have never yet met with a sound man who had learned to preach at a Theological Seminary. In this establishment he does not only heap teachers “having itching ears,” but it is there he Manufactures degrees, Reverends, D. D.'s, Pontiffs, &c. &c.

Lastly, we are not in love with intoxicating Liquors, nor do we advocate the cause of intemperance. But we do believe that there is sufficient virtue in the Religion of Jesus Christ, and a sufficient obligation in a profession of Religion; to restrain the saints, and to exclude the offenders, without our sinning in order that grace might thereby abound. We do think that when a professor of Religion joins a Temperance Society, (as they are called) that they are certainly going down to Egypt for help. Therefore, if any of our Brethren are fearful, that they shall not be able to conquer their thirst and withstand the temptation to drunkenness – we should recommend that he, or she should remember that the name of the Lord is a strong tower, where unto the righteous flee, and are safe.

But as for the world if they think proper to form Societies for the purpose of guarding themselves against intoxication we have no objection, so long as they do not make this a machine to act in concert with the other Societies of modern invention

PORTENTOUS SIGNS.

Preceding the most terrible judgments which the righteous sin-avenging God has ever executed on the inhabitants of the world, signs of the approaching wrath have been given to those who feared the Lord. Before the bottles of heaven were unstopped, and the Waters poured forth to utterly deluge the world, and sweep away the guilty inhabitants thereof, God made known to Noah the near approach of that impending storm of wrath, and provided for the salvation of him and his family. But while the lowering clouds were gathering for the day of wrath, all signs and solemn warnings were utterly disregarded by the inhabitants of the world, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and swallowed them up.

Who would believe the descendants of Noah would ever to their latest generations have forgotten that terrible demonstration, or ever again disregarded the signs and solemn warnings of approaching destruction? Scarcely however had the destructive waters of the deluge become assuaged, and the bright token of peace and safety painted on the retiring cloud, and men began again to be multiplied on the earth, when, in defiance of the thunderbolts of heaven, divine protection was repudiated, and the building of a tower whose top should reach to heaven was commenced, with the evident design to defy the wrath of God, should another flood be gathered upon the earth. Their tower was designed to rise above its destructive waters, and afford safety to its builders.

When the time approached for the terrible destruction of Sodom, there came an angel from God to give the necessary warning, and to hurry Lot and his family from the impending ruin; and God also made known to Abraham what he was about to do. But all these warnings were only like idle tales, an uncalled for alarm to the devoted victims of the lowering storm of wrath. The gathering clouds of flaming wrath were unheeded by the Sodomites, until its sulfurous fire came down with sure and quick destruction on their devoted heads.

When God was about to destroy the house of Belshazzar, and wipe out the imperial power of the Chaldeans, and give the dominion to the Medes and Persians, many signs, great and portentous, foretold the coming events; but all were unheeded, until the hand-writing upon the walls of the palace surprised with consternation the sacrilegious monarch in the hour in which he was slain.

Predictions by the prophets throughout the Old Testament had long foretold the great and terrible day of the Lord, in which great wrath, more terrible judgments than the earth had ever witnessed, should overwhelm in ruin the city of Jerusalem. Signs in the heavens above, and in the earth beneath, should indicate its near approach. There should be wars, and rumors of wars, famines and earthquakes in various places, the sun should be darkened, and the moon turned into blood, and the stars of heaven fall. The abomination that maketh desolate should be seen standing in the consecrated city and temple. All these with many other fearful signs preceded the destruction of Jerusalem.

And all the signs which were given before the destruction of Jerusalem, if we have correctly understood the Scriptures, shall be repeated immediately before the final and everlasting overthrow of “Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and abominations of the earth.” Read carefully the signs which foreshadowed the destruction of Jerusalem; compare them with what Paul, and Peter and John have, by inspiration, told us should be the signs of the destruction of the organized ecclesiastic powers of the man of sin, the son of perdition, and mark the perfect similarity of the signs; and then look upwards to the heavens above, look downward to the trembling earth on which you stand, look at the crumbling thrones of empires, and the quaking basis of all human governments; the wars now raging, and rumors of wars impending and imminent, look which way you will, your eyes are greeted with the most appalling and fearful signs of great and fearful coming events.

It is not our design to excite, alarm or to appeal to the fears of the timid; for the apostle gave this charge to the Thessalonians in his second epistle: “Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God (II Thessalonians 2:1-4).” Whether by the approaching day of Christ the apostle referred to the time when Jerusalem should be destroyed, or to the final destruction of Mystery, Babylon the Great, is not clear to our mind; but of this we are confident, the preliminary signs which should precede the one, should also precede the other; and some of the signs spoken of in this chapter seem to us to have a very evident allusion to the developments of anti-christ as a much later period than that in which Jerusalem was destroyed.

If we may understand these instructions as applicable to the modern anti-christ, we see that the apostle would not have the saints of God prematurely agitated or troubled on the subject. The warning given in the third verse, against imposition of false alarmists, shows that various means would be used by deceivers to produce panic and excitement on the subject, for base and deceptive purposes. Still the people of God should watch the passing events, and carefully observe the signs which we are authorized to accept as coming by spirit, by word, and by letter, from the inspired apostles.

It is true that before the destruction of Jerusalem there were many anti-christs, more or less developed. (See I John 2:18.) But the same apostle informs us in the fourth chapter of the same epistle, and third verse, that the spirit that confesseth not that Christ is come in the flesh, "Is that spirit of anti-christ, whereof they had heard that it should come." The manner of his coming we are told by Paul, "is after the working of Satan, with all signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish," etc. Regarding as we do the premonitory signs given by Paul in II Thesselonians 2, as applicable to the final and everlasting overthrow of the present anti-christ, we will call attention to some of the signs which we are divinely warranted to regard as indications of the very near approach of her impending ruin.

First. "That day shall not come, except there come a falling away first." This falling away must have reference to some particular apostasy from the doctrine and order of the gospel; for in every age of the church, not excepting the apostolic, there have been some departures. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for us to fix our mind with any degree of certainty on the particular falling away intended, were we not more definitely instructed in these words. "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy: having their conscience seared with a hot iron (I Timothy 3:1-3)."

And in II Timothy 3:1-7, what is in the former text called the latter times, is called the last days. "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of them that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." If it be admitted that the latter times, and the last days, in the meaning of the apostle, points to the times and days immediately preceding the downfall of modem anti-christ, it will become us to enquire whether the abominations by which these times anddays are distinguished are now to be found.

Has there come a falling away? There have been, more or less, a falling away from the doctrine of the apostles and primitive order of the church of Christ, as we have already intimated, at different periods since the day of Pentecost. But within the present century, there has been a far greater apostasy from the Baptist church than any that has ever preceded it. Through the darkest ages of pagan, papal and Protestant wickedness, while the earth has been drenched with blood, the church of Christ has maintained her integrity, and in no age has the Primitive Baptist church stood more firm and erect than when suffering cruel persecution at the hands of her enemies. The organized powers of anti-christ have never broken our ranks. Though driven into the wilderness, and protected from the flood which issued from the dragon, and obscured her in sackcloth for the forty and two months, or twelve hundred and sixty years, of papal opposition, there has never been any extraordinary apostasy, or "falling away," from the faith and order of the gospel by the Baptists until the present century. Neither the papists nor the Protestants have departed from the faith of the gospel, for they never held it. But in the separation of the New School, or Missionary Baptists, from our faith, order and communion, we have a *falling away,*answering in every particular to that described by the apostle. The faith and order which has characterized the Baptist church from the day of Pentecost to the present time was by them repudiated when they went out from us; for we stated to them distinctly that if they would adhere to the Scriptures as our only rule of faith and practice we would still retain them in our fellowship. But they turned away their ears from the truth, and were turned unto fables. Led away from us by seducing spirits, they went out after doctrines of devils, and were soon seen in all the regalia of anti-christ described by the apostle in I Timothy 4:1-3 and I Timothy 3:1-7. In that separation, it seems to us the let was removed, and the way opened for the more full and complete manifestation of the man of sin, the son of perdition, whose coming, or manifestation, is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish. Since the great falling away, when those who are known as Missionary Baptists abandoned our faith, and united with the other branches of modern anti-christ, there have been other cases of apostasy, in which many who once stood highly esteemed in our ranks, have turned their backs upon us, and are now mingling with "heady, high-minded truce breakers."

Secondly. Were we endued with sufficient light and ability to explain all the mystic imagery presented in the vision which John saw on Patmos, as wrapped up in the sealed book, and disclosed in the opening of the seven seals in their regular succession, by the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and to give a clear and faithful interpretation of the seven trumpets, the seven thunders, and the seven vials which were filled with the last plagues, and to show the precise time and manner of the rising of the beasts from the sea, and out of the earth, and of the making and giving life to the image of the beast, - could we fully, clearly and truthfully explain their true signification, and their bearing upon the subject under consideration, all would go to admonish us that the hour of the destruction of Mystery, Babylon the Great is near at hand.

"Her cup of wrath is ready mixed,
And she must drink the dregs;
Strong is the Lord, her sovereign Judge,
And will fulfill her plagues."

Thirdly. The external signs of the near approach of the great and terrible day of the Lord should not be overlooked, nor underrated. At what period have we heard of so many wars, and rumors of wars? Scarcely any organized nation or government of the earth that is not shaking, and in commotion and turmoil. The prophecy of the downfall of the temporal power of the Roman Pontiff in 1866 was fulfilled. Earthly thrones are crumbling beneath their occupants. Revolutions are numerous; and nothing short of divine interposition can rescue our own beloved country from anarchy and ruin. The phenomena of the heavens surprise our astronomers. Pestilence rages with deadly effect in many parts of the world, sweeping off men and beasts. The seas have exhibited fearful commotion, and millions of the scaly tribes have died and risen to the surface. Famines are prevailing in many places, while earthquakes are literally rocking the world. The appalling accounts from our Pacific coasts tell of the swallowing up of thirty towns within the last few weeks, and extending along the coast over two thousand miles, and many thousands of the inhabitants have perished; and our latest dispatches report that severe shocks are still being felt. Quite recently, shocks have been felt in Canada, New York, Vermont, California, and in several other states. And yet it is with the great masses of the people, as it was in the days of Noah; eating and drinking incessantly, marrying and being given in marriage.

Admidst all these premonitions of impending storms of wrath, on flaming wings approaching, vice and wickedness is most frightfully increasing throughout the breadth of our land. Never have we been startled with accounts of so many horrid crimes as are reported in our daily newspapers. Men have become more and more selfish, “Lovers of their own selves.” Proud, arrogant and vain. Blasphemers, defying the thunderbolts of heaven. From the rulers in high places, and the priests at their altars, down to the most humble walks of life, such admonitions are wrought, as our guilty world has seldom, if ever before, witnessed.

If these fearful signs are not indications of the approaching destruction of modern anti-christ, they certainly portend some important judgments at hand, as “coming events cast their shadows before.”

May the voice of God be heard by all his people who may yet linger in Babylon, saying unto them, “Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partaker of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues (Revelation 18:4).” And may those who have not received any of the marks of the beast hear and heed the admonition recorded in Isaiah 26:20,21, “Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself as it were, for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.”

PRAYER AND FASTING.

Brother Beebe, will you, or some other brother, give your views on the subject of Fasting and Prayer? When I was a child I often heard of days being set apart by the churches for that purpose. I never hear of it now, except by unbelievers. I would also like to have your opinions as to how often a church should commune. It seems to me that once or twice a year is not enough.

I am, I hope, your little sister in the precious Redeemer, REBEKAH P. HELM.

REPLY. – Jesus, in answering some who asked him why his disciples fasted not, informed them that while the bridegroom is with the children of the bridechamber they cannot fast; but in the days when the bridegroom shall be taken away, they shall fast. – Mark ii. 19, 20. There are seasons with the saints when they enjoy the sensible presence of their heavenly Bridegroom, when they cannot refrain from feasting on heavenly food. He brings them to the banqueting house, and his banner over them is love. But when his sensible presence is withheld from them, and they in darkness mourn, then they find cause for humiliation, prayer and fasting. But even then they are forbidden to fast or pray as the hypocrites do, with ostentatious parade, appearing unto men to fast. Jesus said to his disciples, "Moreover when ye fast be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast." "But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face, that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly." – Matt. vi. 16-18. The Lord charged upon the carnal house of Jacob, saying, "Behold ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness," and to make their voice to be heard on high. And he demands of them, "Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?" – Isa. lviii. 4-7.

These instructions are too plain to need a labored explanation from us. The disciples of Jesus are forbidden to let others know of their fastings, or to even appear unto men that they fast at all. Their fastings are not to consist in afflicting their souls, by going without food which is given for the support of our natural bodies; but while in humiliation before our God, who seeth in secret, we are to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, unbind and set free the oppressed, break every yoke, and see that we make no vain display, or let our neighbors know that we are fasting.

In regard to the proper seasons for celebrating the Supper, in which we are to show forth the Lord's death, we are not instructed how frequently it shall be observed; it seems to be left discretionary with the church. And her appointments for the ordinance we believe to be binding on all her members who are not unavoidably prevented from being present. The command to wait one for another seems to indicate the suitable time for the ordinance to be when the church members can be generally together for that purpose; and the command, "Take and eat ye all of it," and "Drink ye all of it," leaves no one at liberty to be absent at the time, or, being present, to decline to eat of the bread and to drink of the cup. It is a command of Jesus, that all his disciples shall participate in this holy ordinance, and none of them are to interpose their feelings, doubts or fears as a reason for disobeying the command of our Lord.

PREACHING AND BAPTISM BY THE APOSTLES.

BROTHER BEEBE: – I wish to ask a question or two through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

1st. Is there any positive evidence in the New Testament that the right to administer the ordinance of baptism ever extended beyond the hands of the apostles who were commissioned by Christ?

2d. Did they, (the apostles,) preach the gospel to all nations?

Yours in christian love,
DAVID CLARK.
WESTFIELD, Mass., April 10, 1843.

IN answer to the first of the above inquiries we refer brother C. to John the Baptist, by whom the administration of the ordinance of baptism was introduced, and who also was not of the twelve chosen as apostles. Christians are commanded to observe the ordinance of baptism as a token of taking up their cross and faithfulness in following the Lamb "Whither soever he goeth." Nor was this beautiful symbol of the death, burial and resurrection of Christ confined to the apostolic age; but its perpetuity is to be co-extensive with the other christian ordinances which ornament the church militant. But should our inquiring brother desire further instances than that of John the Baptist, we cite that of the eloquent Apollos, (Acts xviii. 24, and onward) who was not an apostle, but a co-laborer with the apostles, preaching and baptizing. So instrumental was Apollos in practicing these functions, that in speaking of the inability of man by any means to add to the church of Christ, the apostle was constrained to say, "I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase."

From the above considerations, as well as from the whole tenor of the New Testament, we can entertain no doubt of the propriety of the administration of the ordinance by any regular minister of the church of Christ. Indeed preaching and baptizing seem to he inseparable functions, and we are not aware of any instance iii which they have not been combined since the day of John the Baptist.

In reference to the second inquiry above, we answer that in the persecution which arose at Jerusalem it is said that the saints were scattered, and they that were scattered went everywhere preaching the word. Again, on the day of pentecost, by the miracle of tongues, the gospel was preached, and every man heard in his own tongue, wherein he was born: "Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia in Egypt, and in the parts of Lybia about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, Cretes and Arabians, we do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God." Again, "All they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus." – Acts xix. 10.

At sundry times, from the age of the apostles to the present, persecutions have scattered the saints, and they that were scattered as of olden times went everywhere preaching the word.

When the saints became from time to time troublesome to the Roman pontiffs and popish prelates, persecutions arose against them, and they were scattered from the opulent and populous regions of the Roman dominions to the deserts of Arabia and Africa, among the then savage tribes of the northern coasts and islands of Europe and elsewhere; and thus the gospel was proclaimed to the Arab, the Hottentot, the Ethiopian, the Barbarian, Druidist and others for they that were scattered went everywhere preaching the word.

When in God's good time it was necessary to send the gospel to America, he caused the persecutions of the saints in the eastern world to wax hot, and drive them from their native land to the unknown wilds of the western hemisphere and when driven here they did not fail to preach the gospel of God's grace.

In reviewing the history of the church we shall see her driven from nation to nation; and as her members have gone about from one place to another with the flame and fagot be hind them, and thus been scattered up and down in the world, they have gone everywhere preaching the word. And as long as the carnal mind is enmity against God, the world will continue to persecute the church, and the saints will be scattered to and fro, and thus God will ever send his word just where it is his own good pleasure to send it, without the unhallowed aid of human inventions to obtain such corruptible things as silver and gold for its propagation.

PREACHING TO SINNERS.

THERE is a general murmuring among the New School tribes, that the ministers of the Old School, or Regular order, do not preach to sinners. Let us examine this charge a moment. If they do not preach to sinners, to whom do they preach? If we be answered that they preach to the saints, we reply, that they only preach and apply the promises and encouragements of the gospel to that description of saints who know and acknowledge that they are sinners, and hope that they are sinners saved by grace. And is it not right to preach to saints? The direction is, "Feed my sheep, and feed my lambs." "Feed the flock of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." These they endeavor to feed and comfort. But do they not also preach to another description of sinners, viz; to sinners in Zion? Do they not warn the unruly of the evil consequences of abandoning the divine rule given in the scriptures for our faith and practice, and of running with the multitude into the New School operations of the day? Certainly they do.

Again. Do not the Old School Baptist ministers preach to, and warn the New School Baptists, and labor incessantly to convince the unconvinced among them, of the abomination of their way, while they profess to be disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ, are laying in wait to deceive the people of God, and are teaching for doctrines the commandments of men? Do they not warn them of the awful judgments, and fearful threatenings of wrath which will soon overtake them? They certainly do. But, why, says one, do they not preach to that class of sinners who make no pretension to religion? We answer, they do preach to all who come within the sound of their voice, and leave all who have an ear, to hear what the Spirit saith to the churches; but where they have no ear to hear the sayings of the Spirit of truth, they do not attempt presumptuously to furnish them; nor do they feel themselves at liberty to preach what their Lord has not authorized them to preach, for the sake of accommodating their discourses to the condition of any class of sinners. But why should it be thought more important to preach to, and warn the class last described, than those who pervert the word of God, and bear a false testimony in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ? Are these less dangerous to the simple, less troublesome to the church of God, or less sinful in the sight of a holy God, or less exposed to that judgment which now of a long time lingereth not, and that damnation which slumbereth not? To what description of sinners did our Lord apply these expressive words: “Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?” Was it to professors, or non-professors? It was to those whom he addressed as Scribes, Pharisees and hypocrites. And let it not be forgotten, that all the prophets of the Lord in olden time, were stoned by zealous professors of religion; our Lord was crucified by the most popular class of professors of religion then upon earth; the apostles and primitive saints, with all the children of God in subsequent ages, down to the present, from those who profess the most ardent zeal for the Lord.

If, therefore, we have in the ranks of the Old School Baptists, those who do not preach to such sinners as these, on all suitable occasions, we shall feel constrained to preach to them as sinners, for the wicked neglect of their bounden duty.

We therefore wish to be understood as calling on the New School sinners; (these being the worst sort) we warn them in the language of the scriptures, saying, “Ho, ye despisers, wonder and perish; for behold I work a work in your days, which ye shall in no wise believe, though one shall declare it unto you.”

"PRECIOUS SEED."

"The Rev. Mr. Huribut, of New London, Connecticut, enclosing five dollars, says: 'It has been my privilege to attend the sick and dying bed of a dear child of God, Miss Elizabeth II, who sealed an exemplary, consistent life, by a death full of faith and peace. The money was earned by her Sabbath school class who met with her on Saturday afternoon to sew, while she read to them and instructed them. It is precious seed, for it has been wet with the dying tears and consecrated by the fervent prayers of one who, I believe, is now in Abraham's bosom. Will you send it in tracts to some missionary, and request him to scatter it faithfully as good seed that may be expected to bring forth fruit unto eternal life." American Messenger.

PRECIOUS SEED, in the language of Ashdod, does not mean the same as good seed, incorruptible seed, &c., as used in the scriptures; but now agreeably to the order of things precious seed signifies filthy lucre, wrung from the earnings of Sunday school children, and wet with dying tears, and consecrated by the fervent prayers of their teacher. The children are taught to believe that such seed will raise up children to Abraham, and bring forth fruit unto eternal life.

Albeit, the scriptures inform us that a seed shall serve him, (Christ) and it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation - that when he shall make his soul an offering for sin he shall see his seed, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in. his hand. Christ, in expounding one of his parables, says that the good seed are the children of the kingdom: and Peter tells us that the heirs of grace and glory are "Born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever." Peter esteemed this modern precious seed as corruptible things, such, said he, as silver and gold. But the wire workers of modern religious machinery, take a very opposite view of the subject. They believe that gold and silver are far more effectual in the redemption of sinners than the blood of Christ; for they contend that Christ's blood has been expended for the redemption of all mankind, and that it has failed to secure that object for which it was expended; but a five dollar bill, earned by Sunday school children, wet with dying tears and consecrated with fervent prayer, then laid out for tracts, and these tracts faithfully distributed will produce fruit unto eternal life, where the blood of the Lamb has failed to produce such results.

John says, Whosoever is born of God cannot commit sin, because his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. According to the New School rendering the text should read, Whosoever is born of money, or tracts, cannot sin, for the five dollars remaineth, &c. Is it any wonder that these worshipers of mammon should believe that gain is godliness!

The American Messenger is a new paper published by the American Tract Society, at 150 Nassau street, New York, and is the regular organ of that institution. The above article, with several others copied from that filthy sheet, will show to what extent of abomination that society has arrived in their daring opposition to the God of heaven.

PREDESTINATION.

THE absolute Predestination of all things.

ON this important part of the doctrine of Christ, we wish to be well understood, as we consided it a fundamental part Of the faith of the Gospel. In the absence of this doctrine we can have no confidence in the predictions of the word of God. If the prophets spake and wrote of undetermined Detents, events concerning Which the Holy One himself had not made up his mind, they must have spoken and written with the utmost uncertainty. If it were possible to banish the doctrine of Predestination from the viola Scriptures, we should not only lose thereby our interest in the ancient predictions of the Old Testament, but we should find it impossible to believe the testimony of the new. What consolation would the exceedingly great and precious promises of the Gospel afford us, if we had reason to believe that God had not yet determined whether they should ever be verified? Again, what confidence could we have ill the veracity of God, if it were certain that his promises were made without any determination on his part to perform them ~ Indeed there could be no certainty of a future Anal without the predestination of such a state. No heaven, no hell, no resurrection, nor final judgement. Thus we see to what an al dilemma we should be driven without this doctrine. Predestination is the preset nation of act events that can possibly come to pass, it involves the doctrine of Divine Sovereignty, and exhibits the wisdom and the power of God; the one presents We plan, the other carries One execution the things decreed.

Predestination is the result of the counsel of God’s own will, originating with himself alone. “With whom took he counsel and who instructed &c. In the doctrine of Predestination all the Attributes of Deity shine forth, ninth dreadful majesty. The entire history of mankind is by Predestination established in the view of God, and the final destiny of all things are held in his almighty hand.

"There's not a sparrow nor a worm,
But's found in his decree;
He sits on no precarious throne,
Now borrows leave to be."

We may consider this doctrine first in the economy of salvation, and then in its more general bearings. Fired God has chosen, or predestined, his people unto salvation, through sanctification of the spirit and a belief of the truth. – 2 Thes. ii. 13. Agreeable to his okra sovereign pleasure as expressed in the above text, he has predestined them to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself according to the good pleasure of his Bill. Eph. i. 5. He has predestined them unto eternal life. "As thou hast given him power over all flesh that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." – John xvii. 2. "And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed." – Acts xiii. 48. He has predestined their caning, conformity to the image of Jesus Christ, their justification and glorification. "For whom he did foreknow he Also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. Moreover whom he did predestinate them he also called, and whom he called them he also justified, and whom he justified them he also glorified." – Rom. viii. 29, 30. In short, every thing in relation to his people here and hereafter is so firmly established in the decree of God, that no power can prevail against them. "He rideth upon the heavens in their help and in his excellency on the sky. The eternal God is their refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms." – Deut. xxxiii. 26, 7. "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel; according to this time it shall be said of Jacob and of Israel, What hath God wrought?" – Num. xxiii. 23. "Even the very hairs of your heads are all numbers." – Math. X. 30, Luke xii. 7.

Predestination is not confined to the adorable purpose of Salvation by Grace, but is has a direct bearing on all things. Not a sparrow can be brought to the ground, nor can the troubled ocean dash her foaming waves one inch beyond the limits of God's decrees.

If any thing was left upon uncertainties, every thing must have been equally uncertain. If the smallest atom in creation were suffered to fly at random in the full sense of the word, God himself not knowing where, or when it would alight, it would prove what cannot be proved, viz: that God is deficient in knowledge. The Omniscience, and the predestination of God, must stand or fall together; they cannot be separated. We are confident that both exist in glorious harmony in the mind of him who has declared the end from the beginning, saying, My counsel shall stand and I will do all my pleasure. See Isaiah xlvi. 10. The doctrine of Absolute Predestination, when rightly understood, does not involve the idea of man's acting involuntarily in sin; nor does it exonerate him from accountability; this may be discovered by noticing the following examples. The crucifiction of Christ, the abduction of Joseph, together with many other circumstances recorded in holy writ. "For of a truth against the holy child Jesus, whom thou hast onointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done." – Acts iv. 27. "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken and by wicked hands crucified and slain." – Acts ii. 23.

The brethren of Joseph had no knowledge of the purpose of God when they sold him to go down to Egypt, they meant it for evil, but God ordained it for good. When the Jews persecuted the disciples of our Lord Jesus into strange cities they knew not that God had ordained this very method of sending his missionaries everywhere preaching the word. And amidst the abounding abominations of the present day, it is our consolation to know that God has ordained "The wrath of man shall praise him, the remainder of that wrath he will restrain." – Psalms lxxvi. 10. We need only to understand this precious doctrine, and we shall most assuredly love it. The christian exults in the thought that death and hell can do no more than what our Father please.

We might notice the objections commonly brought against this doctrine, but we shall wait until such objections are presented; and in the mean time earnestly request our brethren to examine the word of God on this important subject. And that the God of all grace may give us light and wisdom from above, that in his light we may see light, is our prayer in Jesus' name, to whom be glory, power and dominion, now and forever, Amen.

PREDESTINATION.

The Old School or Primitive Baptists in former years have been very definitely identified and distinguished from all other religious or ecclesiastical organizations as PREDESTINARIAN BAPTISTS, and as such have borne reproach and vituperation from those who hold more limited views of what we regard as the absolute and all-pervading government of God over all beings, all events, and all worlds. With deep solicitude and painful concern we have witnessed in the preaching and writings of some of our brethren a disposition to so yield or modify the doctrine as to limit its application to such things as the carnal mind of man can comprehend or the wisdom of this world can approve. While some will concede that all things that they regard as pure and holy are ordained or predestinated of God, they deny that the absolute government of God does dictate by absolute decree the wicked works of wicked men and devils, for that, they say, would make God the author of sin. They therefore set up their judgment, and set bounds for Infinite Wisdom to be restricted to, and beyond which limitation he must not extend his government, without subjecting himself to their censure as an unjust God and the author of sin. But how lamentable is the infatuation of poor, blind mortals, when

"The vain race of flesh and blood Contend with their Creator, God;
When mortal man presumes to be More holy, wise or just than he."

There are undoubtedly many of the dear people of God who feel jealous for the glory of God, and who, without any aspiring ambition to be wise above what is written in the sacred scriptures, from inability to comprehend the two great parallel mysteries of godliness and of iniquity, have felt a commendable concern lest in our weakness we should impute to God aught that would reflect on his adorable perfections, or withhold from him that which he has ordained for the manifestation of his glory. It certainly becomes us, as finite beings, to speak of him and of his government with fear and trembling. He is the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, and his name is Holy. His attributes are veiled in that infinity which no finite being can by searching find out. He keepeth back the face of his throne, the place and power of his government, and spreadeth his cloud upon it. As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are God's ways higher than our ways, and his thoughts higher than our thoughts. The standard of infinite purity and holiness is the will of God. There can be no higher law than the will of God, for only to the standard or counsel of his own will and pleasure does he himself conform. "He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." – Eph. i. 11. "Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." – Isa. xlvi. 10. In this connection he says, "I am God, and there is none like me." And in the revelation of the Lamb, in whom all the fullness of the Godhead dwells, "The four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat upon the throne, and worship him that liveth forever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." – Rev. iv. 10, 11. "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counselor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen." – Romans xi. 33-36.

When God created the heavens and the earth no other power than his own was employed, no wisdom but his own was consulted, nor was there any other than his own will to dictate what, how, or for what purpose anything should be created. As a potter has power over the clay, it is his right to form his vessels as he please; and if he forms of the same lump vessels to honor and vessels to dishonor, who shall dispute his right to do so? The prophet says God is the potter and we are the clay; then, "What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory." – Rom. ix. 21-23. Dare any of us poor, finite worms of the dust dispute the sovereign right of God to do all his pleasure in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of earth? "Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" How appropriate and forcible are the words of Job, "Hell is naked before him [God], and destruction hath no covering. He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds, and the cloud is not rent under them. He holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it. He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end. The pillars of heaven tremble and are astonished at his reproof. He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through the proud. By his spirit he hath garnished the heavens; his hand hath formed the crooked serpent. Lo, these are parts of his ways: but how little portion is heard of him? but the thunder of his power who can understand?" – Job xxvi. 6-14.

Can we contemplate the awful majesty, profound wisdom, deep and unsearchable counsel, infinite goodness, unerring workmanship in all that he has condescended to let us know of his great and marvelous works, from the spreading abroad and garnishing of the wide heavens, down to the formation of the crooked serpent, and still stand in doubt of his predestinating power and unrestricted government over all beings, all worlds, and all events?

Are death and hell and all things naked before him, and destruction uncovered to his all-seeing eye, and yet unlimited by his power and wisdom? Has he stretched out the north, and balanced the earth upon nothing, without any design, purpose or decree concerning their subsequent destiny? Has God bound up the waters in his thick cloud, and "given to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment," (Prov. viii. 29,) and yet left all to the vagary of chance? When he set his throne above the heavens, was it to be the place of no power in controlling the destiny of all things in heaven and earth and hell? For about six thousand years the sun, moon and stars have with exactness filled their respective orbits, and without the variation of a second of time from their creation made all their revolutions, in obedience to the decree of the Creator. Is it by chance that "The heavens [thus] declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork?"

But, say some to whose minds the doctrine of the universal government is obscure, We admit that god has predestinated some things, but do not admit that he has predestinated all things which come to pass. Let us see how this partial or limited government would accord with the divine record. Suppose that in what we have been contemplating of the heavens, we should find the sun and moon, and all the stars but one, held firmly to their orbits by the irresistible will and decree of God, and that one solitary star, without any fixed orbit, is allowed to range the infinity of space, wandering with more than lightning velocity, guided only by chance; where would be the safety of all the other stars? what would become of the predestination of those heavenly bodies intended to be preserved from hazard by the decree of God?

To us it has been a comforting thought that god has set the bounds of our habitation on the earth, and the number of our months is with him, and our days are appointed to us as the days of an hireling, who cannot pass his bounds; but what assurance of safety would that afford, if he has left murderers and blood-thirsty men or devils unrestricted by his predestinating decree? To our mind, either everything or nothing must be held in subjection to the will and providence of God. Even the wickedness of ungodly men is restricted by predestination, so that "the wrath of man shall praise God, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain."

"Pains and deaths around us fly –
Till he bids we cannot die;
Not a single shaft can hit
Unless the God of heaven sees fit."

For death and hell can do no more than his hand and counsel have determined shall be done. Does this make God the author of sin? or, in other words, does this make him a sinner, or charge on him an imputation of impurity? By no means. Against whom is it possible for God to sin? Is he amenable to any law above himself? If so, by what law can he be indicted, in what court can he be tried or convicted? How preposterous! It is his eternal right to do all his pleasures, "Nor give to mortals an account, or of his actions or decrees."

It savors of atheism to deny that he is the self-existent, independent God who has created all things for his own sovereign will and pleasure. And if it be admitted that he had a right to create the world, and all worlds, it must then be also admitted that he had a right to create them according to his own will and pleasure. Worms cannot charge him with error because he did not assign them a more exalted place in the creation, or for creating them worms instead of men. Men cannot justly charge him for not creating them angels, nor angels because he did not make them Gods. The world, with its infinite variety of living creatures, from the minutest insect to the most huge monster, as well as man, were all made for the pleasure of their Maker, and all must subserve the exact purpose for which they were made. Even the crooked serpent, as well as the harmless dove, all were pronounced good in their respective places; not good in the sense in which God is good, but good because they were precisely what he intended or predestinated them to be. Had the serpent been straight, or the dove crooked, or if the things made had been different from what the Creator intended, there would have been a defect in the workmanship. We cannot, with such exalted views as we entertain, think that God has ever failed to secure the perfect accomplishment of his own design or purpose in anything he has ever done. The entrance of sin into the world, and death by sin, which by the offense of one man has passed upon all mankind, was no unprovided-for event with him, to whose eyes sin, death and hell have no covering. The eternal purpose which God had purposed in himself before the world began was sufficiently perfect and comprehensive to include all that could or can possibly transpire, or he would not have declared the end of all things from the beginning. “Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world.” – Acts xv. 18.

But there are many who admit the foreknowledge of God, and yet deny his determinate counsel, on which the certainty of all the events of time depends. Men may have a limited foreknowledge of things which God has made certain by his determinate counsel and irrevocable decrees, as it is said, the Living know that they must die; but God’s foreknowledge depends on nothing outside of himself, for he has challenged the universe to tell with whom he has taken counsel, or who has instructed him. To us it seems perfectly clear that nothing could be foreknown that was undetermined, and that the foreknowledge and determinate counsel of God are inseparable.

It is also generally admitted that in the salvation of his people, "Whom he did foreknow, them he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son," (Romans viii. 29); but that the well beloved Son of God was delivered into the wicked hands of men to be crucified by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, is not so readily admitted. The wicked works of those who crucified the Lord of glory were not foreknown by his murderers; but it was foreknown and determined of God, Peter said, to those whom he charged with the wickedness of killing the Prince of life. "I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers. But those things, which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled." – Acts iii. 17, 18. "For of a truth against the holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done." – Acts iv. 27, 28.

The wickedness of men in betraying and crucifying our Lord had been positively predicted from the days of Abel, in what God spake to the fathers by the prophets, and by what was signified by all the offerings which were made under the former dispensation. The pieces of silver for which he was betrayed were counted and declared hundreds of years before Judas was born; and the dividing of his garments, and the lot cast for his seamless robe, was determined of God and declared by the prophets. The history of Joseph, and the wickedness of his brethren, was in fulfillment of his dreams, and in accordance with the purpose in which Joseph said, God meant it for good.

It has been said by some that these great events which God has over-ruled for good were ordered of the Lord, but that the smaller matters, and the wickedness of men, were not predestinated. Our Savior has informed us that the determinate counsel of God in his all-pervading providence numbers the hairs of our head, so that not a hair can fall to the ground without him; even the little sparrows are protected, and the ravens are provided with food by his determinate counsel. And Paul assures us that "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."

It seems to us unreasonable, as well as unscriptural, to say that the government of God directs and controls some things, and that other things are left to the control of men or devils. If God's government extends only to the good deeds of men, then is his absolute government totally excluded; for "As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one: there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one." – Rom. iii. 10-12. We would not limit the government of our God, nor, because we cannot comprehend his designs, dare to say he has no designs.

"He in the thickest darkness dwells,
Performs his works, the cause conceals;
But, though his methods are unknown,
Judgment and truth sustain his throne.

"In heaven, and earth, and air, and seas,
He executes his firm decrees;

And by his saints it stands confess’d
That what he does is always best.”

Men act voluntarily when they commit sin; they have no more knowledge of or respect for the purpose of God, than Joseph’s brethren or Potiphar’s wife had in his case, for there is no fear of God before their eyes. It is even so with the princes of this world; if they had known Jesus, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. But it was needful that Joseph should be cast into prison, and it was expedient that Christ should suffer; therefore that knowledge was withheld from the persecutors of Joseph and of Jesus, until they should fill up the cup of their wickedness. And it is thus in the wisdom of God that the world by wisdom shall not know him. Yet such is the wisdom, power and righteous government of our God that he can and does set the exact bounds by which the wickedness of men and devils is limited, and beyond which they cannot go. Satan is bound a thousand years with a great chain, and after the thousand years he shall be loosed for a short time. With all his rage and malice he is restricted by the supreme power and decree of God, to do no more nor less than what God will overrule for the good of his people and for his own glory. And thus also, “God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction,” as in the case of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, hardening the heart of Pharaoh until all the plagues and judgments were accomplished, and his own almighty power and glory were then made known in delivering the Hebrews, and in overwhelming Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea. “Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?” – Romans ix. 17-22.

The apostle, fully aware of the disposition of the carnal mind to cavil and reply against the sovereignty of God in the execution of his pleasure, did not attempt to apologize for God, or so to modify the doctrine as to render it less objectionable to the carnal mind; but he called attention to the infinite disparity between the infinitely wise, holy and omnipotent God, who holds our everlasting destiny, and by whose long-suffering we are permitted to live, and poor, finite, depraved, short-sighted man, and the daring presumption and extreme folly of questioning of justice or wisdom of God in working all things after the counsel of his own will. We regard it as a very serious matter to charge that God cannot govern the world, by his own determinate counsel, wisdom and power, according to the eternal and immutable design or purpose purposed in himself before the world began, without subjecting himself to the charge of being the author of sin. Sin is the transgression of a law under which the transgressor was justly held amenable, and to the penalty of which he is subject. But we have endeavored to show that God is under now law but that of his own will and pleasure, and therefore he doeth his pleasure in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of earth. He could by no law be held under obligation to leave the affairs of this world or any part of them to be governed by chance, or by the will of men. As he is in one mind, and none can turn him, his purposes are eternal, like himself. His decrees being perfect from everlasting, admit of no improvement or change. If he had not the right to predestinate all things pertaining to the events of time before he created the world, we ask what right has he acquired subsequently to execute the orders of his throne? If it had been his pleasure to have prevented sin from entering into the world, can we doubt his power or wisdom or ability to have done so? If sin has entered this world in opposition to his will, or because he had not the wisdom and power to prevent its entrance, what assurance have we that it will not also enter the world to come? But it is to our mind far more consistent with what God has graciously made known to us of his being and attributes to believe that God had a purpose worthy of himself, however inscrutable to us, in regard to the entrance of sin, as well as in regard to all things else. He bids us “Be still, and know that he is God.” To our feeble mind the conclusion is unavoidable, that the predestination of God either controls all things or nothing.

We look at a vast complicated machine, with its ten thousand wheels. We cannot comprehend or understand its workings, but we are told that the machinist has a perfect knowledge of all its parts save one; there is a definite use for every wheel and spring, but one is held in the machine which has no certain motion or definite use. How long could that machine run in safety, with the unruly part liable at any moment to throw the whole into confusion. We cannot see how any part of the government of God can be absolute and secure, if God has not the undivided government of the whole in all its parts; and if he has to-day the full control, had he not the same control yesterday and forever? If he has not the full control to-day, is there any certainty that he will have to-morrow or at any future period? If we admit that God absolutely governs all things according to the counsel of his own will, and that he is immutable, then we must admit that he has determined what shall and what shall not transpire in time or in eternity. But to deny his universal control of all things, including all principalities and powers, thrones and dominions, things present or to come, whether they be visible or invisible, is to deny that he is the God of the whole earth, and virtually deny his eternal power and Godhead. If he has not the power and wisdom to determine all events, how can he cause all things to work together for good to them that love him?

But while we hold that he is a supreme in power, and that he works all things after the counsel of his own will, we are certain that he reigns in righteousness, and that there is no unrighteousness with him. To admit the universal government of God, is to admit the predestination of all things, from the falling of a sparrow to the dissolution of a world. In the absence of predestination, with what certainty could the Holy Ghost inspire the holy prophets and apostles to foretell all that should ever come to pass? If it were undetermined in the purpose of God, how could the apostles tell us of perilous times that should come in the last days, of apostasy from the faith, and spiritual wickedness in high places?

But we will submit these remarks to the consideration of our readers, and desire that what we have written may be carefully tested by the infallible standard, the scriptures, and received only so far as they are sustained by the word and spirit of our God.

THE PRESENT AND PAST.

“It is written, My Father’s house is the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves.” - Luke xix. 46.

Perhaps in the annals of the gospel dispensation a period of deeper interest, or fraught with graver events than the present, cannot be found. In reviewing the history of the church from the days of John the Baptist, a parallel with the present can hardly be found. In her infancy she was bitterly persecuted, her members were few and scattered; but even then, amidst the savage rage of her inveterate foes, she presented to the enemy an unbroken front, and the shout of her King was heard in her midst. In her passage down the channel of time, she was immerged in seas of blood, and enveloped in flames of papal persecution. The most horrid engines of cruelty that demons could invent were used for torturing and destroying the saints. But even then, amidst the rage of pontiffs, bishops, kings and priests, the church of God maintained her virgin purity. At the peril of mortal life, her sons contended earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints; nor could the chains of despots, the pains of bloody persecution, nor death in its most terrible forms, cause the sons of Zion to abandon or deny their faith, or any part of it, or in any measure to countenance any of the new schemes, plans, ordinances or doctrines sought to be enforced by their enemies. Passing through seas of their own blood, or evaporating in flames, their spirits crowned with victory through the Lamb, went home to their God and Savior, whom they so dearly loved, and in whom alone they trusted and triumphed.

But now, alas! “How is the gold become dim, and the most fine gold changed.” Where are now the champions for the primitive order of the church, whose hands have been taught to war, and their fingers to fight? Where shall we find the undaunted sons of Zion who are prepared to meet the torrent of opposition, who bearing a fearless breast can submit to stripes, tortures, or death, rather than give up one of their Lord's commands, or submit to anything unauthorized by him? Do they all slumber in death? Have they indeed all finished their course and gone home to glory? No. It cannot be. The hour has not yet come in which the Lord's Two Witnesses must be slain and trodden under foot in the streets of the great city which is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt. We yet see here and there a witness of the Lord, clothed in sackcloth, and prophesying under the most discouraging circumstances; but they are few, comparatively very few. Truly we may adopt the language used in former times. "Except the Lord had left us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and like unto Gomorrah," or like all the religious denominations around us, given over to idolatry; whose end is to be burned.

But while we contrast the present with the former state of the church, let us inquire what has caused the difference. When Zion dwelt alone she dwelt in safety. God has said, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt." Also, "When Ephriam spake tremblingly, he exalted himself in Israel; but when he offended in Baal, he died." Even so, when the church was under the lash of persecution, she spake tremblingly, with holy fear and sacred reverence for God and for his word; she then asked counsel of God, and turned neither to the right hand nor to the left without instruction from the Lord.

Another reason why it is not now with Zion as in times that are past is this: When the saints were persecuted unto strange cities, cast out of the synagogues, whipped, thrown into prisons and dungeons, or into boiling oil, banished to desolate islands, or when they were dragged before courts of inquisitors, stretched on torturing racks, dispossessed of all their worldly substance, driven from their homes and families, and their names cast out as evil; yea, when even on the shores of New England, in more modern times, the tongues of dissenters from Puritanic abominations, were bored through with hot irons, and many were put to death for their faith; when such was the standing and persecution of the Baptist church, she was able to offer no inducements to carnal men to intermingle with her sons and daughters. Consequently hypocrites and nominal professors were deterred from entering her ranks. They had no mind to share the tribulations of the saints of the Most High.

But now that a profession of piety has become the road to popularity, fame and opulence; now that even the once poor, persecuted and down-trodden Baptists have many of them waxed fat and kicked, and have heaped to themselves teachers, having itching ears; have erected for themselves Theological Schools, like the nations around them, for supplying themselves with a learned ministry, and for coining titles, as Doctors of Divinity, and have formed unhallowed and forbidden alliances with the world, and with their former persecutors, in Bible, Education, Sunday School, Missionary, and many other unscriptural, and therefore forbidden, institutions, she now can and does hold out strong inducements to the world, and to anti-christ, saying to them, "Cast in thy lot with us, and let us all have one purse."

Under such inducements the children of this world flock over to her in multitudes, saying, "We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel, only let us be called by thy name, (christian), to take away our reproach," (infidel.) Instead of the denomination, as such, rending their garments, and sitting in dust and ashes, they allow leading characters of their name and number to boast of the multitudes gained by these departures from the truth as evidence that their plans are owned and approved of God. Such are the present signs of the times.

PROFESSOR EATON'S ADDRESS.

WE consider the following extracts from the Inaugural Address of Professor Eaton as expressive of the views of the N. Y. Baptist Convention, as he is chosen by them as one of the teachers who are to prepare pious young men for the ministry at Hamilton Institution.

"The exigencies of the times, then, demand a thoroughly educated ministry. This may seem rather a bold and startling proposition to many Baptists, but a deep conviction of its truth urges me to advance it, and I trust my previous remarks have fully prepared my brethren to receive it with favor. I verily believe without such a ministry our nation cannot be saved. We cannot too much magnify the office of the christian ministry. I will not, however, stop here to descant upon its sublime and unspeakably important relations to God and man. Compared with it, how contracted the sphere, and mean the station, of the mightiest earthly monarch. I speak of it now merely as a center of conservative influence to save the nation. Its position to the people is such, its action so constant, direct and uninterrupted, its opportunity to exert a moulding influence upon the mind and heart so fair and full, that I will venture the assertion, even at the risk of raising the senseless cry, "Church and State," "priesteraft," et id omne genus, that the temporal as well as the eternal salvation of the land depends more upon the christian ministry than upon any other body of men. How immensely important that its influence should be of the right kind, powerful and unrestrained, acting benificiently upon all the great interests of humanity. Now, however favorable its position, however constant and direct its action, however fair and full its opportunity for exerting an influence, it cannot keep its hold upon an intelligent and educated community without it is itself intelligent and educated. It cannot, indeed, fully exert its beneficent power without it is considerably in advance of the general mass in knowledge and information.

Added to the considerations just mentioned, are others of a more special character, suggested by a contemplation of some of the peculiar features of the age, which most forcibly demonstrate the importance to the ministers of God of that discipline and enlargement of mental powers which a thorough education can alone impart. One of the most remarkable features of this most remarkable age is the grandeur of the conceptions, and the magnificence of the enterprises which men form and execute. Things are conceived and done upon a great scale. New energies and new capabilities seem to have been discovered in the world of mind as well as in the world of matter. An elevation and extent of view, a vastness and stretch of purpose, a depth and intensity of feeling, and an energy and promptitude of action, characterize the present movements of the human mind. The enterprises of the church, as those of the world, are strongly marked with these characteristics. The conceptions of enlightened christians, as respects the field and object of their labors, have been widening and widening, until they have come actually to embrace the world and the conversion of its millions to God. They have come to talk as familiarly of the conversion of the world as formerly of sending the gospel to a destitute neighborhood, not as a "consummation devoutly to be wished," and fervently prayed for, merely, but as a work which the Son of God is now calling upon them with commanding and animating voice to attempt and accomplish. The plans projected, and the means devised, for the accomplishment of this glorious object, partake in some measure of the grandeur and magnitude of the object itself. Ever and anon some new plan is announced, whose moral sublimity fills the mind, and thrills along every nerve of christian philanthrophy. At one time we hear of supplying the millions of our own country with the word of God in the brief space of two years; the astonishment of our minds at the boldness of the conception had scarcely subsided ere the work was done. Again we hear of providing schools for the instruction of our whole youthful population in this precious word. Our minds are delighted and our hearts cheered at the energy and success with which this great and benevolent object is now being prosecuted. Finally we hear of giving the Word of life to the whole world. Yes, the church seems at last to be rousing and shaking herself, and taking hold in earnest of her appropriate work. She is casting out the gospel net over the world. She is planting her moral machinery upon every shore. A cordon of her mighty agencies even now belts the earth. Now does it not require a well informed mind of strong and expanded powers to form even an adequate conception of these sublime movements of the Zion of God. Much more does it require such a mind in one who is called not only to take a conspicuous part in these movements, but to lead and direct them!”

REMARKS.

How passing strange the infatuation of that mind, which can,in the face of the word of God,talk and write to us about the exigencies of the times requiring, in the house of God, a deviation from the order established in Zion by our Lord Jesus Christ, as hitherto strictly observed by the people of the saints, and which has never failed to answer in all respects the designs contemplated by the divine Legislator, by whose authority this order in all its fulness was established. Well might Mr. Eaton apprehend that some of the Baptists would regard his statements as “bold and startling,” especially those of them whose thorough acquaintance with the New Testament has taught them to regard the order established in Zion by the great Head of the church as immutable as the pillars of the throne of God, and amply adapted to the exigencies of the church, until the last wave of time shall dash upon the shore of eternity. Such Baptists cannot but view the assertions of this learned teacher as insulting to the divine Majesty, as it is incompatible with a just sense of the wisdom of our adorable Lord.

How preposterous to assert that the plan of God is so defective, that at this moment we have hit upon a period which requires a new order of things, differing essentially from the order once required and maintained in the kingdom of Christ. And that although the plan which divine wisdom originated and established was well adapted to and did answer the purpose of the church for the last eighteen hundred years, yet now it is discovered that unless a new plan can be brought into requisition by human wisdom, "our nation cannot be saved." But yet, Mr. Eaton says, it is demanded; and we will not dispute that such demand is made, but we have a right to inquire, by whom? and being duly informed on this point, should we honor the imperious demand, we should find ourself in such circumstances as would enable us to tell the Jew and Gentile who had required these things at our hand. Hence we ask, Has Jesus demanded of the church and world that they should now no longer regard the line of division which, his sovereign hand has drawn between them? That they should now unite as one man, raise up and educate a new order of bishops, apostles, ministers, or popes, to meet the exigencies of the times? If so, where is that demand to be found in the good old book, or by what special messenger has this extraordinary message been sent down? Can Mr. Eaton find it in the following language of Paul? "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ, unto another gospel, which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ! But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed!" - Gal. i. 6,8. Or will he find it contained in these words: "For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, if any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book?" Rev. xxii. 18. Mr Eaton has the assurance to tell us that this is a demand of the times. Well then let him with all his time-serving brotherhood see to it; we profess allegiance to another king - "one Jesus."

But we pass to notice the faith of Mr. Eaton: "I verily believe without such ministry (educated) our nation cannot be saved." This faith will accord much better with that of Levi Tucker, who believes that "there is no hope for Pennsylvania other than through an educated ministry." (See page 181,) than with the faith of God's elect. But what salvation does Mr. E. believe cannot be effected without an educated ministry? He tells us, "The temporal as well as eternal salvation of the land," &c. Let us examine for a moment the foundation of this man's faith. We will test the matter thus: Fifty years ago a theological machine for educating young men for the Baptist ministry was not known in our denomination; at that time none but such as persecuted the Baptists unto death had any colleges for educating their ministers, and yet, how strange to tell, instead of sinking into eternal oblivion, we see at that very moment our then newly organized government emerging from the temporal thraldom into which but a little before the Revolution they seemed to be doomed; and from the day of our deliverance from the government of Great Britain up to the time of building colleges for manufacturing Baptist divines, America could challenge the world to produce a nation enjoying to a greater degree the blessings of temporal salvation. Yes, under such circumstances of the church, is it not admirable to mark the temporal salvation which the God of providence wrought for us? Here, and at that very time, an asylum was provided for the reception of the oppressed of all nations under heaven; and to the shores of our dear America, God with an high hand brought his church; here they found their promised and long sought "place in the wilderness, where she should be nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent." - Rev. xii. 14.

It is also a remarkable fact that the greatest obstacles in the way of the salvation of the Colonies of America were the learned priests, and their pliant "cow-boys," or tories. The latter were invariably instigated by the educated ministry - not of the Baptist, for, we thank God, at that day the Baptists had none - of the then established order; while the whole phalanx of educated ministers were found acting ever in concert with the most inveterate enemies of civil and religious liberty.

We are happy here to insert the opinion of General Washington, concerning our uneducated Baptists, which we extract, in reply to a letter of congratulation which he received from the United Baptist Church in Virginia, when he entered upon his first term of service as President of the United States.

"While I recollect with satisfaction that the religious society of which you are members, have been, throughout America, uniformly and almost unanimously the firm friends to civil liberty, and the persevering promoters of our glorious Revolution, I cannot hesitate to believe that they will be the faithful supporters of a free yet efficient general government. Under this pleasing expectation, I rejoice to assure them that they may rely upon my best wishes and endeavors to advance their prosperity.

"In the mean time be assured, gentlemen, that I entertain a proper sense of your fervent supplications to God for my temporal and eternal happiness.

"I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,
"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

Here, if our limits would admit, we could insert the names of many of our venerable but uneducated fathers in Israel, who contributed much to the temporal salvation of our nation, and on the other hand trace the unyielding oppression and tyranny of the educated priesthood, before, during, and since the Revolution. The blood of those victims who were murdered by the pious hands of the educated ministry in New England, has not yet ceased to call down the vengeance of heaven on their murderers. Fine conservators these of our national rights, who have never since the days of Cain been in possession of power but they have employed it in a manner hostile to the interests of civil and religious liberty! Not a nation under heaven has ever been able to maintain a free and equitable government where an educated ministry has been able to bring the people to believe the doctrine set forth in the address of Mr. E.

But let us once more compare the present state of things in this country with the past. We have shown above how the illiterate and genuine disciples of our Lord stood halt' a century ago, and what temporal salvation God wrought for America in their time; but now the times have altered, and the popular Baptists have adopted the policy of their old oppressors, and have their own Theological Schools scattered all over the face of our once prosperous country. The ministers which has issued from these dens of abomination are almost as numerous among us as were the locusts in Egypt in the days of Moses and Aaron. Mission Societies for the maintenance of these popular school boys, with a host of other popular money-getting machines for their agarandizement, are brought into being, and the influence of the educated ministry is felt among the Baptists, and what now is the state of things in regard to the temporal salvation of the nation? Let them now tell their own story, and from their own shame-deserted lips the cry is heard, "Men of Israel, help; sinners, help; government, help; mammon, help! We are like to be outdone by the Catholics; the Pope can and does furnish missionaries faster than we; he deals his cash with unlimited profusion, and is at thin moment deluging our country with Catholicism and ruin!" Nor is this cry an idle tale, for it is a real fact that the Catholic church is making a more rapid headway than her Protestant daughters can; and under the very influence of Mr. E.'s educated ministry, so far are we from finding the temporal interests of our beloved country improved, according to their own statements, our nation never before bordered so closely on the verge of ruin and despotism as at this moment, while the popular reform flourishes among us like a pestilence. So much then for the clerical protection of our country. This influence of the clergy Mr. E. would wish to be powerful and unrestrained; but let his desire in this particular be gratified, and then may the Lord have mercy on the people. Let loose the power of an educated and unrestrained clergy, and hell alone could equal the scene that would follow.

In regard to the eternal salvation of our nation, land, &c., we are not able to comprehend the precise meaning of the learned Rabbi of the Hamilton Theological School. Our bible knows of no other eternal salvation than that which secures to the heirs. of promise the blessing of immortality and eternal life' through (not an educated ministry, but) our Lord Jesus Christ. This was, and is, eternally secured in the covenant of life and peace, and cannot be altered either for the better or worse, by men, angels, or devils. "For he saved them and called them with an holy calling, not according to their works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given them in Christ before the world began." - 2 Tim. 1. 9.

As to the idea of the eternal salvation of the nation as such, or the land, if Mr. E. will dig among his rubbish until he finds the book of the Lord, by reading therein he will find that God has not designed the nations of this world as such to exist eternally, but has appointed a day in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up. - 2 Peter iii. 10.

But passing the foregoing considerations for the present, we will endeavor to place in one scale the reasons urged by Professor Eaton in favor of, and those by an all-wise God against, an educated ministry.

1. Mr. E. argues that an educated ministry is indispensible to the exigencies of the times: the world is on the "onward march," and becoming enlightened and scientific; and this he at,tempts to demonstrate by showing the vast capacities of the children of men for inventing such things as Bible Societies, with all their kindred institutions, together with the great scale in which the present age conceives of and does up things. Having probably to his own satisfaction proved that human nature is now somewhat different from what it was in olden times, he urges on this ground the necessity of an improved ministry.

2. Connected with the first reason, he urges that in order to carry into effect the mighty enterprises conceived and brought forward by the inventive genius of improved human nature, an educated ministry is indispensible.

3. The inventions of the age are so numerous and multiform, that a ministry uneducated cannot understand them all.

4. The ministry cannot fully exert its beneficent power unless it be considerably in advance of the general mass of knowledge and information.

5. Because the ministers of this age are not only called to take a conspicuous part in the work of saving the world, but to*lead* and direct these movements.

6. That being made acquainted with natural philosophy, they may be put in possession of a store-house of illustration, which in this scientific age they will find available and serviceable in the elucidation and enforcement of divine truth.

All these, together with the supposition that the temporal and eternal salvation of America depends exclusively on an educated ministry, seem to make up the sum total of his arguments in favor of the Theological Machine in which he is about to take the high seat of Gamaliel. Yes, these are the considerations urged by the most learned and talented of the day, and of course may safely be considered as presenting the strength and bulwarks of the new divinity system.

We will now collect some of the reasons why the God of wisdom will not lay aside his own plan of operations, and adopt those of human production.

1. “Because his thoughts and ways transcend the thoughts and ways of man, as the heavens do the earth,” (Isa. iv. 8, 9;) and “He is of one mind, and none can turn him.”

2. Because the wisdom of men is foolishness with God.

These are sufficient reasons why the Lord will not adopt the plan of Mr. Eaton. It would reflect on his wisdom, destroy his immutability, impeach his truth, and after all fall so far short of effecting anything good, that it would only be to substitute foolishness for perfect wisdom; and we can as easily bring ourselves to believe with the fool, “There is no God,”is with Mr. E. and his admirers, that God is as deficient in wisdom, power and immutability as. they would rep. resent him to be. It will now be entirely too late for Mr. E. to assert that he intended no other or new plan, for him has already admitted this, and claims that the exigencies of the times demand something more than what was required in times past. Nothing can be more evident than the fact that our Lord Jesus Christ, having all power in heaven and earth, did call poor, unlearned and despised fishermen, and others of like common occupation, to preach among the Jews and Gentiles the unsearchable riches of his gospel; and inasmuch as we know that “he had power over all flesh,” (John xvii. 2, also Matt. xxviii. 18,) and could as easily, had it been his sovereign pleasure, called the most learned of men or the most exalted of angels to proclaim his everlasting gospel, the conclusion is too irresistible to be denied, that he has chosen, not from necessity, but of his own good pleasure, the weak things of this world to confound the mighty; and the reason of this, his sovereign choice, he has condescended to give us: “That the excellency of the power thereof might be of God and not of us.”

Had our Lord adopted Mr. Eaton’s plan, and called to the work the most splendid talents to be found in that day, and sent them forth, it would have materially marred the excellency of the glory; for what cause would not appear to good advantage when advocated by the greatest talents? But the gospel was not to be dependent on human talent for its success, hence God was pleased to make it a stumbling-block to the learned Jews, and foolishness, to the wise Greeks; but at the same time to them who are called, Christ, the wisdom of God, and the power of God. We are aware that it is said that Christ was personally with those whom he first called to the work, and had them under a thorough course of preparation for the sacred work to which he called them. All this we admit; and if Mr. E. has yet to learn it, we are frilly prepared to inform him that that Old School of Baptists has not been discontinued. It is still the province of our Lord to raise up, qualify and send forth laborers into his harvest, and it remains the duty of the church, as formerly, to pray the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into his vineyard.

We cannot close these remarks without noticing particularly one assertion which occurs in this famous address. Mr. E, says that the Son of God is now calling upon enlightened christians, not devoutly to wish for, or fervently to pray for the conversion of the world, but is now commanding them with animated voice to attempt and to accomplish the work. This assertion we deny, and we call upon Mr. Eaton to prove his assertion; we shall hold him guilty of uttering palpable falsehood in the name of the Lord, until he proves to us that the Son of God has called on any of his creatures, angels, men, or devils, to convert the world. We wait for his proof.

THE PROPITIATION.

"AND he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." - 1 John ii. 2,

AT the request of sister Fernal, as expressed in her letter On page 156, we will offer a few thoughts on the above passage of scripture. This epistle was written to those Hebrew disciples which were at the time John wrote, scattered abroad by a persecution which had arisen soon after the day of Pentecost; a "General Epistle." It was evidently designed primarily for the same "strangers, scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Capadocia, Asia and Bithynia," to whom Peter directed his epistles. The design of the apostle John or rather of the Holy Spirit by him in sending this circular out among the dear scattered flock is clearly stated in several instances throughout this epistle; one object was that their joy might be full. See Chap. i. and ver. 4. He had been speaking to them in the preceding chapter of the remaining depravity which all the children of God, while here on earth have to lament and mourn over, and which w calculated to make these early disciples who had been principally brought up in Judaism, think that they must some offering or sacrifice for their sins; or otherwise from that they could not be what they had hoped they were, the children of God. But the apostle tells them that if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: this was calculated to comfort them, and to prevent their sinning, either by attempting to receive Jewish ordinances which were now abolished, or otherwise. If he had been inspired to assure the Pharisees or Arminians, that if they sinned they had an Advocate or Propitiator with the Father, who had atoned for them, and who could and would assuredly sustain them; the consequence would be, as they have often themselves declared, they would with such assurance sin the more: yea, they would take their fill. But not with those whom the Son of God hath made free; these are radically changed, and sin is no longer their element. Hence the apostle writes to them this glorious truth, these sure mercies of David, that they sin not; see preceding verse. Well did the inspired writer know that the more the children of God could know of rich, free, sovereign, immutable, invincible and unfrustrible grace of God, the less would be their relish for sin, and the greater their joy in the Holy Ghost. In this text, Christ is not only presented to the dear tried, tempted, sin-burdened and scattered saints as a propitiator, to whom they might have access, to make reconciliation for them; but "He is the propitiation," itself. That is, Christ is the satisfaction of all demands, which could possibly be brought against His people; hence the apostle calls Him as our advocate, "Christ the Righteous," or the righteousness of his people. He is of God made unto us, Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification and Redemption. This is the name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness. Therefore as He is their advocate, propitiation and justifying righteousness, other offerings were not acceptable to God. Certainly the apostle could not be mistaken in supposing that this doctrine would revive the spirits of the drooping lambs of Christ; this was indeed a word in season to them in that time of special trial. But as our sister Fernal tells us that she has not yet got beyond temptations, doubts and fears and as she complains bitterly of a want of conformity to the image of her blessed Lord, perhaps she may conclude from what we have written that all these good things were written by the apostle exclusively for the Hebrew saints, and being, according to the flesh, a poor Gentile, that she has no advocate, no propitiator; but let her not despair; the apostle tells us that Christ as a propitiation is not confined to the Hebrew saints to whom he was writing, but he is so also to the Gentiles; for in this sense the term whole world is used by this apostle throughout his writings, meaning Jews and Gentiles, which truly includes the whole world. See Chap. v. and ver. 19. And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness. The simple meaning is that in behalf of all the saints of God, both Jews and Gentiles, Christ is the only advocate with the Father, as it is written, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth" but why look to him? He adds, "For I am God, and besides me there is no Savior," no Propitiator, no High Priest, no atonement or acceptable sacrifice; this is truly a good and sufficient reason why all who being quickened by his spirit, (and until quickened there are none that seek after God,) should look away from self, from self-righteousness, from Moses, from anxious benches and human devices; for it requires a God to save a sinner. So also every poor, afflicted, trembling, sin-burdened Gentile sinner, who has experienced the washing of regeneration, (for none other can answer the description given,) may rely on The propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, and rejoice that he is able to keep them from falling, I and has pledged himself that they shall never perish, but have everlasting life. We would write more upon this pleasing subject, but must forbear for the present. May the Lord bless these few hints to the comfort not only of sister Fernal, but also to many of his dear hidden ones, is our ardent desire for the Redeemer's sake.

PROSPECTS FOR 1863

Notwithstanding the dreadful scourge which has fallen upon our country, the devastation of war, dismemberment (at least for the present) of our States, the interruptions and suspension of postal intercommunication with the seceded States, by which nearly one half of our former circulation is cut off, the advance in the price of paper, and other expenses of a printing establishment, as also in the cost of nearly all the necessaries of life, we have been enabled to stem the tide to adversity, and to continue our publication thus far through the current year, which is now drawing to its close. And now we submit to our brethren, friends, patrons, subscribers, and agents, shall it be continued through another year? We will not now attempt to urge the importance of sustaining the “Signs of the Times”, as a medium of Christian correspondence, through which the afflicted saints can communicate words of consolation, and comfort, of admonition and instruction, to the tried and afflicted saints scattered abroad; for of the importance of our brotherly correspondence, each for himself can judge; but we find it necessary to remind the friends of the publication that to continue it, there are obstacles to be overcome, which the Editor and Publisher, single-handed, is unable to surmount.

Having, within the last two years, fitted up our office with one of Hoe’s Cylinder Presses, steam engine, and fixtures, at a great expense, we find ourselves, at the close of this year, about $3,000 or $3,500 in debt. The interest on this alone, together with increased, and still increasing, current expenses, admonish us that the friends of the paper must decide for us, and for themselves, whether we shall be sustained or not.

Some of our subscribers have informed us that owing to the excessive pressure of the times, they feel compelled to discontinue their support for the present, but intend again, if spared, to resume their patronage as soon as circumstances will permit. We are aware of the pressure of the times, especially as they bear upon the greater portion of our brethren: but we beg them to consider that to ensure the permanent continuance of the paper they, as well as ourselves, must make an unusual effort. There are probably but few of our friends, although generally in limited circumstances, but what can, from their limited resources, in the course of a year, save a small sum of one dollar, even if they should deny themselves of other indulgence: but there are some we know who love to receive and read the “Signs of the Times” who have no means of raising even that small amount. To each, however, it has been our uniform practice to send the paper gratuitously, and we have many of that class now on our list; beside many who have neglected to pay their arrearses. We have thought we would make the following propositions:

First - Let every subscriber feel himself especially requested to make an exertion to increase our circulation by obtaining, beside his own, at least one new, paying subscriber.

Second - Those who are able and willing, beside paying in advance for their own, send in what they can afford to be applied to assist us in furnishing gratuitously the paper to such aged, or poor brethren or sisters, who desire to read, but are unable to pay, and all such contributions shall be faithfully so applied.

Third - Let those who are indebted to us, as soon as possible, remit the amounts due, and, if possible, forward also advance payment for the next year.

We feel so fully persuaded that our friends, and brethren will act on the foregoing suggestions that we shall, if life and health be spared, continue our labors through the next year; and then, if not sustained, we shall be compelled to discontinue the publication.

To us it seems there never has been a time when the publication of the “Signs of the Times” were so much needed as in these critical and trying times. While all is confusion and strife around us in the world, and while the witnesses are being slain, and as the tune of the overthrow of Babylon is so speedily advancing, let every feeble knee be confirmed, and every hand that hangs down be strengthened; and, “In the name of our God we will set our banners.”

Our terms for the next year, notwithstanding the increase in the price of the paper, etc., will be the same as formerly.

Brethren and friends, in ordering the “Signs of the Times”, please bear in mind that we shall be happy to also supply all orders for our “Baptist Hymn Book”. For terms, see advertisement on our last page.

PROSPECTUS FOR VOLUME 36.

As the thirty-fifth year of our publication is now closing upon us, it is time to announce to our readers what are our prospects and designs for another year. With humble gratitude to the Sovereign Ruler of all events, we desire to record his goodness and mercy which have followed us all our days; and especially on this occasion would we render a tribute of praise and thanksgiving for his manifold favors to us in our connection with this periodical. With fear and trembling we commenced our editorial and publishing labors just as we were entering the prime and vigor of manhood, under very many discouraging circumstances, and in the face of most violent opposition, as the first, and for many years the only paper devoted to the Old School, or Primitive Baptist cause. Since we commenced our labors just one-half of the three score years and ten which are allotted to man have passed away, and in their rapid flight they have borne away by far the greater portion of those who were our companions and contemporaries at that time. A long list of the names of those who encouraged us in the beginning are now, alas! inscribed upon their tombstones, and their mortal remains now slumber with the silent dead; and why we are spared while so many have been called hence is only known to God; but whatever has been his purpose, we know that our unfeigned love and gratitude is due to him. But while we look around us in vain for those who were companions of our earlier days, to the praise of God be it acknowledged we are not left without true and faithful friends, and loving brethren who have never failed to show themselves in our most trying straits. Today we have a greater number of able and devoted brethren and sisters, scattered throughout all the states and territories of our wide spread country, ready to contribute able communications to fill up and enrich our columns, than we have ever before had at any one time. The violent opposition we have encountered from time to time from avowed enemies, and still more annoying from professed friends, has been more than balanced by the true friendship, fellowship and cooperation of thousands, the faces of many of whom we have never seen in the flesh.

The circulation of our paper was seriously restricted, and its continuance imperiled by the late dreadful scenes of carnage in which our country has been involved, but for the last two years the way has been opened for a circulation in the Southern States, and we are now constantly receiving accessions to our subscription list from all quarters.

In view of our increasing circulation, and the increasing demands for enlarged facilities for a general correspondence, extending to all parts of our country and the Canadas, we propose to add four pages to each number of the “Signs” for the next year, beginning with the first day of January next. The paper to be the same form and size as at present, each number to contain twelve instead of eight pages; without any addition to the subscription price, and the postage, being by weight, will be no more than now. Not more than one page will be occupied with standing advertisements.

This new arrangement will add 50 percent to the amount of printed matter, and afford space for many valuable communications which have heretofore been excluded for want of room. And we flatter ourselves that our additional expense will be met by our increased subscription. As it will involve an expense to us of a large amount, may we not hope our brethren and all who are friends to the paper will use their influence to procure new subscribers, and forward their orders and remittances without delay.

Should our circulation during the year 1868 reach ten thousand, we will, if spared, at the commencement of 1869, issue the “Signs of the Times” weekly.

PROVERBS 1:24-26

Brother Beebe: If it is not asking too much, I would like to have your views of Prov. i. 24-26. Perhaps you may say it merely applies to the Jews as a nation. There are many passages like it, that I would like to see quoted in the SIGNS more frequently than I do.

JULIANA TUTTLE.
Mt. Carmel, Conn., May 25, 1858.

We have never designedly suppressed any portion of the Scriptures, nor refused to give our views on any passage when called on to do so. We do not claim to have light on every portion of the word, but so far as we have any light, we desire to declare all the counsel of God. The Scriptures are in perfect harmony with themselves, however dark our minds may be in regard to them. There can therefore be no good reason for concealing or keeping back any portion. Sister Tuttle, we presume, will admit the above, and if so, she will admit that if we have one solitary passage in all the Bible to sustain our doctrine, we have every passage. But if it be as some seem to imagine, that the Bible sustains opposite doctrine, that some portions favor Arminianism, and other portions assert the opposite doctrine of predestination, election, sovereign, saving, irresistible and almighty grace, then we must regard that blessed book as a volume of contradictions altogether unreliable as a source of infallible instructions. The text proposed for our consideration, if it has been neglected by us, certainly has not escaped the notice of the Arminians, it is among the few which they have garbled from the Scriptures, and on which they seem to confidently rely to sustain them in their warfare upon the doctrine of sovereign grace as held forth by our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles in the New Testament. But we can discover nothing in this passage, when rightly understood, that conflicts with any other portion of the Scripture as understood by us. The words of the text proposed for investigation and comment are, “Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof. I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh.”

The wise man, in this proverb, represents wisdom contending with folly, and shows the natural inclination of men to folly, and their opposition to wisdom. In whatever sense we consider wisdom, this proverb holds good. We will consider wisdom first in its literal signification. That wisdom which our beneficent Creator has bestowed upon intelligent beings, has from the morning of the creation had to encounter the folly of mankind. Her voice has been lifted up, and her speech addressed to the sons of men, but how few comparatively have pursued the course of wisdom without turning aside to folly. Did not our first parents in the garden, turn a deaf ear to wisdom, and listen attentively to folly, when they transgressed the orders which they had received from the Creator? Did Cain obey the voice of wisdom when he murdered his innocent brother? And finally, in the history of the world, from age to age, have not each successive generation madly pursued a course of folly against the clearest and most rational dictates of wisdom, in the things of nature as set forth in the connection in this chapter? We see the young man endowed with good intellectual powers of mind, he encounters the enticing allurements of the wicked. Wisdom bids him beware! Consent thou not. The proposition is made to him, “Come with us, let us lay wait for blood; let us lurk privily for the innocent.” “Cast in thy lot among us; let us all have one purse.” At such a proposition, what course does wisdom dictate? She says, Consent thou not. But is her voice and dictation heard and obeyed? Not as a general thing; the foolish youth departs from a path marked out by wisdom, and is finally involved in trouble. Justice pursues the guilty, the day of retribution comes, and then these sons of folly would gladly call wisdom to their aid, but it is too late. She will laugh at their calamity and mock at their fear. The murderer on the scaffold, about to expiate his crimes, feels only taunted and mocked by wisdom when she reminds him of the folly that has sealed his doom. The drunkard, against the dictates of his better judgment, persists in his cups, and rushes on to destruction, until overwhelmed with misery. And in regard to the whole course of human action, wisdom points out the righteous course, and folly allures to an opposite direction. Sister Tuttle rightly supposes that we will apply this proverb to the Jews, for God himself has thus applied the charge. See Isaiah i.; lxv. 1, compared with Rom. x. 21. But we do not apply it to the Jews exclusively. Gentiles as well as Jews are subject to the charge of folly.

But not only do the sons of men stand condemned as transgressors of the clearest dictates of human wisdom, but equally so in regard to the wisdom of God, which wisdom Paul says we speak in a mystery. The preaching of Christ crucified is unto them that are called, the wisdom as well as the power of God; but it is nevertheless to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks folly. And in the preaching of the cross of Christ, wisdom has lifted up her voice, and proclaimed to every creature under heaven that there is salvation for God’s people in Christ Jesus, and in no other place or name. But folly has resisted the voice of wisdom, and contends that there is salvation in the will and works of men, that there is salvation in gold and silver; in rites and ordinances of human invention; in voluntary humility and worshiping of angels; in tracts and Sunday Schools; in mission and other religious societies; in the pardons of popes; the absolution of a priest, or the benefits of an anxious bench, or the virtue of an Arminian prayer.

Wisdom, through the gospel ministry has certainly protested against all these delusions, for more than eighteen hundred years, and in her solemn protestations she has invariably been justified by all her children, their experience has corroborated her testimony in all ages. “But no man,” by merely human sagacity has regarded her voice. All men by nature love darkness rather than light. The wisdom of God is foolishness with, or in the estimation of men. Men, in their inventions have set at naught all the counsel of God’s eternal wisdom, and substituted their own wisdom, and even go so far in modern times as to ask the Lord to forego his plans and purpose and adopt theirs. They represent that God’s method of salvation will not do to rely upon, and that the last hope of a sinking world is in the wisdom and works of men.

“And would none of my reproof.” The voice of wisdom in the ministry has always exposed and reproved the doctrines and commandments of men, but alas, how few have heeded these reproofs! They have reproached and persecuted those whom God has made wise unto salvation, and desired their extermination from the earth, because they hate the light, neither will they come to it lest their works should be reproved.

But the awful day of retribution is at hand when he that sitteth in the heavens shall have them in derision, according to what is written in the second Psalm.

“But wisdom is justified of her children.” The Lord Jesus Christ is of God made unto them Wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption. And as their wisdom, his goings forth have been of old from everlasting. As their wisdom, the Lord possessed him in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. And he says, “I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was.

“Before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth.” - Prov. Viii. 23, 25.

We submit these views to sister Tuttle, and if she will name the other passages, which she regards of the same classification, which have not been sufficiently conspicuous in our columns, we will try to make room for them, for we want a whole Bible, a whole gospel a whole Savior and a whole salvation.

PROVERBS 22:6

In reply to a sister who has desired our views on the text: “Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it.”

The proverbs of Solomon are short sentences of wisdom, which, while proverbially true in their literal application, as a general thing, are more immediately designed for the spiritual instruction of the children of wisdom. Hence Wisdom is personified as giving divine instruction to her children; by whom she is ever justified. In many parts of the book of Proverbs, the address is made to “My son,” “My children,” etc. And in chapter seven, Wisdom is the speaker. “Doth not wisdom cry? And doth not understanding put forth her voice?” Our Lord Jesus Christ is of God made unto us, (his saints) wisdom and righteousness; sanctification and redemption. For in him is found all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. To them who are called, both Jews and Greeks, he is the wisdom of God, and the power of God. Admitting then, as we must, that these proverbs are given by divine inspiration, we are to receive them as addressed to us by our divine Instructor, the Lord Jesus Christ, who says, “Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly.” And of whom God’s voice, in the cloud of transfiguration, said “Hear ye him.” In liberalizing the proverb now under consideration, its beauty and truth does not appear; for there is no human wisdom so perfect as to secure infallibly the result which is contemplated in our text. In Solomon’s own case, there was an apparent failure. His father, according to the flesh, was David, the man after God’s own heart; and Solomon himself says, “I was my father’s son; tender and only beloved in the sight of my mother. He taught me also, and said unto me, Let thy heart retain my words; and keep my commandments and live.” And certainly Solomon was as brilliant an example of good breeding as we can find, yet we are told that when he became old, “nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin (Nehemiah 13.26).” In his old age he was led into idolatry by his strange wives. And in our day we have many sad examples of the kind. How many anxious parents have taken all the pains of their power in the discipline and education of their children, and yet those children have in many instances departed from all the wholesome instructions and judicious counsels which had been lavished upon them in early life, while instances have not been infrequent wherein children who have in childhood and youth been exposed to the most unwholesome instructions, and most pernicious examples, have risen to eminence, and in old age been found among the best citizens in the world. Although the course suggested by the proverb commends itself to the wise, it does not give assurance that human care and prudence shall always be successful.

Many experiments have been tried by the wise and prudent of this world, to improve the condition of mankind, and much discussion has been had on the question: “In what way should a child be trained?” The ancient Pharisees boasted their superior advantages, having the law and the covenants with them, of training their children; but we are told they made their pupils two-fold more the children of hell than themselves were. And our modern Pharisees, by Sabbath Schools, infant and Bible classes, and Theological seminaries, have succeeded no better. The present generation has been raised and educated and trained under the full power of all this humanly invented religious machinery, thoroughly drilled in Sunday Schools; we have often been told that when they become old they would be pious Christians, and good citizens. But what do we see as the result of all this kind of training? A more wicked, murderous, heaven-defying generation probably has never been upon the earth since the deluge. “He that sitteth in the heavens has laughed, and God has had them in derision (Psalm 2:4).” According to his unerring word, “Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse; deceiving, and being deceived.”

But, as we object to the use or abuse to which our text is and has been prostituted by ancient and modern Pharisees, we will give our esteemed sister, and our readers generally, such light as we have upon its true and spiritual meaning. Understanding Christ as head over all things to his church, as personified by Wisdom, and as such set up from everlasting, or ever the earth was, as the head of his spiritual family, and Husband of his church, or his Jerusalem which is above, which is free, and which is the mother of all the legitimate children of wisdom, we shall regard the admonition and instruction of our text as addressed by him to the church, the Lamb’s wife, the spiritual mother of the family, directing her to “train up” her children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. None can successfully dispute that this application of our text most fully and beautifully expresses the instruction of Christ to his church, in regard to the discipline of his household. The church of God is under a most solemn charge from him whom his soul loveth, to train up her sons and daughters in the fear of the Lord. She is solemnly charged to see to it that all his laws and ordinances, precepts and examples, doctrine and order, be faithfully taught, and constantly observed by all her children. And who has ever known a heaven-born son or daughter of the church of the living God, who has been trained from the infancy of their spiritual experience under the faithful administration of the word of truth, well instructed in the doctrine of Christ, and constantly habituated to take the scriptures as the man of their counsel, standard of their faith, and rule of their conduct from their first connection with the church until their heads have whitened with age, that has not become well established in word and doctrine?

In the nature of the figure, it is the peculiar office of the wife to instruct her household to honor and obey their father and their mother in all things. And as a mother, her children are placed under her peculiar care and instruction; they are directed to look to her for succor, instruction and consolation. She is an help meet for him who is the "Everlasting Father," of all her children. He bids her, "Train them in the way they should go." To train is to exercise, to instruct, to keep them in the practice, to drill, and accustom them to the constant practice of that in which they are to be trained.

Practically, the church of Christ, walking in all the order of the house of God, sees that sin is not suffered to rest unrebuked on any of her children. She has maternal charge as well as love for them all. She receives to her bosom the "newborn babe," as soon as it is born, feeds it with the sincere milk of the word, which flows from the breasts of her consolation. She attends to their numerous wants, hears and understands their cries for bread; or feeds them on milk, as she knows their condition and age can bear; teaches them to talk, and turns to them a pure language, that they may not speak in a mongrel, or half Ashdod dialect; instructs them how to spell and pronounce Shibboleth, and every other pass-word or countersign required of those who are of the household of God. She sees that not a morsel of food from the pulpit, or elsewhere, goes into the mouth, that is unwholesome; she examines well that there be no wild gourds served up by young and inexperienced prophets; that there be no "death in the pot" from which they are to feed. She has a charge to see that their clothing is in good order, white and clean, unspotted from the world, undefiled and unpolluted. Her husband has stored the wardrobe well. The garments of salvation, the robe of righteousness, garments of praise, and raiment of fine needlework are there; she is to see to it that they are seasonably put on, carefully protected from pollution, and duly appreciated. She has a special charge in training them, to keep them out of bad company; for her Husband, in one of his proverbs of wisdom, has told her that "Evil communications corrupt good manners." She must not allow them to go after strange women, (professed churches). She must teach them to beware of the flattering words of the strange woman (anti-christ), and thoroughly warn them against her subtle snares, and tell them plainly that "her house is the way to hell, leading down to the chambers of death; lest they should let their heart decline to her ways, for she hath truly cast down many wounded: yea, many strong men have been slain by her. Such are her fascinating charms and seductive devices, that many shall follow her pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. She must therefore faithfully warn them to beware of dogs, to beware of evil workers, and to beware of the concision. She has a solemn charge to see that the discipline of the house of God is faithfully observed in all cases, and see that the little children love one another. She must in training them see that they are well instructed in all the doctrine of God their Savior, and that they perfectly understand and walk in all the order and ordinances of his house, blamelessly and unrebukably until his coming.

Now, my dear sister, do you think a child of God, a son of the church, brought up strictly according to the laws of Christ, and duly instructed to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded, from early infancy to old age, will, when old, depart from the doctrine, order or ordinances of his kingdom? Did you ever know such an instance?

But even the children of God who are left, like the few Jews in Jerusalem while the tribes were carried into Babylonish captivity, may forsake the law of the Lord, inter-marry with the children of Ashdod, become corrupted, and their very language become confused and incoherent, so that they spake neither language correctly; but a mongrel jargon which betrays their lack of wholesome training. The children of God require the care and counsels of their mother; or they are liable to become as children tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine.

In conclusion, esteemed sister, although you are located somewhat remote from your mother, as to the privileges of frequent social privileges in the church, and but seldom can hear the preaching of the word in truth and faithfulness, yet as God has graciously trained you himself; weaned you from the vanities of the Gentiles; led you about and instructed you; and kept you as the apple of his eye; surely there is no good thing that he will now withhold from you. Where you formerly sought a home, when you asked for bread, they gave you a stone; when hunger compelled you to ask for a fish, they gave you a serpent, and for an egg, they gave you a scorpion. But the Lord has heard your groaning, and came down and delivered you; he brought you out of the house of bondage with a high hand, and an outstretched arm, and he has brought you to his banqueting house, and over your defenseless head has he spread the banner of his love. Now we address to you the inspired admonition, which has already been brought home by the Spirit to your heart, “Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear: forget also thine own people, and thy father’s house: so shall the king greatly desire thy beauty; for he is thy Lord; and worship thou him (Psalm 45:10,11).”

PROVERBS XXVI. 4,5.

(Reply to Enquirer from the Regions of Doubt.)

In this text we have two rules given for the treatment of fools, which although at first glance may seem rather paradoxical, yet on a close examination will be found perfectly harmonious, and each of equal importance. God's people, though in themselves fools, being altogether destitute of that wisdom which cometh down from heaven, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, without partiality and without hypocrisy, until they are born of God and taught by his Spirit, and thereby made wise unto salvation through faith that is in Jesus Christ, are by vital union with Jesus Christ elevated above the character of fools, as our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the wisdom of God, is of God made unto them wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption; and then they find by revelation of God made to them, "unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ: in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." - Col. ii. 2,3. They have received the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom, and there is treasured up for them in Christ, an inexhaustible fullness, so that if any of them lack wisdom at any time, or under any circumstances, they know where it is hidden, and it is their privilege to ask of God who giveth liberally unto all men, and upbraideth not. Though they are all taught of God, and all know him, from the least of them to the greatest, and all have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things, and need not that any man should teach them, but as the same anointing teacheth them of all things, (See 1 John ii. 20, 29) still they have to deal with those who, however wise and prudent they may be in the wisdom and prudence of this world, are fools, or perfect idiots in regard to the things of the kingdom of God, which kingdom no man can see except he be born again; and the things of the kingdom being spiritual, the natural man receiveth them not, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

Having briefly noticed the parties implied in our text, the children of wisdom, to whom the Proverbs are addressed, and the fool, or fools, with whom they have to associate while here in the flesh, we will attempt to explain the use of the two rules laid down for the instruction of the wise.

Rule 1. “Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him.”

Should the wise man give a foolish answer to the foolish question of the fool, he would thereby degrade himself, and the answer and the question both being foolish, would place the parties on the same footing; both would be alike degraded, so far as the question and the answer are concerned. In that sense therefore the wise man is not to answer the fool according to his folly, lest he should be like him. But he is nevertheless, according to Rule 2. “Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit.” When a wise man answers a fool, he must bear in mind that he is dealing with a fool, and not with an equal in intelligence, and his answer must be given accordingly. According to an approved adage in use “A word to the wise is sufficient.” But in the Proverbs of inspired wisdom we are told that if we should bray a fool in the mortar with a pestle, still his folly would not depart from him. If a fool who has said in his heart, “There is no God,” should ask of one who knows the Lord, to demonstrate the existence of Jehovah, it would not be wise in the christian to attempt to demonstrate his position, by what he has experienced of the indwelling of the Spirit of God in his own heart, for he must recollect that the fool has no knowledge of spiritual things, and such an answer would be unintelligible to the fool, and would only inflate his vain conceit that he had embarrassed his antagonist with a question that was unanswerable. But in answering him, use such arguments if possible as he can understand, point him to the evidences of the handiwork of God in the natural world, to the shining sun, the paler moon, the twinkling stars, the teeming earth and rolling seas; things which natural men can contemplate as well as christians.

In short, we should not answer a fool according to his folly, by condescending to be as foolish as he is, or by giving him a foolish answer, for then we should be like him, but we should observe the admonition of our Lord, to be as wise as serpents and as harmless as doves. If a fool, to provoke us, should ask us an insulting question, and we to retaliate give him an insulting answer, then what advantage would we have, or could we claim over him? In that case we would be truly like him. But should we in meekness endeavor to instruct such as oppose themselves, hoping that peradventure the Lord may give them repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth, this would have a tendency to humble his pride and prevent his being wise in his own conceit. We have many examples in the New Testament. The old Scribes and Pharisees often tried to entangle our Lord and Master with their foolish questions, but he answered them wisely, and in that sense not according to their folly, and yet he answered them in the other sense according to their folly, by stopping their mouths by his well timed and pertinent replies. Much more might be said on this subject, but as we have quoted the adage, “A word to the wise is sufficient,” and although Enquirer hails us from the unpleasant regions of doubt, we hope, from the nature of his enquiries, that he is searching for light, and we pray that he may be delivered from doubts in due time, and know the joyful triumphs of the faith of God’s elect.

PSALM 16:10.

Brother Moody, of Maine, desires our views on the words, "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell." Psalm 16:10.

The best and only reliable explanation of these words that can be given, are found recorded in Acts 2:25-32, inclusive. It is here shown by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, that these words were applicable to David, only as a type of our Lord Jesus Christ; and were used to signify that Christ should certainly arise from the dead, and that his flesh should not see corruption, but that it should arise on the third day. The word hell in this text does not mean perdition, but is here, as in some other passages, used to mean the grave. The word hell, we are told by the learned, is from the Saxon hillan, or helan, which signifies to hide, or roll, a cavern, though elsewhere used to denote the place of torment, it is here used to signify the concealed or unseen place of the dead. Hence it is here used to show that our Lord Jesus, in pouring out his soul unto death (Isaiah 53:12), was able to lay down his life and to take it up again. John 10:18. Hence the resurrection of our Redeemer from the dead was the verification and fulfillment of what David as a prophet said in our text.

"Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain; whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. For David speaketh concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved; therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad; moreover my flesh shall rest in hope; because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

Thou hast made known to me the ways of life; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance. Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulcher is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption. This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are all witnesses. Wherefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear. For David is not ascended into the heavens; but he saith himself, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool. Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." Acts 2.22-36.

It would be presumptuous in us to attempt to improve on this divinely inspired interpretation of the subject.

PSALM XXXVII. 1.

“Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.”

There is an element in the earthly nature of mankind to fret and feel indignant when our own peculiar views are ignored or even criticized by others, and although it is as impossible for all to think and believe like as it is for all to look alike, and although the convictions of our minds are involuntary and beyond our control, still, we are prone to become provoked at, and impatient with those who differ in their judgment and conclusions, from what seems clear and fully demonstrated to our minds. This element or propensity of our nature is generally perceptible among all classes of the human race, to a greater or less degree, in regard to their favorite or long cherished traditions. In regard to things of this world, statesman will differ in politics, and Physicians on medical science, and all classes will dispute and sometimes abuse those who cross their tracks or fail to agree with their favorite theories. But by far the greatest sensitiveness and the least forbearance, and the most fearful persecutions that have ever crimsoned the earth with human gore, have been produced by conflicting sentiments on religious subjects. From the days of Cain the intolerant spirit of religious bigotry has marked and stained all the pages of history. The wicked and murderous spirit of Cain was of Satan. Cain was an active religionists; but his religion was not acceptable unto God. His offering was of the fruits of the earth, and of the labors of his own hands, unauthorized by divine command, and unaccompanied by that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit, and the gift of God, without which it is not possible to please God.

The spirit of God which rules in the hearts of all who worship God in spirit and in truth, is the very opposite of that spirit which works and the children of disobedience, and which has in all ages characterized the religion of the world. The Spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him, dwells in all who are born of the Spirit, and so far as they are controlled by it they manifest the meekness of him who when he was reviled, reproached, persecuted, mocked and even crucified, reviled not again. Jesus said to those who labor and are heavy laden, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lonely inn heart: for ye shall find rest unto your souls." – Matt. xi. 29. "But the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast of mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." – Isa. lvii. 20, 21. How wide the contrast between those who cannot rest, for whom there is no rest, and those of whom it is written, "Great peace have they which love by law; and nothing shall offend them." – Psa. cxix. 165. The spirit of meekness and humility which is born from above, cannot fail to love that law which God has written in the heart of all his covenant people, because it is the law of the spirit of life which is in Christ Jesus, and he dwells in them as the hope of glory, and is fulfilled by his love which she has shed abroad in them; abiding in him they abiding love, for God is love. – John iv. 16.

Now, although everyone who was born of God is a recipient of his spirit, and in that spirit have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, still they are while here in flesh, be set with many trials and temptations, being still in an earthly tabernacle of flesh, which is born of the flesh, and which retains its opposition to the spirit of holiness, and still requires to be vigilantly watched, denied, kept under and crucified. If this were not so, why are the saints admonish to fret not, to be not envious at the prosperity of the wicked? Surely we can not believe that any spirit which is given us from above can require to be denied, resisted or crucified. But, if our experience is in harmony with that of Paul, we shall find, (and without much searching) another law, spirit, or predominating propensity in our members warring against the law of our mind, bringing us into captivity to the law of sin which is in our members. With their mind, those who have the mind of Christ, serve the law of God, while with their flesh they serve the law of sin.

It is on account of these conflicting elements of different parentage and birth, which are found in all who are born of the flesh and also born of God, that they are so frequently and constantly admonished to put off the old man with his affections and lusts, and to put on the new men which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. "For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the spirit of God dwell in you. Now, if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness." – Rom. viii. 6-10. The indwelling of Christ has not changed our body from sin to righteousness, nor from death in Adam, to life in Christ, for the body is still dead because of sin, although the spirit which is given us is life because of righteousness. The same mortality, depravity and sin that we inherit from Adam in our mortal bodies, still remains until our change shall come. Therefore, "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die;" for the body is "the body of this death." "But if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live;" for the spirit is life because of righteousness. "But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by [or because of,

as in the margin] his spirit that dwelleth in you." – Rom. viii. 11. The distinction between the two elements or natures of which every christian is composed while waiting for their change to come, is clearly and unmistakably demonstrated by the inspired record of eternal truth. The body is mortal, a body of death, held in bonds of corruption until mortality shall be swallowed up of life, and death in victory. It is cheering to be assured that the same spirit that raised up the crucified body of our Lord from the dead shall also, or in like manner, quicken our mortal bodies, change and fashion them like his glorious body, and deliver them from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. As Jesus our Lord, in his resurrection from the dead by the glory of the Father, is the first begotten from the dead, and the first-born among many brethren, even so the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has begotten all his chosen generation to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, two and inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are capped by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed at the last time. 1 Peter i. 2-5; Col. i. 15 and 18; Rom. viii. 29.

But to return to the admonition, "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity. For they shall soon be cut down like grass and weather as the green herb." The saints are exhorted to commit their way unto the Lord, and trust in him. In patient submission to bear all the trials, afflictions, reproaches and persecutions that God in his infinite wisdom in goodness sees good to call us to encounter while here in the flesh, knowing as we do that he is able to sustain us while in the conflict, and deliver us as soon as shall be for our good and his glory.

We think it will be admitted by all experienced christians that the most troublesome enemies they are called to encounter while in the flesh are found in our own earthly natures. The cruel shafts of bitter enemies without, persecutions, prisons, stripes, and even martyrdom have been joyfully welcomed when the cheering presence of the Lord has been realized to comfort and support, and

"Prisons have palaces proved
When Jesus has dwell with them there."

Why then should christians fret, or yield to discontent?

"What though the prince of darkness frown
And vent the fury of his spite?
Eternal chains confine him down
To fiery deeps in endless night."

Above all things, why should we being grew with those who differ with us in their religious convictions? They do not, they cannot differ more widely from our views on religious subjects then we differ from them in their views. If we're right and they're wrong, we surely have the best of it, and much greater reason for humility and gratitude to God for the gift of greater light. And, on the other hand, if they are right, and we are in error, no amount of vituperation can change the fact. It cannot be denied that the christians have an aspiring element in the fleshly nature which sometimes tense them to strive for the mastery. This element is sly and deceptive and needs to be closely watched. He that thinks he stands is admonish to take heed lest he should fall. It is not wise for the most proficient in gifted in the knowledge of the truth to flatter himself that he knows all that is worth knowing, or that wisdom will die with him. The Lord's people while here below our pupils in the school of Christ, and all of Zion's children shall be taught of the Lord, and are now being taught of God; but none of them have as yet learned all that is to be known of God and of the things of his spirit, nor can the obtained that state until that which is in part shall be done away, then shall we know even as we are known and see as we are seen. To accomplish this the cap spirit is given with the promise that he shall lead the disciples of Christ into all truth.

We would by no means overlook or underrate the admonitions so often repeated in the New Testament to "Stand fast and the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free," and two contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints, and as witnesses for God and truth to boldly and fearlessly "Speak that we do know, and testified that we have seen;" but in fighting the good fight faith, we must observe the apostle's instruction to Timothy, "If a man strive for the masteries, yet he is not crowned except he strive lawfully," bill And in the striving lawfully, he says, " Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. But shun profane in vain babblings; for they will increase unto more ungodliness, and their word will eat as doth a canker;" &c. "If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work." "But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they gender strife. And the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient; in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth, and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who were taken captive by him at his will." – 2 Tim. ii. 15-26.

Is it not to be feared that many are lured into the snare of Satan and captivated by him, by an intemperate zeal in what they are tempted to believe is a commendable contention for the truth, forgetful that the truth is to be spoken in love, and instruction to the erring in meekness, and that the truth itself may be held, or contended for in unrighteousness? How important it is that we try the spirits by which we as well as others are actuated, whether they be of God. The dear disciples of the Lamb once felt resentful, and asked permission to pray for fire to punish those who had treated the Lord with indignity, that Jesus rebuke them, and said, “Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men’s lives, but to save them.” – Luke ix. 54, 56.

The ministers of Christ and all the saints are bound by their allegiance to their King to oppose error in all its multiform phases, whether it be found in themselves, their brethren, or in the common enemies of the cross of Christ. But while we oppose error by the exhibition of truth, we should beware lest we allow our fleshly passions to predominate, and betray us into a frame of self confidence or vain glorying. We should not forget the example of Michael the Archangel, who Wen contending with the devil, and disputing about the body of Moses, instead of bringing against him a railing accusation, said, The Lord rebuke thee. – Jude 9. We are not to avenge a ourselves, for it is written, “Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.” – Rom. xii. 19.

It is not for the saints of God to fret because of the evil doers, it is the natural course of all the children of Adam, since sin into the world, every imagination of the thoughts of their heart is only evil continually. This is no less power own condition by nature than it is of those who live and die in their sins, and if we have been washed from our pollution in the cleansing blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, quickened and born of his spirit, and as a fruit of that spirit made to know and love the truth, we have no cause for boasting, for we know that it is God who is made us to differ thus from the most hardened and depraved of mankind. “What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction," does this a four day ground for those to whom he has made known, as vessels of his mercy whom he had afore prepared unto glory, to exult or to be envious against those who seem to prosper in their abominations? The spirit of God in our hearts will humble us under his mighty hand, and teach us to commit our way unto the Lord, and trust in him at all times and under all circumstances, and to say, with the poet,

"It was all of his grace we were brought to obey,
While others were suffered to go
The road which by nature we chose as our way,
Which leads to the regions of woe.

Then give all the glory to his holy name,
To him all the glory belongs;
Be ours the high joy he still to sound forth his fame,
In crown him in each of our songs."

PSALM XXXVII. 1.

“Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.”

There is an element in the earthly nature of mankind to fret and feel indignant when our own peculiar views are ignored or even criticized by others, and although it is as impossible for all to think and believe like as it is for all to look alike, and although the convictions of our minds are involuntary and beyond our control, still, we are prone to become provoked at, and impatient with those who differ in their judgment and conclusions, from what seems clear and fully demonstrated to our minds. This element or propensity of our nature is generally perceptible among all classes of the human race, to a greater or less degree, in regard to their favorite or long cherished traditions. In regard to things of this world, statesman will differ in politics, and Physicians on medical science, and all classes will dispute and sometimes abuse those who cross their tracks or fail to agree with their favorite theories. But by far the greatest sensitiveness and the least forbearance, and the most fearful persecutions that have ever crimsoned the earth with human gore, have been produced by conflicting sentiments on religious subjects. From the days of Cain the intolerant spirit of religious bigotry has marked and stained all the pages of history. The wicked and murderous spirit of Cain was of Satan. Cain was an active religionists; but his religion was not acceptable unto God. His offering was of the fruits of the earth, and of the labors of his own hands, unauthorized by divine command, and unaccompanied by that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit, and the gift of God, without which it is not possible to please God.

The spirit of God which rules in the hearts of all who worship God in spirit and in truth, is the very opposite of that spirit which works and the children of disobedience, and which has in all ages characterized the religion of the world. The Spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him, dwells in all who are born of the Spirit, and so far as they are controlled by it they manifest the meekness of him who when he was reviled, reproached, persecuted, mocked and even crucified, reviled not again. Jesus said to those who labor and are heavy laden, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lonely inn heart: for ye shall find rest unto your souls." – Matt. xi. 29. "But the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast of mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." – Isa. lvii. 20, 21. How wide the contrast between those who cannot rest, for whom there is no rest, and those of whom it is written, "Great peace have they which love by law; and nothing shall offend them." – Psa. cxix. 165. The spirit of meekness and humility which is born from above, cannot fail to love that law which God has written in the heart of all his covenant people, because it is the law of the spirit of life which is in Christ Jesus, and he dwells in them as the hope of glory, and is fulfilled by his love which she has shed abroad in them; abiding in him they abiding love, for God is love. – John iv. 16.

Now, although everyone who was born of God is a recipient of his spirit, and in that spirit have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, still they are while here in flesh, be set with many trials and temptations, being still in an earthly tabernacle of flesh, which is born of the flesh, and which retains its opposition to the spirit of holiness, and still requires to be vigilantly watched, denied, kept under and crucified. If this were not so, why are the saints admonish to fret not, to be not envious at the prosperity of the wicked? Surely we can not believe that any spirit which is given us from above can require to be denied, resisted or crucified. But, if our experience is in harmony with that of Paul, we shall find, (and without much searching) another law, spirit, or predominating propensity in our members warring against the law of our mind, bringing us into captivity to the law of sin which is in our members. With their mind, those who have the mind of Christ, serve the law of God, while with their flesh they serve the law of sin.

It is on account of these conflicting elements of different parentage and birth, which are found in all who are born of the flesh and also born of God, that they are so frequently and constantly admonished to put off the old man with his affections and lusts, and to put on the new men which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. "For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the spirit of God dwell in you. Now, if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness." – Rom. viii. 6-10. The indwelling of Christ has not changed our body from sin to righteousness, nor from death in Adam, to life in Christ, for the body is still dead because of sin, although the spirit which is given us is life because of righteousness. The same mortality, depravity and sin that we inherit from Adam in our mortal bodies, still remains until our change shall come. Therefore, "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die;" for the body is "the body of this death." "But if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live;" for the spirit is life because of righteousness. "But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by [or because of,

as in the margin] his spirit that dwelleth in you." – Rom. viii. 11. The distinction between the two elements or natures of which every christian is composed while waiting for their change to come, is clearly and unmistakably demonstrated by the inspired record of eternal truth. The body is mortal, a body of death, held in bonds of corruption until mortality shall be swallowed up of life, and death in victory. It is cheering to be assured that the same spirit that raised up the crucified body of our Lord from the dead shall also, or in like manner, quicken our mortal bodies, change and fashion them like his glorious body, and deliver them from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. As Jesus our Lord, in his resurrection from the dead by the glory of the Father, is the first begotten from the dead, and the first-born among many brethren, even so the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has begotten all his chosen generation to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, two and inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are capped by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed at the last time. 1 Peter i. 2-5; Col. i. 15 and 18; Rom. viii. 29.

But to return to the admonition, "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity. For they shall soon be cut down like grass and weather as the green herb." The saints are exhorted to commit their way unto the Lord, and trust in him. In patient submission to bear all the trials, afflictions, reproaches and persecutions that God in his infinite wisdom in goodness sees good to call us to encounter while here in the flesh, knowing as we do that he is able to sustain us while in the conflict, and deliver us as soon as shall be for our good and his glory.

Above all things, why should we being grew with those who differ with us in their religious convictions? They do not, they cannot differ more widely from our views on religious subjects then we differ from them in their views. If we're right and they're wrong, we surely have the best of it, and much greater reason for humility and gratitude to God for the gift of greater light. Is it not to be feared that many are lured into the snare of Satan and captivated by him, by an intemperate zeal in what they are tempted to believe is a commendable contention for the truth, forgetful that the truth is to be spoken in love, and

This is no less power own condition by nature than it is of those who live and die in their sins, and if we have been washed from our pollution in the cleansing blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, quickened and born of his spirit, and as a fruit of that spirit made to know and love the truth, we have no cause for boasting, for we know that it is God who is made us to differ thus from the most hardened and depraved of mankind. “What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction," does this a four day ground for those to whom he has made known, as vessels of his mercy whom he had afore prepared unto glory, to exult or to be envious against those who seem to prosper in their abominations? The spirit of God in our hearts will humble us under his mighty hand, and teach us to commit our way unto the Lord, and trust in him at all times and under all circumstances, and to say, with the poet,

"It was all of his grace we were brought to obey,
While others were suffered to go
The road which by nature we chose as our way,
Which leads to the regions of woe.

Then give all the glory to his holy name,
To him all the glory belongs;
Be ours the high joy he still to sound forth his fame,
In crown him in each of our songs."

PSALMS 42:5

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him, for the help of his countenance." Psa. 42:5.

The inspired Psalmist and sweet singer of Israel, like all the children of God, was subject to seasons of great depression of spirit. There were times with him, as with us, when he could attune his harp to strains of joy and gladness - when he could sing, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee." His mountain stood so firmly at times that he felt assured that he should never be moved. But when the presence of his God was withheld he was in trouble. Then in the plaintive notes of this Psalm he was reduced to great distress, and many tears. Though elevated to the regal honors of a throne, with thousands of waiting attendants to execute his orders, with wealth at his command, he could not be happy without the manifest presence of the Lord. His case was like the panting hart in the desert, panting for the water brooks - and famishing with thirst; so did his soul pant after God. Observe the striking figure. The panting hart has but one object in view; he must drink or die. Nothing but water will meet the necessity of his case. And it is even thus with the Christian. He says, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none on earth that I desire beside thee." How intense must be the desire of the child of God, when constrained to cry out, "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God. My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?" As though to aggravate the woe of the disconsolate saints, the enemy seems ever ready to tauntingly sneer at them. And how keenly is the tempter's malice felt when he suggests to the troubled soul that his confidence in God is misplaced; that God will not deliver, that he will not listen to their prayer - is unmoved by their supplications - that his mercy is clean gone for ever more, and he will no more be gracious. A saint in this condition cannot refrain from praying, though he may not be able to express in words the groanings of his spirit; yet the language of his heart is, When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: for I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy days. The remembrance of former joys, of social seasons of worship at the house of God, the privileges of the sanctuary, cause the tears to flow the more freely.

"We wept when we remembered Zion."
"Where my best friends, my kindred dwell, Where God, my Savior reigns."

But Satan avaunt! My faith revives; a ray of light breaks in; my fainting heart lays hold of hope, and listens to the words of faith. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Why art thou disquieted within me? Perhaps the soul responds, How can I be cheerful under such trying circumstances. My Savior's face is hidden from my view. I am thirsting, panting, fainting to behold the light of his countenance. I am sorely tempted and fear that I shall enjoy his presence no more; I have sought him, but I could not find him. I called him, but he gave me no answer. Oh that I knew where I might find him; but I am driven almost to despair. I have poured out my soul in me, in vain supplication and prayer; my tears have been my food. My days are consumed like smoke, and my bones are burned as an hearth. "My heart is smitten and withered as grass, so that I forget to eat my bread. By reason of the voice of my groaning my bones cleave to my skin. I am like a pelican of the wilderness; and like an owl of the desert. I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the housetop. Mine enemies reproach me all the day; and they that are mad against me are sworn against me: for I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping; because of thine indignation and thy wrath; for thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down." In whom can I now trust; who shall now bear up my hope? "Hope thou in God," says faith, for I shall yet praise him. Notwithstanding all my fears, my doubts, my unbelief, and bitter lamentations I shall yet praise him; but not as the result of any effort of my own, or any help which can come from any other source but God. Hope thou in God, not in man; not in thy self, nor in thy cries, or tears, or prayers, but in God, for he is the Hope of Israel, and the Savior thereof in the time of trouble. He hears thy mourning voice, he knows the sorrows of thy troubled soul, and he has pledged his word that he will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.

"If through the deep waters he calls thee to go,
The rivers of wo shall not thee overflow;
For he will be with thee thy troubles to bless,
And sanctify to thee, thy deepest distress.

When through fiery trials thy pathway shall lie,
His grace all sufficient, shall be thy supply.
The flame shall not bum thee, his only design-- Thy dross to consume, and thy gold to refine."

I shall yet praise him. Well, that is a most blessed assurance; for I had feared that I should no more enjoy that blessed privilege. Surely I can ask no more. I shall yet praise him, not only for his electing love, his boundless goodness, and his saving grace, for the unspeakable gift of his dear Son; for my redemption from sin, death, and hell; for a Savior's righteousness; for my complete justification in his sight; my calling, my new birth - my translation from the power of darkness into the kingdom of his dear Son; but I shall also praise him for the help of his countenance. O what an efficient help to me is his blessed countenance.

"In darkest shades, if he appear,
My dawning is begun;
He is my soul's sweet Morning Star,
And he's my rising Sun."

When his countenance is hidden from my view I sink down in sadness, sorrow, and grief, and there is nothing else can cheer me. But whatever trial, or tribulation I may be involved in, if his beaming countenance be revealed to me, I can rush through a troop, or leap over a wall; yea, though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, if he be with me, and I can see his countenance. I will fear no evil, for his rod and his staff, they comfort me. His countenance is as the sun shineth in his strength. And his brightness is as the light. And God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shines in the hearts of his children to give the light of the glory of God in the face, or countenance of our Lord Jesus Christ. What floods of living light and joy and comfort flow from his as the Sun of Righteousness, with healing in his wings. In his presence, or in the light of his countenance, is fulness of joy, and at his right hand there are pleasures forevermore. Then let me praise him for the help of his countenance, by which I am delivered from the power of darkness, and ushered into his marvelous light.

"I shall yet praise him." O what a change, from the deeps of affliction, from distress, temptation, sorrow, grief, and pain, raised up by the help of his countenance, to mingle my joyful notes of praise, with glorified spirits round his throne.

"He will arise and plead my cause,
Nor will my Lord delay,
Beyond th' appointed hour of grace.
That long expected day."

I shall yet praise him, with the congregation of his saints within the walls of his sanctuary here; but when my voice shall falter in death, and my spirit wing its way up to the paradise of God, I shall see him as he is, and behold his countenance without a veil between--in more heavenly strains shall I praise him, forever.

"There we shall see his face,
And never, never sin;
There from the rivers of his grace,
Drink endless pleasures in."

PSALM 46:10.

“Be still and know that I am God.”

In listening to the excellent discourse of brother William L. Benedict, preached at the funeral of our lamented granddaughter, on the sixteenth ultimo, from the words at the head of this article, the subject was opened with more sublime beauty and awful grandeur than we had ever before discovered in it, although we had on several occasions used the same words as a text; and sometimes with considerable liberty. But when our esteemed brother was enabled to apply its salutary instruction, admonition and consolation more directly to the grief-stricken circle of mourners, in which we were included, there seemed to be a power in the text as issuing from the mouth of God himself; perfectly irresistible, and full of divine majesty.

It is not our intention to repeat the discourse, for we feel incompetent to do so; but simply to record some of the leading presentations to our mind, at the time, and subsequently. Truly, to know God is eternal life; as our Savior has said, “And this is life eternal, that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.” The admonition is therefore clearly addressed to such only as have received the gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The apostle John gives us an infallible criterion, or test, by which every saint may discriminate between the Spirit of truth and the spirit of error. “He that knoweth God, heareth us;” that is, all who know God recognize the high authority of the apostles who are divinely inspired by the Holy Ghost to rule in judgment, upon the twelve thrones of the house of Israel. “He that is not of God, heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth and the spirit of error.” Whatever a man’s profession or his works may be, we have no lawful right to recognize him as a child of God, or to fellowship him as such, if he is not governed and controlled by the authoritative mandates and decisions of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ.

A saving knowledge of the true God cannot be attained by any study or application of the natural mind to the instruction of men. No man can teach his brother, his neighbor or his child, saying, “Know the Lord,” for, “No man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him (Matthew 11:27).”

When the apostle Peter, in behalf of the disciples, declared his and their knowledge of the Father and the Son, Jesus answered and said unto him, “Blessed art thou Simon Barjona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven (Matthew 16:17).” “For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, has shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (II Corinthians 4:6).” Christ is Himself the brightness of His Father’s glory, and the express image of his person (Hebrews 1:3). “Who is the image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature (Colossians 1:15).”

The words of this text imply that a knowledge of God will silence our murmurings, and cause us, like the Psalmist, to say, “I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it (Psalm 39:9).” Or, like Eli, “It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good (I Samuel 3:18).”

All who by experience and revelation know him who is “The true God, and eternal life (I John 5:20)” know he is too wise to err, and too holy and righteous to be unjust; and having this knowledge they can confide in him, and passively accept whatever of good or evil his hand deals out to them (Job 2:10).

Let us consider the awful import of the words "I am God." A Spirit, infinite and eternal, self existent, independent, the Creator and upholder of all things. He is Author and professor of all conceivable and inconceivable perfections. High on his imperial throne; the "High and lofty One inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy." He has created all things for himself, and for whose pleasure alone all things are, and were, created. He doeth his pleasure in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of earth. The septre of whose authority he sways over all beings, all worlds, and all events, with irresistible power, and unerring wisdom and righteousness. His absolute providence and decrees embrace the very hairs of our heads, unalterably fixes the number of them, and makes it perfectly impossible that one of them can fall from our head without an order from his throne.

"Life, death and hell, and worlds unknown, Hang on his firm decree.

Nothing exists independently of him, and all things that do exist in heaven, earth or hell, he has caused to exist for his pleasure, and all by his power shall subserve the great purpose for which he has brought them into being. His hand garnished the skies, and laid the foundation of the universe. The sun, moon and stars are the works of his fingers. The earth and seas are his, and he made them.

"God is a King of power unknown,
Firm are the orders of his throne;
If he resolves, who dare oppose,
Or ask him why, or what he does?

He wounds the heart, and he makes whole;
He calms the tempest of the soul;
When he shuts up in long despair,
Who can remove the heavy bar?

He frowns, and darkness veils the moon,
The fainting sun grows dim at noon;
The pillars of heaven's starry roof,
Tremble and start at his reproof.

He gave the vaulted heaven its form,
The crooked serpent and the worm;
He breaks the billows with his breath,
And smites the son of pride to death.

These are a portion of his ways,
But who shall dare describe his face?
Who can endure his light? or stand
To hear the thunders of his hand?"

"By his Spirit he hath garnished the heavens; his hand hath formed the crooked serpent. Lo, these are parts of his ways: but how little a portion is heard of him? But the thunder of his power who can understand (Job 26: 13,14)."

To know then that God is all this, and infinitely more; that inspired prophets and holy apostles have only been permitted to tell us parts of his ways, while the thunder of his power is yet unexplained to mortals, is calculated to seal up our lips in silence, and fill our hearts with the most profound reverence in his awful presence.

"Earth from afar has heard his fame,
And worms have learnt to lisp his name;
But, O! the glories of his mind,
Leave all our soaring thoughts behind."

To know that the Lord is God is to know, not only in a general, but also in a particular sense, that he is the supreme Ruler of the universe, that in all minute things, as well as in things of greater magnitude, he executes his sovereign will and pleasure, leaving nothing to chance, or uncertainty. The sparrow cleaves the air in the precise track marked by the counsel of God with no less certainty than the blazing sun fills his fixed orbit in the heavens. Poor blind mortals gaze, wonder and are confounded in the contemplation; but God declares the end from the beginning, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.

But we propose to contemplate this profound subject in the connection in which the inspired psalmist has presented it in the psalm in which the text occurs.

"God is our refuge and strength." Can any refuge be so secure, so safe, so perfectly reliable? God who is everywhere present, must surely be a very present help in all our troubles. Pursued by sin, by Satan, by doubts and fears, we find no efficient refuge short of God. He is our Rock, and his wings are spread for our defense, and however weak and trembling in ourselves, God is our Strength. He is the Strength of our life, the Strength of Israel, and we are assured that "the Strength of Israel will not lie." He will not betray our confidence in him, for, "They that trust in him shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever (Psalm 125:1)." "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty (Psalm 91:1)." And the psalmist says, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations....even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God (Psalm 90:1,2)." This assurance of safety and protection is enough to banish our fear. Of what can we be afraid, if he who holds a perfect control of all powers, and influences, is our Refuge? A refugee cannot be unsafe if his refuge be invulnerable; for a refuge must first be stormed and captured before the refugee can be imperiled. And this hope have we, as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us. Sin, death and hell, the world, flesh and devil, doubts, fears and temptations, losses, crosses and bereavements, all may assail the child of God; and yet he can be still, rest confidently, for he knows that his Rock and Refuge is God. "Therefore" says the psalmist, "will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea." What odds, where the earth shall rest, or whether it is dissolved and cease to be? God, not earth, is our refuge and strength, and God cannot be moved nor overcome; and as he is not moved, so neither can his holy city, the holy place of the tabernacles of the most High be moved by any or all of the commotions, or convulsions of the earth: for, "God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved; God shall help her, and that right early." The wicked are like the troubled sea that cannot rest, or be still; because the earth does not know that he is God. Yet, though the waters of the sea roar and be troubled, and the mountains of the earth be shaken with the swellings thereof, the river which proceeds from the throne of God and the Lamb, whose waters of life are clear as crystal, are tranquil in their channel; for, "There the glorious Lord shall be unto us the place of broad rivers and streams; subject to no such turbulence, its peaceful, placid streams make glad the city of God. The Lord their Shepherd leads them beside the still waters. "The heathen [those who do not know that the Lord is God, and therefore cannot rest] raged; the kingdoms were moved." But, "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers [of the earth] take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure (Psalm 2:1-5).” Yet, notwithstanding all their rage, their counsel, their resolutions, their kingly power, and lordly authority, and their united assault upon the bands and cords, by which the church of the living God is bound together and secured in his impregnable fortress, the government of Christ shall tower above their rage and violence; for, “Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion.” The kings of the earth set themselves; but the government of God, in Christ his Anointed, God himself has set. And Christ shall rule them with a rod of iron, and dash them to pieces like a potter’s vessel; so that they can never be reconstructed or put together again. The heathen raged, the kingdoms (or governments) of earth which set themselves against the Lord, and against his anointed, were moved. He who uproots the mountains and casts them into the midst of the sea, removes the established nations and governments of the kings and judges of the earth; “the kingdoms were moved.” How were they moved? We are told. “He uttered his voice, the earth melted.” By the utterance of his voice, the world with all its kingdoms, nations, generations and powers were brought into being, and at the utterance of his voice they melt and pass away. “Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.” “The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our Refuge.” With whom? With those who know that he is God, and who dwell in him: for he will never leave nor forsake them. God is in the midst of her; and she is safe. Do we ask for evidence that God, who is our refuge, is with us, and in our midst, and that he will help us right early? If so, “Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he has made in the earth.” Look at a deluged world in the days of Noah. Where now is Sodom and Gomorrah? What became of the Egyptian army that pursued Israel? Where are the Canaanites? Where is Moab, Babylon, - or any of the nations that opposed the armies of the living God? Can we review the desolations which our God has made in the earth, and doubt that he will, in due time, make wars to cease unto the ends of the earth? His word has gone forth in righteousness, and shall not be recalled; unto him every knee shall bow, and to him every tongue shall swear. All this will be accomplished without our aid; for what can we do to strengthen his hand, or subdue his foes? Yet, "The enemies of the Lord shall be broken to pieces, out of heaven will he thunder upon them." What had Israel to do when confronted by the Red Sea, hemmed in by insurmountable mountains on the right and left, and closely pursued by a mighty army in the rear? "Stand still" was the command, "and see the salvation of God." And even so comes the command of God to his people. "Be still, and know that I am God; I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth."

This whole psalm is replete with striking illustration of the power, wisdom and providence of God; giving testimony of what he is, and what he does in ordering and executing his government over all beings and all events. First his recognition of the exposure of his people to the violence of their adversaries, and the perfect security he has provided for them in himself as their refuge, and their strength. The faith and confidence he inspires them with, in him, to shield them from fear or dismay when his judgments walk the earth, remove the mountains, disturb the seas, and dissolve the world. Then the opening to his people the fountain of joy and salvation, whose ever flowing supplies make glad the city of God, the holy place of his tabernacles. The assurance that God is never absent from Zion; God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved; although the earth be removed and the mountains deposited in the midst of the sea. Her own inability to protect, or to avenge herself shall not imperil her safety at any time, for God will help her, and that right early. In evidence of his power and faithfulness, "Behold what desolations he has made in the earth, and with what ease he can break the bow that is bent, or the spear that is aimed for her annoyance, and what peace he can command for her to the earth's most distant bounds."

Relying on God to do all this for her, she has no occasion to bestir herself, to bend a bow, or raise a spear in self defense; but, knowing that the battle is the Lord's, leave the whole result with him, and simply be still, be calm, be confident; for the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, therefore he that believeth shall not make haste.

We had designed in this article to say something in regard to the manner in which the text was applied to our own mind in relation to the melancholy death of our lamented granddaughter, at whose funeral it was used as a text. In addition to the appropriate application made by our beloved brother, a train of thoughts came forcible to our mind. In the knowledge that the Lord is God, and that we are to be still; to hush every murmuring thought, and leave all with him; we were led to contemplate his inscrutable providence in dealing with the children of men. Who hath made us to differ? Why are some more subject to diseases, physically and mentally, than others? It was not because those Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices were sinner above all the Galileans, that these things were suffered; or those eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell and slew them, were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem, that they were slain; nor was it either he that was born blind, or his parents that were sinners above others, that he was born blind, nor yet was it because the children of Rebecca had done any good or evil, that it was said of them, "the elder shall serve the younger;" as it is written, "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated " David speaks of the wicked who oppress and persecute God's children as God's hand and his sword. Whatever may be their malignant design; they can only go so far as wielded by the power and wisdom of God. They are used by him, as we use our hand or sword, to execute our purpose. So are all the diseases, whether of body or mind, to which men are subject as God's servants. They are employed by him to do his bidding. "Is there evil in the city, and the Lord hath not done it?" "Shall we receive good from the hand of the Lord, and not evil?" The evils are employed by him to chastise his children, or to scourge his enemies, embrace wars, pestilence and famines, together with all the evils that are brought upon us. Our troubles come not up unbidden out of the earth, nor do our afflictions come on us by chance. Some by physical disease are bowed down with pain and infirmity all their days, from the cradle to the tomb. Why is it? What is it? We call it a dispensation of divine providence, and however dark and mysterious to us, we dare not protest; for we know it is by the inscrutable judgment of God; therefore we feel admonished to "Be still and know that he is God." When others are diseased mentally, their reason dethroned, and in their irrational moments they do deeds of violence to themselves or to others, is it less providential? By no means. Insanity, or alienation of reason is as truly a malady, to which our nature is subject, and which comes as directly from the hand of God, as comes the cholera, the typhoid, or any other fever, or disease, and the consequences resulting are as fully appointed as all other causes and results are. We cannot perceive that any of the human family ever came to their death by any other than the means appointed. A sparrow cannot fall, nor a hair from our head, without our Heavenly Father. God careth for sparrows as he cares for worlds. Our hairs are all numbered, as are the days of our pilgrimage on earth, so that we cannot pass our bounds. Nor can we by any possible care or foresight of ours add to our stature one cubit, make a hair black or white, or lengthen or diminish from the number of days which God has allotted us upon his footstool. When men die suddenly, human theology says they go unprepared to the bar of God; but divine revelation teaches us that "As many as were ordained to eternal life believed." Jesus says "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out (John 6:37)." No accident, casualty or fortuitous event can interrupt the execution of the counsel of God; and he who falls in death by a thunderbolt, if an heir of salvation, will as certainly reign in glory with Christ, as though he were translated· like Enoch or Elijah; and if not a subject of God's saving grace, would be no nearer to heaven, or likely to be saved if a thousand years were added to his days.

"Plagues and death around us fly,
'Til He bids, we cannot die;
Not a single shaft can hit,
'Til the God of grace sees fit."

God is immutable in his counsel, of one mind, and none can turn him; and it therefore becomes us to "Be still and know that he is God."

PSALM XLVIII. 12.

“Walk about Zion, and go around about her; tell the towers thereof.” – Psalm xlviii. 12.

ZION, or the city of David, was strongly fortified, her walls were calculated to resist a strong invading force, and her towers were ample and imposing. This city has been chosen throughout the writings of the Old and New Testament as a favorite figure of the church of God, the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. The inspired singer of Israel, in the exalted strains of his devotion, as described in this Psalm, was led to contemplate more than the figure; his prophetic eye glanced down the vista of ages, and beheld with rapture the advent, the kingdom, and the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. With the understanding then, that the Zion of our text is the spiritual kingdom of Christ, we will inquire, Who are called upon to survey her walls, and to report the number of her towers? Qualifications of a spiritual kind are indispensible to the performance of this work. Not all the wisdom of men can supercede the necessity of the Spirit’s work; for, “Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.” – John iii. 3; and certainly a man, however wise, learned, or great, who cannot see, must be incompetent to tell or count the towers of Zion. If men by wisdom could know God, or if by education, or indefatigable research could learn the invincibility of the bulwarks of the church of God, they would never venture an assault upon her; but God in wisdom has hidden it from their powers of perception, that they may exhaust all their energies in fruitless warfare, for not one of her stakes shall ever be removed, nor one of her cords ever be broken. Souls that are born again, redeemed, and brought with singing to Zion, alone are blessed with the privilege of “Walking round Zion.” The idea in the text of walking round Zion, is not to gratify an idle curiosity, but to prepare the peculiarly favored beholders to make their report to the generation to come, and to fill the soul with confidence in God, that he is abundantly able to keep that which they have committed to him, against that day.

But let us consider what it is to walk around the Zion of our God. Her location, the Psalmist informs us, is in the mountain of the holiness of God, beautiful for situation! The joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north; the city of the great King; and God is known in her palaces for a refuge. Can we then circumambulate her walls so as to see her strength, and tell her towers, and yet remain ignorant of the “Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty,” in whose holiness she is immutably and eternally established? Fearful emblems of divine Majesty were displayed in giving the preceptive covenant to carnal Israel from the top of Sinai; but they who count the towers of Zion are not come to the mountain that might be touched. No peals of thunder shake the walls of Zion ; no streaming lightnings bear God’s vengeance down to those who dwell within her sacred walls. No gloom of darkness, tempest, fire nor smoke sullies the beauty of her situation. But those who find her gates, come to the city of the living God, to the heavenly Jerusalem, to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the First Born, which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant; and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel.

To this Mount, to this heavenly vision of peace, they come, because they are the redeemed of the Lord, and God has said they shall come with songs and everlasting joy. The great trumpet is blown, amid they shall come which were ready to perish, &c., and shall worship God at his holy mount at Jerusalem. Nothing is more certain than that we must come to this Zion before we can walk around it; and as coming to Zion is coming to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, no man can come except the Father who sent Jesus into the world, draw him, and he will raise him up at the last day. But, all that the Father gave him, shall come unto him, and shall in no case be cast out.

Reader, have you come to Zion? If you have, you know and you are willing to confess that the Father has drawn you there to Christ; and this being your happy condition, it is your privilege to take the walk proposed in the text.

"Go around about her." This is no place for idleness; it is true your going around her is not to add to her strength, nor safety, for that is not necessary, nor is it possible, for "Her walls are strength, and at her gates

A guard of heavenly warriors waits,
Nor shall her firm foundations move,
Fix'd on his counsel and his love."

But this privilege contemplates your improvement, your instruction, and your comfort, as well as your blessed employment. Go round about her. You have not yet seen all that there is to be learned; you may have seen or had some faint view of the strait gate, by which you entered this city, but have you observed the closed gate that looketh towards the east, by which the Lord God of Israel hath entered, and can you report with accuracy the dimensions of the south, the north, and the west gates? See Ezekiel xliv., To perform this delightful walk like the prophet Ezekiel, you will require to have a guide; you cannot perform it alone. But if that guide which Jesus promised, takes you in charge, he shall guide you into all truth; and then you will walk and not faint. This walk, if we mistake not, will occupy the whole pilgrimage of the saints of the Lord, from the moment of their translation from darkness to light, until they behold the consummation of the glory of the church in unclouded glory and uninterrupted bliss.

“Tell the towers thereof.” The Lord’s name is one of them, and it is invincible. At this tower, every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess. Yea, it is a strong tower, into which the righteous flee and find safety. But the Psalmist uses the plural number. “Tell the towers thereof.” To tell, is to count. Now let us see if we can count the towers of strength and safety which God has provided for his saints. God’s thoughts are but another name for his purpose or his counsel, and David has said, If I should count them they are more than the hairs of my head. Every new covenant promise is a tower of strength to the children of God. The spiritual bond that serves as a connecting link or neck which unites Christ the head, and Zion the body, is as the tower of David which was builded for an armory, where on there hang a thousand blicklers, all shields of mighty men. Predestination, election, effectual calling, preservation in grace to glory, resurrection and eternal glory, are well known towers to the tried saints. Often have they been chased into them by their arminian natures, and by their arminian devils too; but they have always found them impregnable. Standing in this doctrine, the darts of the enemy cease to be hurled at us; for the enemy hates the doctrine with more deadly hate than that with which he hates us, and all his arrows are wasted in vain attempts to batter down our towers, and finding them invulnerable, their poisoned arrows fall harmlessly at our feet.

The idea of fortifications, forts, towers, &c., clearly implies the present militant state of the church of the living God, the holy city, whose dimensions are eighteen thousand measures, and the name of which from that day shall be, “The Lord is there.” Now she has enemies to encounter, battles to fight, Agags to hew in pieces, persecutions, reproaches and sore conflicts to endure; but the God of Jeshurun rideth upon the heavens in her help, and in his excellency on the sky! The eternal God is her refuge, and underneath her are the everlasting arms.

PSALM 84:11.

“For the Lord God is a sun and shield; the Lord will give grace and glory; no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.” Psalm 84:11.

In our recent visit to Virginia, while mingling with the churches and brethren of the late pastoral charge of our lamented brother Leachman, we were informed that the above text was the last he ever preached from publicly, and as they desired to cherish the recollection of his last discourse, we were requested to make the same text the theme of an editorial article. Not having heard his discourse, nor even been informed of how he was led to discourse upon it, we cannot attempt to reproduce his sermon, nor do we claim a gift comparing with the ability of our dear departed brother to write or speak on this or any other subject; yet, from the perfect harmony which has been known to exist between us, from the time of his entering the ministry until he finished his course, we are confident that however far we may fail to come up to the manner and ability with which he presented his views, we shall not differ in any important respect in regard to the doctrine expressed in the text.

A careful examination of this excellent psalm shows the inspired psalmist contemplating with admiration the amiability of the tabernacles of the Lord of hosts, and longing and fainting with desire for the enjoyment of the courts of the house of God, and at a time of sad declension, when the deserted altars of the Lord were used by the sparrows as a place to make their nests and rear their young. How desolate must be the house of God, when deserted by the true worshipers, and so unfrequented by the people of God as to be left for the timid sparrows to use even the altars of the God of Israel as a sequestered place for their exclusive use.

Well might the psalmist long and faint for a restoration of the enjoyment of the privileges of the deserted house and altars of the Lord, and sadly contemplate the blessedness of an abode in that consecrated place, and of the man whose strength is in the sacred precincts of the house of God, and in whose heart are the ways whereof; "For," he says, "a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

"For the Lord God is a sun and shield." This is given as a good and sufficient reason of the preference expressed in the preceding verse, for one day within the courts of the Lord, rather than a thousand in the tents of wickedness. A sun and shield signify light and protection, which is found in the amiable tabernacles of the Lord, but cannot be enjoyed in the tents of wickedness. This consideration, together with the blessed assurance, "The Lord will give grace and glory; no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly," draws forth the exclamation, "O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee." Let us contemplate the text in the beautiful order in which it is recorded.

THE LORD GOD, in striking contrast with the lords many and gods many which are revered by the idolatrous nations of the earth. "Thou whose name alone is JEHOVAH, art the Most High over all the earth." Psalm 83:18. Self-existent, independent, and in all things supremely great and glorious. As Lord, he holds dominion over all beings, all worlds and all events, and as God the only object of worship in heaven or in earth. As the Lord God he will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images. He is called in this psalm the Lord of hosts, the living God. O Lord of hosts, my King. Lord God of hosts. His footsteps are in the mighty deep, and his ways are past finding out. To know him is Eternal Life. Inspired prophets and holy men have declared what he is in his revelation to his own chosen and peculiar people. The psalmist testifies, he is a refuge and strength to his people, and a very present help in trouble. “He standeth in the congregation of the mighty; he judgeth among the gods.”

But we propose to consider what he is as set forth in the unequivocal testimony of our text. And first, he is the Lord God, and as such he is a Sun and Shield. These figures are beautifully illustrative of what the Lord God is to his people, as revealed in the person of his dear Son, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, “Who being the brightness of his Father’s glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high.” Hebrews 1:3. “For the Lord God is a sun.” However sublime and beautiful this figure may appear when applied to God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, whose awful radiance and refulgent glory fills all heaven with dazzling brightness, we know that it is applied also by the Holy Spirit to Christ, and presents him in his Mediatonal glory, as the source, fountain and fullness of light, life and immortality to the church which is illuminated only by the brightness of his glory. Of him the prophets wrote as the Sun of Righteousness that should arise with healing in his wings, on them that fear him.

In the sacred record which God has given of his Son, we are first informed of his eternal power and Godhead. “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men.” John 1:1-4. In this record we have the testimony that Christ, whose name is called “THE WORD OF GOD,” was with God, and was God, and that in his advent, “The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us.” And still further, that the life which was and is in him is the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Spiritual life and spiritual light are identical. And as all the life and immortality of the church is in Christ, He "is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see; to whom be honor and power everlasting, Amen." I Timothy 6:15,16. How beautiful the emblem. The Eternal Father is "the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning." And as Christ and the Father are One, and all the fullness of the Godhead dwells in Christ bodily, so embodied in Christ is all the immortality and refulgent light of eternity, even as the light which shines from the natural sun is embodied in the sun which enlightens the natural world. Our Lord Jesus Christ, in his supreme glory as one with the Eternal Father, is to his church the source, center and fountain of all her spiritual vitality and refulgence. Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. And in prediction of his coming it was said to her, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. This light is marvelous, as witnessed by all who are delivered from the power of darkness and translated into it. "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." The church of Christ, as a city set upon a hill, whose light cannot be hid, has no other light than that which is given her in Christ. John in his vision of her glory says, "And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it." That is of the natural sun and moon, or lights of nature or of art. "For the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." "And there shall be no light there, and they need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light." Revelation 21:23, and 22:5. "Having the glory of God, and her light was like a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal." Revelation 21:11. This living light is the glory of God, for it originates in and emanates from him, and is the light of immortality. It is brought to light by him who hath abolished death, and brought immortality to light through the gospel. All who have it have eternal life, for it is eternal life; and all who are destitute of it abide in the darkness of death. All who are born of God are born of light, and are the children of light, for they are the children of God, who is the Father of lights, and the great embodiment of all spiritual light, life and immortality, for our spiritual light and life is hid with Christ in God, and nothing can be more idolatrous than for the children of God to look for light, comfort or animation to any other source. "Behold, all ye that kindle a fire, that compass yourselves with sparks; walk in the light of your fire, and in the sparks that ye have kindled. This shall ye have of my hand; ye shall lie down in sorrow." Isaiah 50:11. To depart from the Lord God, to look for spiritual animation, light or comfort from any other source, or to rely for life and salvation, or for any spiritual blessing on any other than the Lord our God, will certainly subject the children of God to his rod, and from his hand shall they lie down in sorrow. The all-sufficiency of the light and life which the saints have in their God, is implied by the figure. He is a Sun, and the floods of living light from him can no more diminish the fountain than the shining of the natural sun can lessen its fullness of light. The unattainableness of light and immortality from God by any work of ours is also clearly implied in the infinity of space. Who can ascend up into heaven to bring it down? Who can enjoy its flaming radiance, but those on whom its rays unaided descend? Who can see the sun in any other than its own light? All its stores of radiance comes unsought and unaided to the living, who have eyes to see and be benefited by it. All the treasure of the earth cannot buy one additional ray, nor can all the powers of earth enable the dead or the blind to see or know its splendor. All the living who have sight can enjoy a whole sun, without depriving any other of the same privilege. And the same light that enables us to see the good things which surround us, makes manifest to us also the evil. As the light of the knowledge of the glory of God which shines in Jesus' face reveals to us his glory, it also reveals to us the pollution of our own nature. And when our own vileness is seen in the magnitude in which it is presented by the searching light of God, who is our sun, we are made to feel the need of a shield.

Those who have no shield shall cry for rocks and mountains to hide them from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne, and from the presence of the Lamb. Neither rocks nor mountains can afford a refuge for the enemies of the Lord; they shall be broken to pieces, and the Lord shall consume them with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy them with the brightness of his coming. But our God, who is our sun, is also himself our shield, and a perfect place of safety to all his people. As a shield he has not only protected them from judgment and fiery indignation, interposing himself between us and the stern demands of his holy law and eternal justice, receiving in his own body the chastisement of our peace, and the stripes due to our transgressions, but he has so encircled his people within himself that their life is hid in him. He is a wall of fire round about them, and the glory in their midst. The eternal God is their refuge, and underneath them are his everlasting arms. God, who is the sun, has not only shielded his chosen from condemnation and wrath, but he is their shield to protect them from all their enemies. He has been their dwelling place in all generations, even from everlasting to everlasting, so that, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." The psalmist says, "I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge and my fortress; my God; in him will I trust. Surely he will deliver thee from the snare of the fowler and from the noisome pestilence. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust; his truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day, nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee. Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked. Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the most High, thy habitation. There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling." "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet." Psalm 91:2-10, 13.

Nations and armies have exhausted their wisdom in inventing armor to shield them in the day of battle, but their strongest shields have been broken. Horses and chariots are vain things for safety. Anti-christ has entrenched herself with mighty bulwarks, in which her children vainly confide; for God, our shield, has declared that their covenant with death he will annul, and their agreement with hell shall not stand. The overflowing scourge shall sweep away their refuge of lies and the falsehoods under which they have sought for protection. But they that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion that cannot be removed. So invincible and invulnerable is the shield that secures the people of the living God, that the enemy must first overcome the God who is our shield before they can endanger those whom he protects.

"The Lord will give grace and glory." These are connected together by a divine power; both are gifts of God, and none can be the recipient of the one without the certainty of both. As glory cannot reach us except by grace, so neither can grace be given us without the certainty of glory. The will of God is the supreme law, and God is governed in all his works by it alone. He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, and in that will he has inseparably connected grace and glory. The Lord will give grace and glory. "As sin hath reigned unto death, even so shall grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first born among many brethren. More over, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." Romans 8:29,30. This is all of grace; for "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." And God gives it because he will give it; he will give grace and glory. This grace by which we are saved was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began. And it is the grace that bringeth salvation, and teaches those unto whom it is given that denying ungodliness and worldly lust, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world.

Let it never be forgotten by the saints that the grace which secures salvation and immortal glory is the grace of God; it can only come from God, and also that he gives it. If it were offered to men conditionally, however easy the condition, it would not be a gift; for what we bargain for and obtain in consideration of a condition by us performed would be in the nature of a purchase; besides, if grace or salvation were offered conditionally, then its acceptance or rejection would depend not upon the will of God, but on the will of man; whereas the Scriptures not only testify that it is not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. "The Lord will give grace and glory." "He will have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and he will have compassion on whom he will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth." Romans 9:15-18.

“No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.” Those who walk uprightly, in a general sense, are those who walk circumspectly, or who walk up to or according to a right rule. God has not only given his people a perfect rule in his word to walk by, but he has written his law in their hearts, and has also given them the spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive, which spirit shall lead them into all truth. And he himself works in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure. They are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which he has before ordained that they shall walk in them. He has wrought all their works in them, and thus he has not only taken them out of a horrible pit and miry clay, and set them upon a rock, and put a new song in their mouth, but he has also established their goings, and not left it for man that walketh to direct his own steps. He leads them in a way they know not, and in paths which they have not known. “And they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance.” In the inspired Scriptures the man of God is thoroughly furnished to every good work. Walking according to that infallible rule, they walk uprightly.

Again, to walk uprightly is to walk erectly, not like a beast, or serpent, or creeping thing. The church of God is the body of Christ, and Christ is the head of the body, the church, and when the church and her members walk in obedience to him, they exalt him as their head, showing him to be above all; then do they walk uprightly. And as all good things are given them in Christ Jesus, so in their union with, and submission to him, no good thing can be withheld from them. He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for them, how shall he not with him also freely give them all things? It is true the children of God while in the flesh carry about a body of death, which cannot walk uprightly, a carnal or fleshly mind that is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be; that depraved earthly nature always wars against the spirit; its locomotion is always serpentine and never erect. But, “Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.” I John 3:9. And the apostle Paul says, “For I delight in the law of God, after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members.” Romans 7:22,23.

The church of God, as the body of Christ, always walks uprightly. “Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.” I Corinthians 15:50. But in that which is born of the Spirit we find the child of God and heir of all these gracious promises. But we have the assurance that the conflict shall soon be over, and the victory obtained over all that is vile in us, when our God shall change our vile body and fashion it like the glorious body of our risen and glorified Redeemer. This mortal shall then put on immortality, and this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and the saying that is written shall be brought to pass, that death is swallowed up of victory. Then, “Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.” It is only the fleshly nature in the children of God that now disturbs and makes them restless. Faith rests upon the gracious assurance of our text, that no good thing shall be withheld from them that walk uprightly, and the earnest desire of every saint is that he may walk in all things uprightly and worthy of the vocation wherewith he is called.

PSALM 97:1,2

"The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice, let the multitude of isles be glad thereof Clouds and darkness are round about him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne."

"When overwhelmed with grief,
My heart within me dies,
Helpless, and far from all relief,
To heaven I lift mine eyes.

O! lead me to the Rock
That's high above my head;
And make the covert of thy wings,
My shelter and my shade."

Despairing as we must of finding substantial joys or lasting happiness on earth, it is consoling to those who know and love the Lord, when they can turn aside from the perplexing cares and distracting turmoil of earth, and in peaceful seclusion from noise and strife, by faith look up to him who has entered for us within the veil, and contemplate the eternal perfections of our Savior God, who inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy, whose dwelling is also in the humble and contrite hearts of those who fear his name. While strife and bitter hate marks and mars the character of men, the ruthless wars are drenching the earth with rivers of human gore, while brother in fratricidal strife seeks the life-blood of his brother, and while the general clammer of kindred and relatives tax all their energies to darken the dreadful scene around us; what would become of us, if there were no over-ruling hand to curb the deadly violence, and bid the maddening tempest cease to howl?

Often when sweet peace has smiled upon us, and all things have seemed to contribute to our comfort, have we looked forward to the grand and terrible scene, which will assuredly come, when the earth and skies shall pass away - when the sun in the heavens shall be put out and cease to shine, and when death and hell shall deliver up their dead - and in the contemplation, we have felt convinced that there is nothing short of the blessed assurance that the great and glorious God, at whose bidding the uprising nations of the dead shall come forth, who is our Father and our God, could possibly allay the terror of the contemplation.

Having hope in God, which is sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that which is within the veil; - a hope so full of immortality that we can contemplate with joy the corning of the great day, when our God shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, to take vengeance on them that know him not, and to be admired in all who love his appearing, can we not, by the same faith in God, meet the cheerless conflicts of this mortal state, and even amid the dread confusion of war, and the clash of arms, the booming of cannon, and the death-cry of the slaughtered victims of the battlefield, be still and know that Jehovah is God. There are times when the faith of God's people is severely tried, in regard to his supreme control of all events - when the turbulent passions of men seem unrestrained - when the wicked rise and spread themselves like the green bay tree; - when God's holy name is blasphemed, his law transgressed, his truth opposed and derided, his people persecuted, and when the ways of Zion mourn, and doubting, we enquire:

"Is there a God who hears and sees
The things below the skies?"

But with the Psalmist we are at length constrained to acknowledge. "This is my infirmity." Our infirmity and imperfections conceal from us his hand in turning and overturning, and causing the wrath of man to praise him, and in restraining their wrath to such limits as he has wisely appointed. Truly God is his own interpreter, and until he makes known to us his boundless wisdom and power, his ways are past finding out. But still, although our unbelief so often assaults our faith, there is a fixed conviction in our minds, that the Lord God omnipotent doth reign, and this conviction affords us consolation.

The Lord reigneth. Having all wisdom to direct and all power to accomplish, his government is absolute and sovereign, he worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. No higher law can possibly exist in heaven or earth than the will of God. It cannot be improved, for it is perfect and holy in all respects, and all the saints on earth and glorified spirits in heaven pray, "Thy will be done." Not because they doubt that it will be done, but because God's own spirit helpeth our infirmities, and knoweth what is the will of God, and therefore maketh intercession for us, according to his will, with groanings that we cannot utter. That will, though higher than the heavens, and broader than eternity, perfectly comprehends the smallest, as it does the greatest objects that exist. From the vaulted heavens to the deepest earth, and from the mightiest angels to the minutest insect, it directs the destiny of all. The sparrow in its flight - and the numbered hairs upon our heads are all secured in being and in destiny by the will of God. In the execution of his will, the Lord reigneth. Not as some impiously represent, that he attempts to reign, or wants to reign. But with irresistible power and might his purpose stands and he does all his pleasure. He speaks the word, and it stands fast; he commands, and it is done. He is of one mind and none can turn him.

"He looks and ten thousand of angels rejoice,
And myriads wait for his word;
He speaks - and eternity filled with his voice,
Re-echoes the praise of her Lord."

When we contemplate the infinite and eternal perfections of Jehovah, contrasted with the highest attributes or attainments of mortals, to bear the government; we have the greatest reason to reiterate the language of the inspired Psalmist, "Let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of isles be glad thereof." Let them rejoice that the absolute government of events are not left with finite beings. All their powers are limited, and under the providential government of God himself. His prescience can clearly foresee all the events that time can possibly develop, and his wisdom is sufficient to provide for all emergencies. He is capable of holding the end of all things with the beginning. No lapse of ages, or intervening contingencies can becloud his omniscient vision, or hide the smallest particle of creation, or the most trivial circumstance from his view. Possessing all knowledge, all wisdom, and all goodness, how important that he should govern and control all things.

"Chain'd to his throne a volume lies,
With all the fates of men;
With every angel's size and form,
Drawn by the eternal pen.

His Providence unfolds the Book,
And makes his counsel known;
Each opening leaf, and every stroke,
Fulfills some deep design."

We are filled with amazement while we trace his government in nature. The heavens declare his glory, and the firmament his handy work. The regularity in which each heavenly body moves is in obedience to his decrees. Seed time and harvest, winters and summers, days and nights, respond with the most exact precision to the orders of his throne. And can we doubt that in the history of mankind - their rise and fall - their present and future destiny - are bounded by his all-wise decree? We can no more doubt his providential supervision of all the affairs of men and angels, than we can doubt his very existence. And we know that he exists, because we exist; and we could have no existence if he did not exist. And it is equally clear that he reigns, as it is that he exists; for no power inferior to that which created the universe could possibly sustain it one moment, and in this also we have cause for joy and gratitude.

Early as the entrance of sin, and the fall of man, was a Savior promised - and how could a promise be made, requiring four thousand of years for its fulfillment, with any degree of certainty, if he who made the promise had not a full control of all the events which were necessary for its fulfillment? Or how could he "Declare the end from the beginning, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure," if he did not hold the reigns of universal government in his own almighty grasp?

But while we are constrained to confess the power and absolute government of God - we have also to acknowledge our utter inability to comprehend his universal government. His footsteps are in the mighty deep; and his ways are past finding out. High as the heavens are raised above the earth, so are God's ways and thoughts higher than the ways and thoughts of men - for

"Clouds and darkness are round about him."

Our vision is too weak and feeble to gaze upon the unveiled glory of the eternal God. Look we, which way we may, the impenetrable cloud conceals the dazzling splendor of his glory; or we should be consumed. He keepeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it. Before, behind, on his right hand and on his left, the intervening cloud conceals from human sight the insufferable splendor of his eternal throne. O, where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, "For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent." Yet, notwithstanding the impenetrable darkness which hides his person and his government from human scrutiny, the faith of the Son of God, implanted in his quickened saints, is permitted to view the bow which God has, by his spirit, disclosed upon that cloud. And the darker the cloud appears to our natural vision, the brighter does the bow present its living beauties to our faith, giving us the most joyful assurance that "Righteousness and Judgment are the habitation of his throne."

The depravity of our nature inclines us to question the righteousness of the divine government, because from our eyes the cloud conceals the wisdom, majesty and holiness of God. But while the infidelity of our fallen nature doubts and disputes the righteousness of divine government; and we murmur, complain, find fault, and rebel; the assurance is unmistakably given that righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. His throne signifies his power and dominion, and that power and dominion is founded in righteousness and judgment, and therefore can never depart from the immutable principles of righteousness, however dark and mysterious his government may seem to our reason. Sometimes we are subjected to trials which seem to us to bear no impress of the judgment, or decree of God, and we are perhaps. inclined to attribute them to chance, or to some cause over which the throne of God bears no control; but however wrongly we may judge, all that concerns us for time or eternity must be controlled by the righteousness and judgment in which the eternal throne of God is founded.

When smiling mercy bestrews our pathway with every desirable blessing, the throne from which our mercies proceed is to our eyes involved in darkness, and we enquire, "How can God bestow such mercies upon us consistently with his eternal perfections, when we are so very sinful, ungrateful, and undeserving? Again when he recalls these mercies, our gourds are blasted, our comforts dashed, our dearest treasures torn from our fond embrace, the darkness of his cloud hides from our view the gracious hand of our kind and covenant God, and again we cry out in amazement: Lord why is this

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his works in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain."

PSALM 110:4

"The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent. Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek."

The inspired writer to the Hebrews calls attention to the important fact that all the priests of the Levitical order were made priests without an oath; but the priesthood of the Son of God being an infinitely higher order, the superior dignity and everlasting perpetuity of his office is expressed in the awful solemnity of his induction: "But this with an oath by him that said unto him, ..Thou art a priest for ever," etc., and the apostle adds, "By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament." Regarding then the oath of God in establishing the permanent and everlasting priesthood of the Lord Jesus, as designed to mark the wide disparity between him and Aaron, his suretyship from that of the sons of Levi, and the superiority of the testament or covenant, of which he is the surety, above that which was made with the patriarchs, the subject is peculiarly interesting to all the saints who are vitally interested in that suretyship. The psalmist, inspired with the spirit of prophecy, says, The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent." We can conceive of nothing in all the record of divine revelation so solemn, so sacred, or so full of consolation to the heirs of immortality, as the oath of God. God, who cannot lie, who is immutable, of one mind, and cannot be turned; God, whose word without an oath cannot be doubted without involving the most impious infidelity and blasphemy, has seen cause to swear, on this subject, in confirmation of his word. We can conceive of no reason why he should swear in confirmation of his truth, except that which is given us in Hebrews 6:18, namely, Being willing to show to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, etc. That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." How condescending and how gracious to pledge his holiness for the consolation of his children, and how truly consoling it is to know that the new testament or covenant is better than the Sinai covenant, which could make nothing perfect, which could not give life, which could not make the comers thereunto perfect, could not purge their conscience from dead works, nor qualify them to serve the true God. A better covenant, established on better promises, and secured by a better, and infallible Surety. The former testament or covenant was in the flesh of Israel, and all its promises were conditional, and all the conditions were based on their obedience to its requisitions. The Levitical priesthood, with its teeming altars, its rivers of blood, its numerous victims and oft repeated ceremonies, could secure no permanent or spiritual blessing to the priest or to the people. Neither Aaron nor any of his sons could continue long in the office, by reason of death; and even during the brief period of their official service they had first to offer sacrifices for their own sins, and then for the sins of the people, showing that they were themselves sinners needing to be purged, redeemed and saved by better blood than ever had streamed from their smoking altars. But the great High Priest of our profession is holy, harmless, separate from sinners and higher than the heavens, having no personal sin to expiate, no blemish to unfit him for his sacred position.

"Not Aaron nor Melchisedec
Could claim such high descent as he;
His nature and his names bespeak
His unexampled pedigree.

Descended from the eternal God,
He bears the name of his own Son,
And dressed in human flesh and blood,
He puts his priestly garments on."

It pleased the father that in him all fullness should dwell. All the fullness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily. The whole fullness of the church is in him, for the church is his body, and the fullness of him that filleth all in all. He is full of grace and truth; he is full of righteousness and of all the eternal perfections of Deity; full of life and immortality, possessing the power of an endless life; full of ability to save unto the uttermost all that come unto the Father by him, seeing that he ever liveth to make intercession for them; strong to redeem and mighty to save, having power over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as the Father hath given him; possessing all the power of earth and heaven. How admirably qualified to be the Surety of the new covenant! We have observed that the old covenant of works was conditional, and depended on the obedience of those to whom it was given, but there was no reliable surety, all were bankrupt, and all accursed, for as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse; therefore by the deeds of the law no flesh living can be justified in the sight of God; but the new or better covenant, with its better promises, relies not on the fidelity and personal obedience of the people for its fulfillment, but upon the Surety, upon the High Priest of our profession. Hence in the revelation of this covenant not a condition is found. It is ordered in all things and sure, and it is all our hope and all our salvation. Its emphatic language is the promises of God, all of which are confirmed by his oath, saying, "I will," and Thou shalt."

"The Lord hath sworn." This would seem to be enough; what more can we desire in confirmation of the pledge? But to the assurance: we are told he will not repent. It is not the word, the promise, the oath of a fickle or mutable being who is of one mind today and may be of another mind tomorrow; no change of time or circumstances can alter the purpose and counsel of his will; he is of one mind, and none can turn him. He is the same yesterday, today and forever; he changes not, therefore the sons of Jacob are not consumed. The immutability of God is a heart-cheering consideration to the saints, especially in its application to the priesthood of our divine Redeemer. God has not only sworn, Thou art a priest," but the words of his sacred oath are, Thou art a priest for ever." Never to be changed, dismissed or superseded in the holy office. The sons of Levi were not suffered to continue, by reason of death, but Christ, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. They were made priests by the law of a carnal commandment, but Christ is made a priest by the power of an endless life. Wherefore he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. Thus the power of eternal life, or immortality, is secured in the priesthood of the Son of God, and his priesthood cannot be changed, because he hath an unchangeable priesthood. Furthermore, the oath of the Lord determines irrevocably the order as well as the perpetuity of this priesthood. The Lord has sworn and will not repent, that it is and shall forever be after the order of Melchisedec, and consequently not after the order of Aaron.

Let us consider this order as applicable to the priesthood of Christ.

First. The priesthood of Christ is a royal priesthood. Under the Levitical economy the priesthood was distinct from the reigning power, there was nothing regal or royal in it, but "Behold the man whose name is The Branch: and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord: even he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest upon his throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both." (Zech. 6:12,13) Our Priest is seated on the throne of power, and shall sit and rule upon his throne, and he shall build the temple of the Lord. This is after the order of Melchisedec. "For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God." These titles for our benefit are thus explained: "First being by interpretation, King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace." (Heb. 7:1.2) As the King of righteousness, his government is founded in righteousness, and every perfection of eternal Deity is displayed in all the orders of his throne. While as King of righteousness he demands a perfect conformity to all his laws and institutions, and that all the subjects of his kingdom shall be holy as God is holy, as King of peace, in his priesthood he is able to make them so. By one offering he has perfected forever them that are sanctified; for all his subjects were sanctified, or set apart, by God the Father, preserved in Christ Jesus and called. He has himself made peace by the blood of his cross, having reconciled his people unto God. As King of righteousness, he met the stern demands of the law and justice of God, bore all the penalty due to their transgression, put away their sin by the sacrifice of himself, washed them from all pollution in his own blood, and having freely justified them through the redemption that is in him as their Priest, he calls and quickens them by giving them eternal life, imparts to them his own spirit, writes his law in their hearts and sits upon his throne and rules them by the word of his power. Thus the counsel of peace is between them both, that is, between the Ruler and the Priest, the King of righteousness and the King of peace. His name is Wonderful, Counsellor, The Everlasting Father, The Mighty God, The Prince of Peace. Truly the government is upon his shoulder, and "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even for ever." (Isa. 9:6,7) Well did the apostle say, "For such an high priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, as those high priests, [of the order of Aaron] to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself. For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated for evermore." (Heb. 7:26-28) "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man." (Heb. 8:1,2) After having thus briefly summed up the amount of the testimony of the order of the priesthood of the Messiah, and its superiority over the typical priesthood, having shown its royalty, its power, its righteousness, its majesty and efficiency, he exhorts the saints from all these considerations to appreciate their exalted privileges; "And having a high priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; (for he is faithful that promised); and let us consider one another, to provoke unto love and to good works, not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." And as we would honor Christ in his priestly office, let us be careful that we discard all other priests and offerings to commend us to God, knowing as we do that there is salvation in no other, that there is no other name under heaven given whereby we must be saved.

"To this dear Surety's hand
Will I commit my cause;
He answers and fulfills
His Father's broken laws;
Behold my soul at freedom set!
My Surety paid the dreadful debt.

Jesus, my great High Priest,
Offered his blood and died;
My guilty conscience seeks
No sacrifice beside;
His powerful blood did once atone,
And now it pleads before the throne."

PSALM 122:6-8

“Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions’ sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee.”

In times of war how irrepressibly are our thoughts at times drawn to the contemplation of peace. When in the bitterness of his soul the psalmist cried unto the Lord, saying, “Woe is me that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar! My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace. I am for peace: but when I speak, they are for war.” (Psalms 120:5-7) He said the Lord heard him, and this affords great encouragement to the saints of God to call on the name of the Lord in all their tribulations. The church of God is in a state of conflict, God has chosen her in the furnace of affliction, and he has ordained that in the world she shall have tribulation; but as Christ has overcome the world, in him the saints shall have peace. Therefore David was glad when they said unto him, “Let us go into the house of the Lord. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem. Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together: whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord. For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David.”

“Pray for the peace of Jerusalem.” This admonition to pray for her peace clearly implies, first, that her peace is liable to be interrupted, and second, that God alone can prostrate her enemies, allay her fears and hush to silence every jarring element of strife and disorder, and cause her peace to flow unto her as a river and her tranquillity as the waves of the sea. We may also infer that no treaty that we can make with the enemy, or bulwark we can set up for ourselves, are reliable; that God alone can heal all her maladies, settle all her conflicts and afford her deliverance; and furthermore, we may joyfully infer that the saints in all their conflicts, whether with foes without or foes within, have access unto God, and may come boldly to his throne with their prayers and complaints with a cheerful assurance that he will not send them empty away. We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. There is encouragement to pray for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem again, from the consideration that our prayers are in accordance with the will of God; for he has spoken good concerning her, yea, for glorious things are spoken of the city of our God.

Jerusalem, in the type, was the capital of Israel, her throne of power, her palace of government was there established, there stood her temple, and thither went up her chosen tribes to worship. There stood the altar of the Lord on which all her offerings were made; the ark of God was there, and all their interests centered there. So Jerusalem, which is above, which is free, which is the mother of all who are as Isaac was, the children of the promise, is the city of the great King, and her name is called, “The Lord is there.” God has invested her with thrones of power and palaces of joy. He has there set the King upon his holy hill of Zion; there the King shall reign in righteousness, and his princes shall rule in judgment; there shall Christ our King sit upon the throne of his glory, and with his apostles on the twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. To the thrones, palaces and powers invested in this Jerusalem every heaven-born soul owes his allegiance, and it is high treason against the King eternal for them to acknowledge any other ecclesiastical power, or submit to any other religious dominion, for there the tribes of the Lord go up. They are not permitted to worship at any other shrine or serve at any other altar. The constancy and chastity of the faithful wedded bride to her Husband is unchangeably binding on her with all her citizens. “This people,” saith God, “have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise.” John, in vision, saw her descending from God out of heaven, adorned as a bride prepared for her husband.

To pray earnestly for the peace of Jerusalem, implies an appreciation of her exposure to invasions and assaults from without, and from dissensions, disorders and divisions within. The gates of hell assault her invincible walls, and the powers of darkness vainly attempt to sap her solid foundation. The kings of the earth set themselves, and rulers take counsel against her, the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things, but God has assured her that no weapon formed against her shall prosper, and every tongue that ariseth against her she shall condemn. In the awfully solemn time described by the prophet, when the sinners in Zion are afraid, and fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites, when the heart shall mediate terror, even then the Lord says, “Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities: thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken. But there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams; wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby. For the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king; he will save us.” (Isaiah 33:20-22) Impelled by our fears, alarmed by our foes, and encouraged by the gracious promises presented in the word to our faith, we are constrained to pray for the peace of Jerusalem, and we offer our prayers to Him in whose power and wisdom, goodness and truth we fully confide, to do for her what we feel conscious we cannot do, and with a firm conviction that these aspirations arise from hearts into which God has poured the spirit of grace and supplication. Nor shall we pray in vain, for, “They shall prosper that love thee." How many trembling lambs who bleat around the fold of Christ, how many guilt-stricken, conscious sinners cast their longing eyes towards her precious gates and mentally exclaim, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth, for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house," etc., (Psalms 84:1,2,4) while they feel themselves to be but aliens and foreigners, and dare not indulge the hope that they will ever be permitted to enter her peaceful gates or taste a crumb of her provision which her God has abundantly blessed, every pulsation of their fearful heart responds to the words in the same Psalm: "A day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness," but still feel so utterly unworthy to mingle with the citizens of the new Jerusalem that they despairingly conclude there is no hope for them. But is it possible that any can be thus exercised who do not love Jerusalem? From what other source can such desires arise? Certainly they who do not love Jerusalem can behold no loveliness in her, nor can they feel any other attraction drawing them towards her gates but that of love. If there can be any other attraction than that of love, what is it? It is, it must be, love. Cherish then, fearful, doubting, trembling soul, the hope that God has shed abroad the Saviour's love in thee, and he has promised to prosper thee. Whatever bitter things thou art writing against thyself, this city God has graciously prepared for thee. To all such souls who are ready to take their cross and follow the Lamb, the word of the Lord says unto you, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; wherefore standest thou without?" "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls." They shall prosper that love Jerusalem. Not a single cup of cold water shall be given to one of the least of Christ's disciples that shall not be rewarded.

Prosperity shall not be perhaps, as Job's friends erroneously supposed, in temporal things, as heaping up gold as the stones of the brook, or silver as the mire of the streets, but it shall be a spiritual prosperity, overruling all things for their good and God's glory. This pledge embraces all who love Jerusalem, for all who love her love God who founded her, "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.

"Peace be within thy walls." The walls of Jerusalem not only separate between the citizens and those who are without, but they are intended as a protection to the city which they include. Much is said in the Scriptures of the walls of the city of our God. One prophet proclaims that, "Salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks," and another informs us that God himself is a wall of fire round about Jerusalem, and the glory in her midst, thus at once showing us that God is our salvation. Hence he is called our Refuge, and our Shield. The safety of a city depends upon the strength and invincibility of her fortifications, and so we are taught that nothing can endanger the church so long as God himself retains his power to defend her. Within these impregnable walls a certain class, which are described in the divine record, have a right of citizenship. In Isaiah 26:2, the Maker and Builder of this strong city has given orders, saying, "Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in." While the prophet denominates the citizens of Zion "the righteous nation which keepeth the truth," and Peter calls them a holy nation, John designates them a blessed people, who "do his [Christ's] commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolators, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." From all of which we learn that those who belong to this city are the chosen, redeemed, regenerated and obedient people of God; and all who love this city have a brithright inheritance within her walls, and heartily pray for her peace and prosperity, and say continually, Peace be within thy walls. They not only pray and desire that God may deliver this city from all foreign invasion without, but also preserve peace within her precincts; that her citizens may love and be at peace with each other, love as brethren, and keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; that they may be at peace with God, with one another, and as much as in them lies, live in peace with all men. They desire and pray that they may be enabled to follow after the things that make for peace, and things whereby one may edify another. These peace-loving citizens of Zion are characterized as walking righteously and speaking uprightly, despising the gain of oppression, shaking their hands from holding of bribes, stopping their ears from hearing of blood and shutting their eyes from seeing evil. Such shall dwell on high, their place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks; bread shall be given them, and their waters shall be sure, and their eyes shall see the King in his beauty; they shall behold the land that is very far off. (Isaiah 33:15-18)

“And prosperity within thy palaces.” A palace is the place of the royal family, the home of kings and princes, the place of thrones of power and glory; the church of God, the residence of kings and priests, and the home of those whom our God has taken from the dunghill to set them among princes. “A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary.” Here Jesus reigns, his mediatorial throne is here, and with him, occupying the twelve apostolic thrones, his princes rule in judgment. All the saints desire that the government of Christ may prosper, that upon his own head his crown may flourish, that his horn may be exalted, that as King, Christ may be higher than Agag, and his kingdom higher than the kingdoms of men. Also, they desire that the decisions of the apostles in the judgments which they have recorded on all the laws and ordinances of his church may be duly observed and faithfully obeyed by all the saints, not only for the benefits which each shall derive from the prosperity of the government of the church of God, but for the general benefit of all, collectively.

“For my brethren.” The children of my Father, and of Jerusalem, my mother, these are my kindred and brethren, and for their sakes, as well as my own personally, will I now say, “Peace be within thee.” We expect this peace will be enjoyed in heaven uninterruptedly, by and by, but even now, for my companions sakes, will I pour out my prayer to God that peace may be within the church and kingdom of our divine Lord and Master. Even now, while Zion is compassed about with enemies, while her citizens are here in the flesh, and subject to a militant state. While earth and hell oppose, and she is in conflict with the world, the flesh and Satan, while noise and discord, strife and carnage spread far and wide around her, and while some of our companions have suffered the loss of all things, and some have been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, whose souls are seen under the altar, waiting to be avenged, and waiting for the filling up of the sufferings of those who remain, and are also to be persecuted and slain, even now, for their sakes, will I say, “Peace be within thee.”

“Peace be within this sacred place,
And joy a constant guest,
With holy gifts and heavenly grace,
Be her attendants blest.

My soul shall pray for Zion still,
While life and breath remains;
There my best friends, my kindred dwell,
There God, my Saviour, reigns.”

PSALMS 149:2-6

(Reply to sister R. T. Johnson.)

It is much easier for us to flourish our pen, than to write that which we feel satisfied will edify the saints, and reflect the glory of God, but of this our readers are, or have had opportunity to be, aware. Such views as we have on any portion of the Scriptures, we do not feel at liberty to withhold, when called for.

The inspired writer of this psalm seems with a prophetic eye to look through the vista of intervening ages to the advent of the King of glory to our earth, and the establishment of his kingdom in her gospel organization, as "the congregation of saints," and as the antitypical Israel of our God. Fired with the animating vision he breaks forth in the most flowing strains of heavenly poetry that ever saluted the circumcised ears of redeemed sinners, and calls on them to learn the song and unite in the sacred theme. "Let Israel rejoice in him that made him." Who but Israel can appreciate the glory of a subject so spiritual, so sublime? Not Esau, not Ishamel, nor any of the self-made religionists of that, or of any subsequent age, while infatuated with the notion of their own power to will and to do, for themselves and for the Lord. None but Israel can rejoice in the assurance that they are God's workmanship, that their Maker is their Husband, the Lord of hosts is his name, and their Redeemer the holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth shall he be called. Of none but Israel is it written, "Happy art thou, O Israel! Who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord?" "This people" (saith the Lord) "have I formed for myself they shall show forth my praise." The God of Jeshurun rideth upon the heavens in the help of this people, and in his excellency on the sky; and he has said they shall dwell safely alone, and that they shall not be reckoned with the nations. This people the Lord has created in Christ Jesus, chosen in Christ Jesus, and blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, according as he hath chosen them in him before the foundation of the world, that they should by holy and without blame before him in love. “But now, Thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel: Fear not, for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine; when thou passeth through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee, for I am the Lord thy God, the holy One of Israel, thy Savior. Fear not: for I will be with thee, I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; even every one that is called by my name: for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him.” - Isa. xliii. 1-7. This is Israel, God’s chosen, redeemed and freely justified Israel; let him rejoice in him that made him, that is, in God. And, “Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King.” As their King, he is all they could desire. He reigns in righteousness and his princes rule in judgment. All the glory of the eternal world centres in him, and all heaven is radiant with his refulgent glory. With his sword upon his thigh he rides prosperously; with his bow and with his crown he goeth forth conquering and to conquer. His regal title is written upon his vesture and upon his thigh. The King of kings and the Lord of lords, and his name is called the Word of God. He is the only and blessed potentate, and he only hath immortality dwelling in the light. Who but the children of Zion can be joyful in him? Who else are satisfied with his laws, ordinances, doctrine, examples, precepts and his unlimited dominion over heaven, earth and hell? But he is in a peculiar sense “their King,” the King of the children of Zion.

God has given hm to be Head over all things to his church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all.

"Let the high praises of God be in their mouth." These words imply degrees of praise. God will be honored in all the subjects of his dominion. The wrath of man shall praise him, for he is able to command a revenue of glory from all the subjects of his power and providence. Holy angels that have never sinned do praise him, as a holy retinue once sang in the hearing of the shepherds, Glory to God in the highest, but the highest notes of heaven's exalted anthem can only be sounded by the children of Zion, redeemed by the blood of the Lamb. They shall sing with the Spirit, and with the understanding also, making melody in their hearts unto God; in no low, murmuring, discordant or jarring sounds, but in sweet, exalted strains, as when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy, as when they were heard in the vision of John, Rev. xiv. 2, 3; xv. 3,4; xix. 1-7. The highest notes of their immortal song shall in full chorus swell the words, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Al-mighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints, and all the multitude of the redeemed, as the voice of mighty thunderings, and as the sound of many waters, shall proclaim, The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife has made herself ready." Ah, sister Johnson, if there is any higher praise of God than what is indicated in these passages of the Scripture, its revelation will not probably be made to us until we shall have witnessed the passing away of the earth and skies, the destruction of the last enemy, and the triumphant entrance of all the blood-washed throng into the joys which are reserved in heaven for them who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, which is ready to be revealed at the last time. These mouths which were once full of cursing and bitterness, cleansed by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, shall

"Break forth and extol the Great Ancient of Days, His free and distinguishing grace."

What can now be more appropriate, more pleasant, more delightful to the children of Zion, than to be thus employed?

"Let those refuse to sing,
Who never knew our God,
But favorites of the heavenly King
Should sound their joys abroad."

"But when this lisping, stammering tongue Lies silent in the grave,
Then in a nobler, sweeter song,
We'll sing his power to save."

But not only shall the high praises of God be in their mouth, but, as they are now in an enemy's land, and in a militant state,

Let "a two-edged sword be in their hand." A sword is an implement of war, to be used offensively and defensively, and in ancient warfare the most effective weapon used in close conflict. In skirmishes where the parties were widely apart, bows, arrows and slingstones were used, but when in close engagements the sword was the most reliable of all weapons. If the children of Zion had no enemies to encounter, they would need no armor, but as they are circumstanced while they sojourn in the flesh, they are required to put on the whole armor of God, and, having done all, to stand, not run. They have to fight the good fight of faith, to resist the devil, that he may flee from them, crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, and to confront the world with all its alluring vanities. Their warfare is not carnal, but spiritual, hence they require spiritual, and not carnal weapons; "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood," that is, in a literal sense, or we might need carnal weapons, such as Sharpe's rifles, Saul's armor, or human policy; "but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Hence, while we are required by the example and special command of our great Captain to be kind, courteous and benevolent to all men, even to our bitterest enemies, we are nevertheless to fight manfully and uncompromisingly the good fight, contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. If any of the saints take the sword as a carnal weapon, they shall perish by it. But the sword of the Spirit is what we require. This is called, "The Sword of the Lord and of Gideon." It is quick, or vital, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword. It has a Jerusalem blade, well tempered; and as David said of the sword he had taken from Goliath, "There is no sword like it," so we may in truth say of the sword of the Lord, which Paul says is the word of God, and which completes the armor of God, by him specified at Eph. vi. 13-18. While the high praises of God are so in the mouth of Zion's children, that all their communications are in harmony with the spirit of truth and holiness, the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of the Lord, is in their hand, not merely hanging by their side quietly in its scabbard; it is drawn, and never to be for a moment sheathed until the joyful trump of God shall announce the complete victory over sin, death and hell. Among other peculiarities of the sword which God has put in the hand of his saints, we are told by Paul that it is spiritual, and mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, &c., and in our text it is described as having two edges. It cuts both ways, and is admirably adapted to the christian warfare, as all christians have enemies within as well as without. This weapon cuts off the flesh, that we may be the circumcision that worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh, while at the same time its keen edge is felt by the assaulting foe without. The word of God came to the prophets, saying, Thus saith the Lord, &c. And so the word of God is placed in the hand of the saints, as the most effectual weapon in keeping our body, or fleshly propensities at bay; nothing is so potent in defending the cause of truth and righteousness, as to be able to bring a "Thus saith the Lord" to bear upon those foes without who oppose the doctrine, government and institutions of our divine Commander.

In the context, the psalmist shows why the saints should be equipped.

"To execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people: to bind their kings in chains, and their nobles in fetters of iron; to execute upon them the judgments written. This honor have all the saints. Praise ye the Lord." Israel under the law, in the type, were led in triumph whenever they had a thus saith the Lord to execute upon the heathen nations round about them. Witness the case of Egypt, Amalek, Midian, the Philistines and others, especially the Canaanite, which were driven out of the land, according to the word of the Lord. So spiritual Israel shall execute the vengeance of the Lord, in a spiritual application of the word, upon all the uncircumcised religious organizations which stand in opposition to the truth; as the stone which was taken from the mountain without hands, as typical of the kingdom of Christ, should break in pieces all other kingdoms, and thus execute the vengeance of God on them. As the sword of the Lord was used by Gideon and his little chosen band, in executing the order and vengeance of the Lord upon Midian, so shall the saints triumph over the beast, and his image, and over the number of his name. But the sword is also for the punishment of the people, that is, the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, is put in

"To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron." Such exploits were performed by Israel under the typical dispensation, and under the gospel we wrestle with the kings, or rulers of the darkness of this world, and by the sword of the Spirit we prevail over them, and so bind them with chains, as to despoil them of all their power or influence to annoy us. While their nobles may signify those who are elevated to high-sounding titles, as Reverends and *Divines*promoted and made popular only as the advocates of false doctrine, in allegiance to the prince of the power of the air. How often has one of God's little ones chased a thousand of such nobles, and two put ten thousand to flight. Then truly, This honor have all the saints; "For the Lord takes pleasure in his people; he will beautify the meek with salvation. Let the saints be joyful in glory;" even in this glory, in which they are by the special grace of God distinguished but let them glory only in the Lord. "Let them sing aloud upon their beds." Beds are places of rest, not of toil, and the triumph and joy of the saints is not in their own doings, but when resting upon the sure mercies of their covenant God and Savior, "They shall feed and lie down." And they shall lie down in green pastures, in safety and plenty, with the high praises of God in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand. Their enemies may deride them for lying down, and folding their hands, but it is their privilege, for so he giveth his beloved rest.

QUALIFICATIONS OF A BISHOP.

"BROTHER BEEBE: - As it is no trouble to you to sit down and write, I request you to give your views on the qualifications of a bishop; those named by Paul to Timothy. - 1 Tim. iii. 1-7. I wish you to treat particularly on hospitality, no striker, no novice. Your brother, - CYRUS GOODE."

REPLY: - By the office of a bishop, we understand a pastor, or elder; one whom God has called by his Spirit, and qualified by special gifts, to feed the flock of God, over which the Holy Ghost has made him oversee. The notion that bishops are a superior grade of officers in the house of God, would imply an aristocracy in the kingdom of Christ; and such a notion is but a relic of popery.

Of the indispensable qualifications laid down by apostolic authority, the first is, He must be blameless; by which we understand, he must not be justly culpable, or subject to the censure of the church, while holding the office. We do not understand the apostle that a bishop is to be more holy in his nature than others; but as he is to administer the laws of Jesus to the saints, it is indispensably necessary that he should himself be subject to the same laws.

Second. He must be the husband of one wife. It is generally believed that the true sense of this requisition, only means that he shall have but one wife; we do not feel at liberty to give the text such a loose construction; we would prefer that every bishop should have a wife; and certainly but one.

Third. He must be vigilant. Not like those careless, lazy drones, that the prophet describes, as sleepy dogs, laying down, loving slumber, or, like many in our day, so lilly fingered and delicate that they cannot bear fatigue; they must be vigilant, active, not only in the affairs of Zion, doing what their hands find to do, with their might; but when occasion requires, they are not to be above laboring with their hands, as Paul and others have done.

Fourth. They must be sober. Not jocular, frolicsome, or playful, not liable to become intoxicated with false doctrines, vain philosophy, vainglory, or pride; such imperfections have destroyed the usefulness of thousands. The bishop, should be sober, not frantic, not enthusiastic, but with all gravity and soberness, contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints.

Fifth. Of good behavior. This is to be regulated by apostolic instructions - See verse 15. The behavior of a bishop can only be good when he is governed by the laws of Christ, and when with diligence he is engaged in teaching the saints to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded.

Sixth. Given to hospitality. On this item of the qualification of a bishop, brother Goode desires us to dwell particularly. That which passes off currently at the present day for hospitality, and pure benevolence, is not the kind which we understand the apostle to enjoin on gospel bishops. The most popular bishops of our day, although they would have been called greedy dogs in Isaiah's time, claim an exclusive right to the name, (benevolent) while that description that would lead them who obey the gospel of our Lord, to deal their bread to the hungry, to clothe the naked, minister of their own to the necessities of the afflicted, and to visit and relieve the widow and the fatherless, &c., is not with them a ruling passion, not a predominating propensity of their kind hearts. True, they make many flourishes and pretensions to hospitality; they send swarms of hungry missionaries to eat out the substance of the poor heathens, the Indians, and the Africans; and this to afford the greater facilities to their schemes of polished priestcraft by which they have their wealth at home. They do their alms when they have sounded their trumpet; but not by giving bread to the starving. To the hungry, the starving, the dying, who may be suffering the most severe want, they will give a tract, and then boast of their benevolence.

Many instances might be named; we will mention one or two. One of those bishops, of modern hospitality, in the city of brotherly love, invited a poor blind man to preach in his pulpit; the arrangement was made, the appointment made public, and an overflowing concourse of people came to hear the blind preacher hold forth. At the close of the service, the hospitable bishop arose, and in a most pathetic, whining and sobbing manner, told the assembly that this poor blind preacher was very poor, had a large and helpless family, was in debt, was about to lose a small piece of land, which was all his dependence for the support of his family, wept much and loud, and begged the wealthy to contribute largely. They did so, and the collection amounted, probably, to several hundred dollars; of which the Rev. Mr. K-d handed over to the poor blind man on the next day, (before witnesses) a five dollar bill! and that was all the blind man received of that collection. Was that bishop, who could plead for, weep over, and take up a collection for the poor blind man, given to hospitality? Yes, to modern clerical hospitality; but not to that kind that Paul enjoined.

Another instance in the same city. A certain church having plunged deeply in debt, to build a magnificent temple, in Sansom street, mortgaged the premises for much more than it would sell for; when tired of paying interest on their debt, which, if our memory serves, amounted to from fifty to eighty thousand dollars; dissolved the church, suffered the house to be sold under the Sherff's hammer, and actually bought back the property for about eight or ten thousand dollars; for the new church , formed of the members of the old one. Thus by changing their name, they evaded the obligation to pay their just debts – and now stand rank and file, head and head, with the most extravagant patrons of New School benevolence.

Altogether unlike the above, is that hospitality of which the apostle speaks. The Bishop of a gospel church is fleecesarily called to mingle with the poor of his flock, to visit the afflicted, to weep with those that weep; and if he should be destitute of the principle of hospitality, he is disqualified for the important ground he is to occupy. The bishop's house, too, must be accessible to the poor, as well as others; and if he be penurious, inhospitable, and unkind in his disposition, the cause he stands in the defense of, will be reproached. We have known some instances which might serve to illustrate. One minister, who soars high among the New School order in the city of New York, who having visited and preached for a poor, little flock in the eastern part of this county, declared in the presence of a number of brethren, that he would visit that church no more, because they did not take up a collection for him. Some instances (nearer home) have come to our knowledge, of bishops' refusing to attend funerals, or render like services without pay; and in some of our city churches it is quite common to leave brethren to pay for their horse-keeping at the livery stables, even where wealth and luxury are. This is not gospel hospitality; nor is the hospitality of the bishop or the christian, to be confined to the pale of the church; they are exhorted to "Be careful to entertain strangers; for some have entertained angels unawares." And it is also enjoined on them to "Do good unto all men, as much as in them lieth." If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he be thirsty, give him drink. And this ornament of the christian life, shines with still superior lustre in the servant of the church of God, who holds the sacred office of a bishop.

Seventh. The bishop must be apt to teach. This requisition depends not on any human preparation, or classical training; an aptness to edify the disciples of the school of Christ, is a special gift; and where it is not manifested, the church ought not to set apart to the work of the ministry. Men may be very flowery, fluent, and interesting in their pulpit performances, and yet not apt to teach. Their flocks, fed on moonshine, will be like the Egyptian lean kine; they may set under such preaching for an age, and not be able to guess what are the doctrinal sentiments of their bishop. While others, comparatively unlearned and rude, are divinely qualified to edify, comfort, instruct, and establish the saints.

Eighth. Not given to wine. By this negative description of what a bishop should be, we are not to understand what is now called teetotalism; for in chapter v. verse 23, of this epistle, he exhorts Timothy to use a little wine. We would rather understand the apostle, that a bishop should not be a man given to an immoderate or unbecoming use of wine; while a little may be used by the bishops, for medical or other purposes; yet, when a bishop shows a decided propensity for wine, cannot feel comfortable without his periodical drains, a development of such a propensity is very much against his usefulness. He is to be an ensample to the flock; and if he indulges in an improper use of wine, others are encouraged by his example to follow suit, and perhaps go far beyond the copy.

How unbecoming the character of a christian, and much more so the standing that a bishop should sustain, to manifest a perpetual thirst for intoxicating drinks; so much so, that having such propensities, they are by the divine rule disqualified for the pastoral office. What can be more disgusting to a company of christians, than to see men professing to be commissioned of God to preach the everlasting gospel, coming to them disguised with intoxication? As men of the like description are not to be admitted to the office of bishop, so we infer the duty of the church to withhold their countenance and fellowship from such as fall into such habits, until they can be reclaimed.

Ninth. No striker. A quarrelsome, peevish disposition, ready to break forth unbridled in rioting; or one that would lead its possessor to take it upon himself to avenge him of his adversaries, would destroy all the usefulness of a bishop, that might be in every other respect qualified to hold the office with profit to the house of God.

Tenth. Not greedy of filthy lucre. If a greedy, avaricious disposition to accumulate earthly treasure, disqualifies a man for the work of the christian ministry, how few indeed will be found standing on apostolic ground! What multitudes, when weighed in the balance, are found wanting! In writing to Titus, this apostle tells him of many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, especially they of the circumcision, (or covenant of works) whose mouths must be stopped; who subvert whole houses; teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake. Nor are there less of this description of bishops at the present day, who teach things that have neither precept nor example in the New Testament, for the sake of gain. Who would teach the organization of Missionary Societies, Mite Societies, Cent Societies, and all the long catalogue of humanly devised tricks, if there was no money to be made by such departures from the simplicity of the gospel? As a greedy disposition to accumulate earthly substance will lead bishops to teach unwarrantable doctrines, to the subversion of whole houses, such a disposition is not to be tolerated by the church, in those who profess to be the ministers of Christ. That the ministers of Christ, whom he has called to leave their worldly employment's and serve the church, have a right to expect that their brethren will contribute freely to their support, we are bound to admit; but to leave the peculiar work of their vocation, (the preaching of the word) to form conventions to contrive ways and means to extort from the people all that by hook or by crook they can persuade them to give, betrays the disposition of Isaiah's greedy dogs.

Eleventh. But patient. It was a special charge of our Lord to those primitive heralds of his gospel to take no thought for the morrow, what they should eat or drink, or wherewith they should be clothed; but to leave all this with him who knows that his ministers have need of all these things; and he who clothes the grass with beauty, that paints the lilly with more glory than Solomon possessed, could and would assuredly provide fir them. Patiently it becomes the ministers of Jesus to make it their first business to seek the kingdom (or church) of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto them. Truly, many of God's dear ministers at this day need patience while toiling in the service of the church, while in perhaps too many instances their faithfulness is far from being reciprocated by the kind attention of those on whom that part of the responsibility rests.

Twelfth. Not a brawler. There is a wide difference between brawling and the appropriate work of the bishop; men may make a great noise about religion, raise a tumult, disturb the peace and fellowship of the saints, and yet know nothing of the savor of divine grace. Not such are the called to be bishops of the house of God.

Thirteenth. Not covetous. Covetousness is idolatry, and there is no agreement between the temple of the Lord and an idol. We knew a man sent from a church in New York City to preach to us poor, illiterate country people, of whom it has become proverbial that he always happens to be in great want of whatever he sees. Now such men are extremely troublesome to the churches - men that cannot look upon the property of their brethren without coveting it; and if such men could preach like the old apostle Paul, the churches would not be half so glad to see them come. We had one pass through these parts not many months since, exhorting the sisters to sell their carpets and give the assails to their preachers. Although this man's preaching is, as far as we know of, unexceptionable, his covetousness has kept him in difficulty with the churches, to our knowledge, for the last twenty years. How important then that the ministers of Jesus should look to it lest they indulge in a fretful and impatient covetous disposition.

Fourteenth. One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity. On this point perhaps all the ministers of Christ feel their deficiency, yet it is nevertheless incumbent on them, as far as ability is given, to rule well their own families. They are not required to make christians of their carnal offspring, as that is exclusively the work of the Spirit; but by precept and example exert an influence that shall be felt and respected by their children; for the apostle adds, (in a parenthesis) "If a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God.

Fifteenth. Not a novice; lest, being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil. This text has been used as a kind of hobby, by the New School, in support of Theological Schools, and an educated ministry; but no man ever so used this text but a novice; not the want of these human embellishments, but the possession of them, is what bloats with pride, self-importance and conceit, and brings the delinquent into the condemnation of the devil.

A novice is one that does not understand his business. The business of a bishop is to feed the flock of God, to preach unto them the preaching that the Lord bids him. No human aid or scholastic preparation can qualify a man to occupy the gifts of the Spirit; but to all that are truly qualified for the work, the words of Christ to Simon are applicable. "Blessed art thou; for flesh and blood hath not revealed these things to thee, but my Father which is in heaven." So far is human learning from subduing the pride of the human heart, we have known many young men of at least common modesty when they went to the seminary, came out as straight as an arrow, as stiff as a brick, and as foppish as any dandy we have ever seen. Finally, whatever natural or acquired talents we may possess, every man that is not taught of God, in the old school of Christ, is, in regard to the things of the Spirit, a novice. Although he may be ever learning, he shall never be able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

The sixteenth and last qualification named is in these words: "Moreover, he must have a good report of them which are without, lest he fall into reproach, and the snare of the devil." Those that are without are dogs, sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolators, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie. See Rev. xxii. 13. To have a good report of such characters certainly does not mean that they shall report us as being of their number, for our Lord says, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake." We conclude, then, the good report is that in which the enemy is constrained to admit the propriety of our outward deportment, while raging against the doctrine we hold and that holds us. For example, to be called "antinomians" by the Arminians, to be accused of "turning the world upside down," of bringing "strange things to their ears," &c., while they are unable to point out in our walk and deportment anything that does not comport with sound doctrine.

We submit these views, hastily thrown together as they are, to brother Goode, and to our brethren and readers at large. May the Lord bless his truth to us, and bless us with a knowledge and love of his truth for his name's sake. Amen.

"QUENCH NOT THE SPIRIT."

I THESS. V. 19

A young brother of Mississippi has desired us to give our views on the above text, and as it is a subject which has been much perverted by the enemies of the truth, the minds of some young Christians have been perplexed to know its true meaning. As these words were addressed in admonition to the church of God, they must have a definite and important signification. The Holy Ghost has never inspired the apostles to write in ambiguous terms, nor to enjoin rules or restrictions upon the church of God which are unimportant. The text on which our vies are desired has been claimed by the Arminians as being addressed to the world of mankind in general, and to the unregenerate portion of the fallen race more particularly. They say, God, who is a Spirit, is a desirous of converting all men, and that the Holy Ghost sues for admission into every sinner's heart, knocks at every door, and makes proffers of mercy and grace to all the unconverted, on the simple condition that they accept of the terms and admit the Spirit into their hearts. And they pretend to understand this text as a warning to sinners to quench not the Spirit; that is, the Holy Ghost, which they say is wooing and striving, and endeavoring to gain admission into their hearts.

Such we understand to be in substance, the doctrine and language of all carnal, graceless, work-mongrel professors of Christianity, and during the almost six thousand years in which this blasphemous heresy has been promulgated on earth, the ingenuity of man and the subtlety of Satan has been exerted to the utmost to give the delusion a plausible appearance, and to transform its deformity into a resemblance of truth. The natural mind of men, in their depraved state, being enmity against God, is predisposed to favor the heresy, for they love darkness rather than light, and error rather than truth; hence their susceptibility to the imposition, and the readiness of ungodly men to favor any sentiments which are derogatory to the character and truth of God.

Those, however, who are born of God, and taught by his Spirit, have the witness in themselves that he above described heresy is false, for they are brought to an experimental knowledge of him. "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou has sent." – John xvii. 3. And God has provided in the new covenant, that those with whom this covenant is made, "Shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest." – Heb. viii. 11; Jer. xxxi. 34. "And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of they children." – Isa. liv. 13. Being divinely taught to know God, they have the witness in themselves that he is not a being who can be quenched, baffled, thwarted, or successfully resisted, by any of his creatures in heaven, earth or hell. They know that he does not labor and strive to gain admittance to the sinner's heart, and they know that the sinner has no power to prevent the execution of the will of God. They know that their Savior has power over all flesh to give eternal life to as many as the Father has given him. (John xvii. 2.) And that all that the Father has given him shall come unto him, and they that come to him he will in no wise cast out; and that no man can come unto him, except the Father which sent him draw him; and Christ is pledged to raise up all such at the last day. (John vi. 37, 44.) They know by their own experience, as also by the Scriptures of truth, that all their own efforts at reformation, their resolutions to get religion, &c., were abortive and vain; that they could no more accomplish the work than the Ethiopian can change his complexion, or the leopard his spots. (Jer. xiii. 23.) Their own experimental knowledge of God, and the testimony of his written word, compel the saints to reject the interpretation which will-worshipers and Arminians give to out text, and it is unquestionably much easier for them to detect the absurdity and blasphemy of the heresy of the enemies of the truth on this subject, than to fully comprehend the precise meaning of the admonition, "Quench not the Spirit."

All who are taught of God, know that he is a Spirit, but they also know that he is infinite, eternal, immutable, omnipotent, all-wise, of one mind, and none can turn him, that with him there is no variableness nor shadow of turning, that he doeth his pleasure in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of earth, that none can stay or resist his hand, that he speaks the word and it sands fast, he commands and it is done. And knowing this, they know that he does not stand wooing and beseeching the sinner for permission to do his pleasure, for he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and he hath compassion on whom he will have compassion, and whom he will he hardeneth. (Rom. ix. 15-18.) They cannot, therefore, regard God as a Spirit liable to be quenched, put out or subdued, by saints or sinners, angels or devils. Those admonitions, therefore, which warn the saints against grieving the Spirit whereby they re sealed, and to quench not the Spirit, cannot be so construed as to signify that God is a being subject to passions like us; that he can be grieved and extinguished by his creatures.

Let us then examine carefully and prayerfully, that we may learn what spirit it is that the saints are not to grieve or quench. While we adore and worship that God who is a Spirit, we are to remember that all of God'' manifested children are born of the Spirit of God, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, as that which is born of the flesh is flesh. This spirit which is born of the Spirit is not God, but it is of God, and is called the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. (Eph. iv. 24.) This spirit which is born of the Spirit, being of God, is a holy spirit, and is called the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. (Rom. viii. 15.) It is called the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead. (Rom. viii. 11.) It is called, "the holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption." – Eph. iv. 30. It is distinguished from the Holy Ghost, which is God, as an emanation from God. The Holy Ghost is not said to be born of God – it being God – but the spirit which the saints have received, and whereby they are sealed, is born of God, born of the Spirit, and is spirit and life in all the saints. This spirit which is born of the Spirit, is that by which the saints are sealed, marked, and are distinguished from all other men and women, until "the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." "But if the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." – Rom. viii. 11. "But ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves waiting for the adoption, to wit. The redemption of our body." – Rom. viii. 23. This spirit which is born of the Spirit, which dwells in us, and is called the spiritual man, the new man, the inner man, and which is called the spirit of Christ, the spirit of adoption, and the spirit whereby we are sealed unto the day of redemption, is susceptible of grief, of sorrow, conflict, elevation and depression, which changes, conflicts, depressions and triumphs, are totally inapplicable to God, the eternal Spirit, from whom it proceeds, and of whom it is born.

This spirit, born of God, in the antediluvian saints, was grieved with the abominations which prevailed in their day, and in Noah, it was resisted by the wicked antediluvians, until the flood came and swept them away; was resisted in all the prophets, by the carnal Israelites; in the apostles, by the Jews and Romans; in Stephen, by his murderers, and is still resisted, not only by the unconverted world, but also by the fleshly powers and passions of the saints themselves. Thus Paul himself found a law in his members, warring against the law of his mind, and he assures us that the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other, so that we cannot do the things that we would.

How this holy Spirit of Christ in us can be grieved, and how it is grieved by opposition, reproach, persecution and malice, from foes without, and more especially it is grieved by the inbred corruptions of our own fleshly nature, our doubts, our fears, our short-coming, our wicked thoughts, unholy propensities, ingratitude, sluggishness in the cause of Christ, greediness after the vanities of the world, unreconciliation to God, and the rebellion of our nature against the God we love and adore, all this the christian can sensibly feel, and measurably know, and of how it can be resisted by the world, the flesh and the devil, they are fully aware. But how the admonition of our text, "Quench not the Spirit," is to be understood, still may require some explanation. Let us look to it.

This admonition is connected with many others, and addressed to the brethren exclusively, and cannot without perverting the Scriptures be applied to any but brethren. Thus it is presented by the inspired apostle to the church of the Thessalonians, which are in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ. (1 Thess. i. 1.) "Now we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the week, be patient toward all. See that none render evil for evil unto any; but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves and to all. Rejoice evermore.

Pray without ceasing. In everything give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you. Quench not the Spirit. Despise not prophesyings. Prove all things, hold fast that which is good. Abstain from all appearance of evil. And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you; who also will do it. Brethren, pray for us," &c. – 1 Thess. v. 14-25.

By carefully observing the connection of these exhortations, we perceive that the apostle presents them as the will of God in Christ Jesus, concerning the saints, which are in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ. But how is this the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us? We possess the spirit of Christ. "For if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." – Rom. viii. 9. The law, or will, of God is in the heart, or spirit of Christ, and Christ by his spirit dwells in his saints, therefore we find the New Covenant promise fulfilled in the saints. "I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts." – Heb. viii. 10. This law of the spirit of life, in Christ Jesus, is fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. (Rom. viii. 2,4.) These faithful admonitions, being embraced in the spirit of Christ which he ahs implanted in our hearts, are to be cherished, revered, regarded and obeyed. But while this spirit which embodies them as the will of God concerning his children, is opposed by the fleshly nature and corrupt propensities which are opposed to the law of the spirit of our mind , we are to quench not the spirit, but crucify its opposite, the old man with its affections and lusts, and put on the new man. Or, in other words, to walk after the spirit, and not after the flesh. The flesh and the spirit in the Christian are antagonistic to each other; both cannot at the same time predominate in us. To gratify the one is, on our part, to quench, suppress or repel the other. "For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the spirit, the things of the spirit. For to be carnally minded is death: but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God." – Rom. viii. 5-8. To quench or repress the spirit, in the sense of our text, is to walk after the flesh. Study the inclinations of our carnal and depraved minds, attend to whatever will gratify our fleshly propensities, make our religion conform to our feelings, attend to the things of the spirit only when convenient and agreeable to our fleshly feelings and interests, lose no opportunity to amass the treasures of this world, or to gratify our lust for worldly fame, honor or applause, for the sake of bearing the cross of the dear Redeemer, never offend visitors, nor neglect your worldly interest, to attend on the solemn assemblies of Zion, or to mingle with the despised followers of the Lamb. Do not follow the Master in baptism, or in any of his ordinances, until your carnal mind is satisfied with the hope which God has given you, nor so long as it will subject you to some inconvenience or mortification of the flesh, pay no attention to such brethren as are unruly, or feeble, or weak, render evil for evil, pray only when you feel like it, and consider what you have as your own, without thanksgiving. Pursue this course, and if you do not quench the spirit of Christianity, so far as its comfort and consolation, and benign influence is concerned, we have failed to comprehend the meaning of the text. We appeal to the experience of every saint, for confirmation of the words of the apostle, "to be carnally minded is death." Is it no so? Death to our enjoyments, to our usefulness in the house of God, to ourselves and to all the saints. "And if Christ be in you, the body is dead, because of sin." Bury then yourselves in the body in the affections and lusts thereof, and are you not buried in death? The body is dead. There is no spiritual life in it; therefore, when Christians are looking to find something good, spiritual or comforting in their carnal nature, they are seeking the living among the dead; and they will seek in vain. "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye, through the spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." – Rom. viii. 13.

By dying in this case, we are not to understand that the child of God can possibly lose his immortality, or fail of his inheritance of glory; but of his comfort and living enjoyment of his salvation. He that knows his Master's will and does it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. The Lord has said he would visit the transgressions of his people with the rod, and their iniquities with stripes; but his loving kindness he will not utterly take away from him, nor suffer his faithfulness to fail. May it be our privilege, as the followers of our Redeemer, to put on the new man, to crucify the old man; to walk after the spirit, and not fulfill the lusts of the flesh, to mortify the deeds of the flesh, and quench not the spirit; and may we deny ourselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. To this end let us pray without ceasing, that we may rejoice evermore.

Greatly as we have extended this article, much more might be said on this important subject; for it is certainly no less important that the children of God should walk worthy of their high and holy calling, than that they should hold sound and scriptural views of the doctrine of the gospel.

QUERIES.

ELDER G. BEEBE: – As I feel my weakness, and hope I am ready to receive instruction, I appeal to you as an aged and well-tried brother for your views on the following question, viz: Do the people of God, whom Jesus came to save, sustain or stand in the same relation to God that the children of Adam do to Adam? Please answer through the SIGNS, and oblige your brother in hope of eternal life,

AARON WOOD.
Osceola, Iowa, Nov., 1880.

REPLY. – All the posterity of Adam are his children in a natural, earthly or fleshly relationship, because their natural or earthly life was given them in him, and has descended to them by natural generation.

All the children of the second Adam, which is the Lord from heaven, whom Jesus came to save, are in their spiritual, eternal and immortal life the children of God in Christ, their spiritual Progenitor, having eternal, immortal or spiritual life given to them in Christ before the foundation of the world, which life is made manifest by spiritual generation and the new birth.

QUERIES OF BROTHER PARKS, AND REPLY.

ON HIRELING SHEPHERDS, WASHING FEET, AND RE-BAPTISM.

"1st. We read, John x. 12, 'But he that is an hireling and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming and leaveth the sheep and fleeth; and the wolf catcheth THEM, and scattereth the sheep.' Which does the wolf catch; the hireling or the sheep?
"2d. Is the 'washing of feet,' (see John xiii. 4-18,) to be regarded as an ordinance or example, binding on the Christian church at this day? If so, When and where should it be performed?
"3d. Were the twelve disciples mentioned Acts xix. 1-7, re-baptised?"

REPLY: THE plural pronoun them, in the first of the above queries, cannot refer to an hireling, which is in the singular number; which they stand, in number, &c.; therefore the plain English of the text shows that the sheep are caught by the wolf, in consequence of being deserted and left unprotected in the hour of danger, by the hireling shepherd, that careth not for the flock. This passage of divine instruction, comfort and admonition to the saints, to "Beware of false prophets that should come unto them in sheep's clothing;" hireling shepherds, protectors, &c.; but more immediately in this case, to set forth in the strongest possible manner, the superior qualifications of our Lord, as the chief Shepherd and Bishop of his people; and these are the more strikingly illustrated by the contrast drawn between the selfish mercenary and treacherous motives of an hireling, and the very opposite motives of goodness and love most gloriously developed in the illustrious Shepherd of Israel.

An hireling fleeth, our Lord says, because he is an hireling. Yet how eagerly do thousands at this day labor to represent the blessed Savior as an hireling; as being induced to bestow his pastoral care upon his children in return for a consideration of works, merits, obedience, use of means, or from some cause infinitely short of free, sovereign, discriminating and invincible grace. If our Lord Jesus Christ could be induced to save sinners upon the principle of free will or creature merit, or even for the generosity of a poor hell-deserving sinner in giving his heart to the Lord, would not this doctrine present our Lord as a hireling? For if salvation be of works it is no more of grace, otherwise work is no more work. But how gracious the language of Jesus in this connection! He assures us that he does not bestow his care upon his flock in the hope of thereby becoming the proprietor, but because they are his own – not on account of profit he expects to derive from them; but because "He careth for them," he knows them, he loves them and has laid down his life for them. This scriptural view of the subject gives divine assurance that he who has loved and given his life for them will not leave nor forsake them; he will not leave them to fall from grace and sink to hell at last – "He giveth unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of his hand."

It is true that since the departure of Paul grievous wolves have found their way into the enclosure of the flock: men have crept in unawares, bringing in damnable heresy, &c. These are hirelings who, notwithstanding all their specious pretensions to benevolence, will prove the truth of our Lord’s words, by fleeing from the flock in the time of persecution and when they can no longer feed themselves of the flock.

In regard to the wolf's catching them, the wolf has no occasion to catch the hirelings; for they themselves are wolves in sheep's clothing; but the consequence of the sheeps' being caught by the wolf is that he scattereth them: become alienated in their affections and fellowship from each other. How many examples have we at this day of the entrance of grievous wolves among the churches all around us, and in the Western States! We think brother Parks has himself known instances of the kind; for he informs us in his postscript that the missionaries continue their work of rending and tearing the vine in his vicinity. In every instance, as far as our information extends, where churches of our order had been supplied with hireling watchmen previously to the rage of modern missionism, their hirelings have left the ancient premises of the gospel and fled over to the New School side, and in consequence of their treachery their wolves. By hireling watchmen we mean such only as care not for the flock, and such as preach only so long as they can make the business more lucrative than any other to themselves.

In reply to the second query, in relation to the washing of the saints' feet, we refer brother Parks to an article on that subject, written by brother Trott in reply to brother A. Moore of Tennessee, published in Vol. VII. No. 3, in which, to our mind, the negative is clearly shown, from the fact that the primitive churches when in their official characters occupying the twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes (or gospel church) and having the keys of the kingdom committed to them, with instructions to bind and to loose, and to teach the disciples of Christ to obey all things whatsoever he had enacted. We fully agree with brother T. that the washing of the saints' feet was not instituted to be observed in the church as a church ordinance. But we hold the circumstance referred to by brother P. (John xiii. 4-18) as an example of humility to be copied by all the disciples, at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances.

To the third and last query, "Were the twelve disciples mentioned in Acts xix. 1-7, re- baptized?" we answer, No. The twelve disciples whom Paul met at Ephesus had been baptized probably by Apollus, with or unto John’s baptism: and Paul expounded to them the manner of John’s baptism: that he (John) baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him that was to come, namely, on Christ; and when the people heard this preaching of John they were baptized (by John of course) in the name of the Lord Jesus. This accounted for these disciples’ ignorance of the name of the Holy Ghost, as that sacred name had not been mentioned in the administration of the ordinance by John. Had they been baptized by any of the apostles after the commission to preach the gospel to every creature, &c., baptizing in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; but, as they knew only John’s baptism, they needed that the apostle should give them the instruction contained in the passage under consideration.

Some have mistaken the words, "When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus," to mean that when these twelve disciples had heard what Paul said about John’s baptism, they were re-baptized by Paul: but this cannot be, for at least two good reasons. 1st. Paul’s definition of John’s preaching and baptism would have been vague and incomplete if separated from that clause which was especially designed to show wherein John’s baptism differed from the manner of administration by the apostles, after the ascension of Christ. And 2d. If Paul had re-baptized them he would not have administered the ordinance in the name of the Lord Jesus, as this would have been but a repetition of John’s baptism. As in the baptism by John the name of the Holy Ghost was not mentioned, so neither in the ordinance as administered by the apostles after the day of Pentecost, was the name, Lord Jesus, mentioned.

Again, to have re-baptized these because Apollus had baptized them after the manner of John, would have been to invalidate the baptism not only of these twelve but of all who lived in that day who had been baptized in the same manner; and what would be still more dreadful, it would have been virtually charging our Lord with setting an imperfect example when, being himself baptized of John in Jordan, he said, "Thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness."

QUERIES OF D. EGBERT, AND REPLY.

LAWRENCEBURG, Ky.;
June 16, 1838.

G. BEEBE - Sir: - I read some time last year, in one of your papers, a statement, showing the difference of belief between the Old and New School Baptists; and if I understand the Old School, they contend for the doctrine that God from all eternity, or before the universe, or man was created, did predestinate and foreordain a part of the human family of our progenitor Adam, as his own children, such as he determined should be saved, and that lie sent his Son Jesus Christ into the world to die, that they might be saved. Now I cannot see how this can be attributed to a God of justice but a God of justice he must be, if a God at all. Permit me therefore, to ask you a few questions, which I hope you will not hesitate to answer, in relation to this matter.

1st. If God be the creator of all men, why did he arrange it in eternity, before the beginning of time, in decrees, so as to save some, and not all?
2nd. If he has made such an arrangement, is he not unjust, and an impartial God?
3d. If he determined to save this number elected, why did he send his Son into the world to die for them, that they might be saved, when they were to be saved anyhow?
4th. Why did Peter say, he, God, is no respecter of sons; but in every nation, he that feareth him and work righteousness is accepted with him?
5th. Why does he command "all men, every where, to repent," when repentance will do them no good, if they not belong to the elect? And what good will it do them?
6th. Why is it said, He came to his own, and his own received him not; but as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, when they were sons already, and had been from all eternity; and what need had they for power to be given them to become the sons of God, if they were sons? (In the mind of God, as your brethren say)

7th. Why is it that all men are not created upon equal footing, as it respects salvation, which is to be attained through the medium of the gospel of the same God, which is to be believed and obeyed?

8th. Why was it that he directed his gospel to be preached to every creature, and he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned, if every creature to whom it was, and is preached, had, and have not, a chance to be saved?

If you will answer these questions, and show the justice of God, you will greatly astonish me, and perhaps thousands of others; and besides, you will greatly accommodate your humble servant and well wisher,

DE LANCEY EGBERT.

REPLY:

1st. That God is the creator of all men, is clearly revealed in the scriptures; nor is it any less certain from the same authority, that by an eternal arrangement in the divine counsel, he has decreed the salvation of some, but not of all mankind. Why God has revealed his sovereign grace to some, and hidden these things from others, is because, "So it seemed good in his sight." Luke x. 21.

2nd. He has made just such an arrangement; yet he is not unjust, but he is impartial.

3d. Because he had determined eternally to save his from their sins, he, in the fullness of time, sent his Son to redeem them from sin, death and hell; to all of which they stood exposed as the sons of an earthly Adam, in whom they had all sinned; they were to be saved only according to the purpose and grace given them in Christ Jesus before the world began. Tim. ii. 9, Eph. iv. 4. Which purpose and grace provided for them all that was necessary to cleanse from sin, to constitute them "holy and without blame before him in love."

4th. Peter made this declaration, because it was, and is the truth. Peter, as well as other Jews, had once thought God would have respect to their persons, as Jews, and personal relationship with Abraham, and personal righteousness, as doers of the law of Moses; but now being taught by the Holy Ghost, in his vision on the housetop of Simon the tanner, that God had cleansed all that the sheet (or covenant of grace) contained; and as a consequence (not cause) of their being cleansed, they would invariably fear God, and work righteousness, irrespective of the notions from which they were called by grace. All such are accepted (already) with him. When he as their legal representative arose justified, and by the blood of the everlasting covenant entered, and was received into the holy place made without hands, &c. Even then his reward was with him. They were crucified with him representatively, together with his dead body they arose from the dead; and as he rising from the dead became the first fruits of them that slept, he of course represented (according to this figure, borrowed from the ceremonial law) the entire harvest of his people; so that his being accepted, they were of course accepted with him; for they could be accepted at no other time or place, nor in any other way. And the only way Peter, or any of the children of God, can know who were, and are thus accepted with Christ, is by such evidences as Cornelius gave to Peter, viz: He feared God, (was not found presumptuously calling Jehovah to account to him for his eternal purpose, or divine decisions and everlasting decrees; "they that fear the Lord, tremble at his word ") and worked righteousness. God had given Peter abundant evidence that Cornelius was cleansed, and that he was of that chosen number in whom God worketh, both to will and to do of his good pleasure.

5th. God commandeth all men every where to repent; because all men every where have sinned; and it is proper and right that they should repent, or, in the sense of the apostle at Athens, that they should cease their worship of idols; and those in Kentucky should also renounce their idols, and cease to look for salvation through the works of their own hands.

6th. He came to his own; i. e., his kindred according to his birth, the Jews, his nation; and in a ceremonial relation, the Jews were the people of God, to the exclusion of the Gentiles; but the Jews as a nation rejected him, being disobedient, whereunto they also were appointed. 1 Peter ii. 7. That God gave his people power to become the sons of God, shows that men have no power of themselves to become such. As to the difficulty in the mind of Mr. Egbert, why they should need power to become sons, if they were sons from everlasting, as some of our brethren in Kentucky say; can Mr. E. comprehend the idea of all the human family being actually created in Adam, and existing in him as his sons before they were born. And notwithstanding their existence in him as such, God has given us power at the time appointed, by our natural birth to become the sons, by blood and birth, of Adam; for we have no more power to regenerate than we had to generate ourselves. As in this respect the earthly Adam represented till the human race, so his anti-type, the Lord from heaven, represented all the spiritual race; and because they are sons, God has sent forth the spirit of his Son into their hearts, crying Abba Father. This number is precisely as many as receive him; for as many as were ordained unto eternal life believed; and as many as he gives this power to, shall receive him, and no more. "All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me; and he that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." "No man can come unto me, except my Father who hath sent me draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day."

7th. In one sense, all men are on equal footing, in regard to the matter of salvation; that is, all are, as men, totally depraved, lost, helpless, and justly condemned, and must be saved by sovereign grace, or sink down under the curse of the righteous law of God. But we presume our correspondent wishes us to tell him why God has not made the same provisions of grace for all, that lie has for some of the human family. We can only say, as we have virtually said before, So it did not seem good in his sight. We are not at liberty to question the will of God; but if Mr. E. will inform us why all the animal creation were not made rational intelligences, why beasts were not men, why men were not angels, why angels were not gods, perhaps he might let in such a flood of light on this subject, as to enable us to assign some other reason than the sovereign will of God, in answer to the seventh statement of his queries. Salvation is not to be attained through the preaching of the gospel; the gospel will bring home the glad tidings with great joy to the elect of God, in due time; not as something to be attained, but of eternal life secured, hid with Christ in God, for them who are kept by the power of God, &c.

8th. Christ commissioned his apostles to preach his gospel to every creature, for a witness to all nations. Matt. xxiv. 14. "As many as were ordained to eternal life believed." Hence, as many as believe, (with that faith which cometh from God, which is the fruit of the Spirit, not of themselves, but it is the gift of God) are ordained to eternal life, and shall be saved accordingly; and the standard by which the apostles were to determine whether their faith was genuine or spurious, was by their obedience; genuine faith will lead those on whom it is bestowed to connect themselves with the Old School Baptists; and this will require that they be baptized; not as a cause or condition, but as an effect resulting from the work of the Spirit in their hearts. For unto them it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake. Phil. i. 29. We know nothing of a chance salvation. The covenant of God with our spiritual David, and through him, with his spiritual house, is ordered in all things and sure. Hence we see a good and sufficient reason why the gospel should be preached; not as a proclamation of uncertainties, chances, contingencies, means, proffers, conditions, yeas, and nays, free will and human powers, but a declaration of the sure mercies of David, abounding with God's immutable *wills*and shalls, to the declarative glory of his great name, and the triumph of all his dear children.

Our querist requires of us, not only that we answer his questions, but that we show him the justice of God, and that too, in a manner which shall greatly astonish him, and perhaps thousands beside him and what then? Why, in that case we will greatly oblige him. Willing, as we certainly are, to accommodate our friend Egbert, we candidly confess that it is not our province to display the divine attributes of Deity to the understanding of those who have never been made experimentally acquainted with them, through the quickening operation of the Holy Ghost. No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.

Yet on this subject we would say to our friend Egbert, and to the thousands he thinks may feel interested in this matter, that we have seen the day (and now we tremble when we ca1l it to mind) when we could also challenge the justice of God, when we set bounds for our Maker, and concluded that if he exceeded them, he must be unjust. And strange as it may seem, we knew no other, thought of no other, cared for no other standard of judgment than that of our own carnal reason, which is enmity against God. Yet we expected an. equitable and just decision from such a judge, even carnal reason. But, O Egbert! had not the Sovereign Lord displayed his naked arm in our salvation-had he not stopped us in our mad career-had he not prostrated this hellish opposition to his government, and given us a new heart, and a new spirit, we should have lived and died, and sunk down to hell, raging and blaspheming against him, as we then did; but forever blessed be his holy name, if we are not altogether deceived, he has taught us that all that he does is just and holy, simply because he does it; and we have been permitted with his ransomed children to sing, "It is even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight."

In conclusion, suffer us, to say, that unless you are brought by that sovereign, omnipotent grace of God, to be reconciled to his government, to see, understand, love, and rejoice in his absolute, sovereign decrees, in another and a dreadful world, you will find your last question more than answered. His justice will break thru on you, and on all who die in sin and unbelief, in a manner which will need no further explanation. From which awful state we pray God may save you, and the thousands of whom you speak, if in accordance with his all wise purpose and decree. Amen.

"Then shall he make his justice known,
And the whole world, before his throne.
With joy or terror shall confess,
The glory of his righteousness."

QUERY OF I INQUIRE, AND REPLY.

LAWRENCEBURG, Ky., March 3, 1837.

MR. BEEBE - Dear Sir: - Permit me to ask the solution of the following questions, viz:

If all men, before regeneration, are natural men, as is the generally received opinion, and are unable to receive the things of the Spirit, when and how are they to receive them? Is there any medium between a natural and a spiritual state? and if so, do they receive them in the medium or spiritual state? And if in the spiritual state they receive them, how are they made spiritual? seeing that the natural man cannot receive the things of the Spirit.

I earnestly solicit an answer to the above, not through any ill-designed motive, but merely for the truth's sake; and thinking, perhaps, your readers would be pleased to see it themselves, I have thought proper to propound the question to you, and more particulary for my own satisfaction. I wish a fair and scriptural solution upon logical principles.

I am, sir, yours in search of truth,
I INQUIRE.

REPLY: WE take pleasure in assisting, to the utmost of our ability, all such as are searching for the truth; we will therefore most cheerfully give I Inquire our views on the questions submitted.

By the term natural man, as used by the apostle, (1 Cor. ii. 14,) we understand all such as have not been born of the Spirit of God; for our Lord said to Nicodemus, (John iii. 6,)

“That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.” As Adam in his first estate was but a natural man. (1 Cor. xv. 46,) so all who by ordinary generation have descended from him, being born of the flesh, possess his nature, and are, of course, natural men; and although this fleshly nature has become by transgression contaminated and depraved, yet it is not thereby changed from a natural to a spiritual state. In his allegory, (Gal. iv. 22-31,) the apostle shows that Ishmael, who was born after the flesh, was a natural (not spiritual) man. Hence we understand that all mankind are natural men while in their unquickened state, and that all are included in the declaration of the apostle, “The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit,” &c. That all natural men are unable to receive the things of the Spirit is settled forever by the above declaration of the inspired apostle. What remains, therefore, is to show when and how any of them are made partakers of the things of the Spirit.

And first, we say negatively, there is no medium between a natural and a spiritual state, consequently they cannot receive them in such a state; and it follows, that in order to be able to receive spiritual things, a man must be born of the Spirit. “That which is born of the Spirit is spirit.”

Here let it be observed that the new birth does not affect the natural body, or the flesh; these are left as full of enmity to God, and as incapable of receiving the things of the Spirit, or of serving the law of Christ, as they ever were; while that which is born of God cannot commit sin, because the seed remaineth. The new creation wrought in the children of God, by which they are made spiritual, is variously expressed by the figurative language, “being born again,” or “You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins,” and the idea to us is clear, that although an unrenewed man knows nothing of, nor is able to receive the things of the Spirit, yet the quickened child becomes, by the quickening operation of the Holy Ghost on his heart, a spiritual man, and is able in this spiritual state to receive spiritual things, hold communion with God, lay hold of the promises, understand the doctrine of the gospel, and be fed and comforted with that meat which the unrenewed know not of.

Our friend will do well to consider the analogy of the figures employed in this subject. For instance: before we were born, or existed naturally, we could perform no natural action; and so the man that is dead cannot receive things which the living can, or exercise the functions of the living; yet although in an unborn state he is unable to do these things, God is able to give a natural existence; or if dead, he who is the Resurrection and the Life is able to quicken and make him alive, and to bestow upon him all those abilities which otherwise he could neither possess nor exercise the functions of life.

But the question is submitted, “When and how are they made spiritual?” We reply, “The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live.” - John v. 25. The work has been progressing throughout all ages, is still going on, and be who holds the keys of death and hell, who openeth and no man shutteth, and with whom alone are the issues of death, in his own time calls his sheep with a holy calling, causes his glorious voice to be heard, (Isa. xxx. 30,) and gives unto them eternal life, with the assurance that they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of his hand.

QUESTIONS BY DR. ALEXANDER ON FOREIGN TRACT OPERATIONS.

1. OUGHT not the love of Christ and his kingdom to be the governing motive with every christian?

2. Will not this motive, in proportion as it is felt, induce every one to make exertions to advance his kingdom, and thus promote the glory of God in the world?

3. Is there any way by which this object can so effectually be accomplished, as by extending the knowledge of truth throughout the whole earth?

4. Is there not a crisis in things of this kind when much may be done by seasonable and energetic exertions; which, if it be suffered to pass without improvement, may not return for ages; just as if the seasons of seed-time and harvest be neglected, we labor in vain during the remainder of the year?

5. Is there not good reason to think that the age in which we live is such a time? That Providence has now furnished the church with such facilities for operation, and opened such a door of usefulness, especially among the heathen nations, that we shall be greatly wanting in duty to our Master, if we do not endeavor to avail ourselves of these opportunities of doing good, which were never so abundantly afforded to any other age?

6. Is it not evident that the distribution of evangelical Tracts is one of the most effectual methods of disseminating the truth of God; and has not the blessing which has hitherto attended this enterprize, both in christian and heathen lands, warranted the conclusion that it is one of God's chosen means for the accomplishment of his purposes and predictions relating to the conversion of the world?

7. The prosecution of this object obstructs no other benevolent operation, but is a necessary auxiliary to all others. While, then, other societies, as particularly Bible Societies and Missionary Societies, are engaged in making extraordinary exertions, ought not the Tract Society also to move forward with renewed zeal and enlarged plans of operation?

8. Can the genuine disciples of Christ who possess the means of promoting this cause hold back, when so loud a call is addressed to them from almost every quarter of the globe for the bread of life?

9. Ought not mercantile enterprizes now to be entered on for the very purpose of making gain to be applied to the promotion of the Redeemer's kingdom? And should not those whose efforts to increase their property God has signally blessed, make a free-will offering of a portion of their profits to his service?

10. Would not the consecration of first fruits, redemption for the first born, and tenths, laid upon the altar of God, probably bring down a blessing on all their possessions?

11. When a contest is going on in our minds between selfishness and benevolence, is it not the part of wisdom to lean to the side of benevolence?

12. When was it known that any man was impoverished by giving to the Lord? And if the time should come when men shall become poor by giving all their goods to promote the cause of Christ, will they not become infinitely rich by such a blessed poverty?

13. Is not the time for doing anything in this cause short? Ought we not therefore to work while it is called to-day? Is it not certain that we shall never have another life upon earth? Ought we not, therefore, to do the best we can with the talents committed to us, that when our Lord shall come to reckon with us, he may say, "Well done, good and faithful servants?"

REPLY.

1. The love of Christ and his Kingdom is a governing motive with christians.

2. Under the influence of this motive christians will not attempt to advance his Kingdom, only as dictated by his supreme command.

3. God has glorified himself in the finished salvation of all the election of grace, "Having predestinated them, one and all, to the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will," more effectually than that object could have been effected by the combined efforts of angels, men and devils. The truth is spiritual, and "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned." Hence, the knowledge of "the truth" cannot be extended except by the Spirit of God.

4. The salvation of sinners is not accomplished by any agricultural process, or salvation would be by works, "and if by works it is no more grace, otherwise work is no more work."

5. God in his holy providence has always furnished his church with sufficient facilities to manifest their love to him and his cause, by an exhibition of their supreme attachment to his word as the rule of their conduct. But man has as little to do in the salvation of sinners at this, as at any former period.

6. To us it is evident that those religious fables, called Tracts, are among the most effectual methods of disseminating error in the guise of truth, and the curse of the Lord has manifestly followed them with confusion and distraction wherever they have gained among the churches of his saints, the conclusion cannot be warranted that any measure, (however plausible) can be a chosen means of God, but by his word.

7. The prosecution of this object is a necessary auxiliary to all others while then we discover the organized forces which men have brought to bear against the order of God's house, the sons of Zion should move with renewed zeal to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints.

8. No genuine disciple of Christ ever pretended to be in possession of the means of promoting God's cause; but rather, with David would they pray thus: "O Lord, plead my cause." Christ is the "bread of life ;" Moses could not give it to the children of Israel; and if almost every quarter of the globe are looking for it from Dr. A. and his confederates, they are seeking for the living among the dead! He is not there: he is risen!

9. If there had been any necessary connection between mercantile enterprise and the upbuilding of the Redeemer's cause, our good Master would never have used his scourge of small cords in driving forth those pious merchants who then incumbered the temple at Jerusalem; and as for offerings and sacrifices, God is full of them; and Christ (we are informed) by one offering has perfected forever them that are sanctified.

10. The consecration of first fruits, redemption for the first born, &c., would, without doubt, draw abundance of cash into the hands of the pious money-changers of the present age. But we would have Dr. A. "go (as the Lord has directed) and learn what this meaneth: I will have mercy and not sacrifice;" "Obedience is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams."

11. When a contest is going on in our minds between selfishness and benevolence, it is wisdom to lean to the side of benevolence - not priesteraft.

12. Man had never any thing to give to the Lord; so he never became poor by such deeds of charity. But as the Dr. seems duly to appreciate the blessedness of poverty, why is he so fierce for money as to attempt to dig up the body of Moses in order to put a yoke upon our necks which neither we or our fathers were able to bear?

Why so greedy, Doctor? The people have already paid over to your hands immense sums of money. Why not participate with them the enjoyments of this blessed poverty?

13. The time for doing any thing in your cause, Doctor, is short. The time is at hand when it shall be said, "Babylon the great is fallen?" Work with all your night, you will not have more than filled up the cup of your iniquities ere the curtain of time will drop, and the night of darkness and blackness will close eternally an all the sprightly inventions of men.

RANTISM OF POCAHONTAS

DURING our visit to the District of Columbia, we called at the Capitol to see the new painting. It is a splendid piece of work, but by far better suited to decorate some Popish monastery or cathedral than to be exhibited in the capitol of a nation disclaiming, as ours does, all interference in matters of a religious nature. Alas how empty and vain are the solemn protestations and pledges of human legislatures when interest or fame requires their interference with those sacred rights guaranteed to the citizens of this republic by the Constitution.

While standing in the rotunda of the Capitol, and viewing the splendid and elegant libel on the New Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, and reflecting that this piece of mockery cost the people of the United States $8000, and, what was still worse, that the insult on heaven was palmed upon us, without our consent, by legislative enactment; and that too, as we conceive, in open violation of those sacred rights for which rivers of patriotic blood once flowed, we were led to fear exceedingly that the time is not far distant when the “image of the beast” will arrive at the climax of its power, and pass the decree that none shall buy or sell who have not the mark of the beast in their forehead and right hand. If any demand the cause of our foreboding, we reply to such, the prospect looks dark when the public servants of the people, the guardians of our rights as citizens, so far forget the duties of their station, the spirit and letter of our Constitution, and the inalienable rights of the people, as to leave their appointed sphere and apply themselves to religious legislation.

For many years past our Capitol has presented the appearance of an idol’s temple. On the eastern porch we are greeted with the statutes of two heathen deities, made of marble; the one is called the god of war, the other is hailed as the goddess of peace Within the two Houses, when in session, we find hireling priests who are amply qualified to officiate in their sacrilegious mummeries, in a temple consecrated to such gods. To these popular idols and idolatrous customs we have hitherto submitted without speaking out in the manner such crying abominations have called for; and now, the consequence is, as might have been anticipated, we have to be instructed when and for what to fast; to be judged by men in meats, in drinks, and in regard to holy days. The funds of our States and Federal Government, distributed with a lavish hand upon theological seminaries, political chaplains, and costly misrepresentations of the ordinance of baptism.

Such, we say, were our reflections while gazing sorrowfully on this last assault upon christianity, this specimen of profanity and perversion of divine things. The painting itself describes a group, composed of white soldiers and citizens, in company with about an equal number of Indians, squaws, pappooses, &c.; in their centre a well-fed looking man, wrapped in a white sheet or surplice, with solemn air and up. sifted eyes, in the act of baptizing - not Pochahontas, but the fingers of his right hand - while the young Indian girl is represented as kneeling before his reverence, as though waiting for a few rantizing drops, if he should ever raise his hand from the urn.

This piece of gaudy mockery is indirectly established by an act of the Congress of the United States as christian baptism; and the sum of $8000 is appropriated by law to pay for this insult on God and man. If the present signs of the times do not indicate the near approach of persecution and oppression of the primitive saints, we have failed to understand them. Such impressions as we have we humbly submit to the clearer judgment of our brethren. Our confidence is in God, unshaken and firm; but we feel disposed to cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils.

REDEMPTION.

The editor of the N. Y. Baptist Repository has made an effort to relieve the doctrine of Redemption from all obscurity, and to lay the subject open. How he has succeeded may be learned by the following extracts from his article on the subject. He tells us that "On this point it is easy to be wise above what is written, and it is easy to understand all that mortals can know on the subject; because all that is known is revealed in the bible."

That it is easy for him to be wise above what is written, he has practically proven in the fourth item of his essay, in which he says:

"Redemption does not of itself alone secure the salvation of any individual in the world; but it lays a broad and solid foundation for human happiness, by declaring the fact, (not explaining how,) that by the death of Christ, God can be just and yet save the guilty believers. By sending forth the Holy Spirit, it creates the sinner anew in Christ Jesus; by proclaiming the gospel, it awakens the anxieties of the careless and stupid; by the efforts of believers, it turns men from the error of their ways to the wisdom of the just. Therefore salvation is not the result of Redemption alone, but of a multitude of other causes combined with it, to bring them that were afar off nigh by the blood of the covenant."

Thus it appears Mr. Crosby has at length got out of his shell. It has hitherto been more than a Herculean task for him to harmonize the general character of his paper with the Particular Redemption principles it was pledged to maintain. Consequently he had to labor under great embarrassments, in which he found it "hard for him to kick against the pricks." For him to admit that salvation is wholly of God, by grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, and at the same time tell his readers that "many precious souls are suffering the vengeance of eternal fire, who might have been saved if we had made such exertions as we might," involves perplexing opposites which he found hard to reconcile and bring together. To allow the atonement of Christ to be any thing more than a cypher in connection with his *do and live*system, would be so obviously absurd as to seriously jeopardize his whole theory of Missionary, Tract, Sabbath School, and other like contrivances for converting the heathen and evangelizing the world. But now Human Redemption, he says, was completed when Jesus cried on the cross, It is finished. But alas! "Redemption does not secure the salvation of any individual in the world." Then, should the apostle demand, "Why shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect, we may reply, Mr. Crosby of the N. Y. Baptist Repository; for he denies that redemption by the blood and death of Christ secures the salvation of any, that the blood of Christ alone can cleanse a sinner from his sins, that any sinner is freely justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Would not the holy apostle rebuke the man of the Repository, in words like these? "Nay, but who art thou, O man, that repliest against God?" Or, "O full of all subtlety and all guile, thou child of the devil, how long wilt thou not cease to pervert the right way of the Lord." The testimony of the apostles is, that Christ was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification. He gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.- Tit. ii. 14. "But, (says Mr. Crosby,) it lays a foundation for human happiness," O, is that all that the redemption of Christ has done? We had hoped and believed that the Lamb that was slain had redeemed us unto God, with his blood, out of every kindred tongue and people on earth, and that we should reign with our blessed Savior forever, in spiritual and eternal happiness. But we are now told that he has only laid the foundation for human happiness! If so, then it remains for us to build up our human happiness on the redemption of Christ; for even human happiness is not secured, only a foundation for it. And what is human happiness? None can tell since Adam fell asleep, for since his day no mortal has ever realized human happiness in its perfection; nor ever will. If this was the object of Christ's death, it has proved an utter failure. But we fearlessly deny that the death of Christ was intended for that object. He died as the Surety of his people, to bring them nigh by the blood of the cross; to redeem them from all iniquity, and to secure their salvation, and to make sure and certain their (not human, but) spiritual and eternal happiness. "By his stripes we are healed." And "by one offering he has perfected forever them that are sanctified."

But says Mr. C., "By declaring that fact, (not explaining how,) that by the death of Christ, God can be just and yet save the guilty believer."

Will Mr. C. inform us where in the bible he finds that fact recorded? We have never learned from that sacred book that God intended to save guilty believers. We have read, "His name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." Now as unbelief is a sin, Jesus is engaged to save his people from unbelief, and from all other sins, and to present them to himself, holy and without blame before him in love. That secures super-human happiness to his people; but guilty believers must, we judge, be those who believe a lie, that they may be damned; and not those whom he has from the beginning chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth.

In what part of the bible does Mr. C. find that the Holy Spirit is sent to create sinners anew in Christ Jesus? Such doctrine cannot be found in the bible. We read that God has called, chosen, saved, preserved and blessed his people in Christ Jesus before the world began. And in Eph. ii. we read that the saints, not sinners as such, are God's workmanship, created (not anew,) in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God has before ordained that we should walk in them.

Says Mr. C., "By proclaiming the gospel, it awakens the anxieties of the careless and stupid." What contradiction of terms. The careless and stupid have no anxieties to awaken. "By the efforts of believers." Guilty believers, we presume he means; for only guilty believers, who believe a lie, employ means to give efficacy to the redemption, which is in Christ Jesus. "It turns men from the error of their ways to the wisdom of the just."

On this new theory the Redemption of Christ is only a cypher; human efforts are figures, which men are to set at the left of the cypher and raise it to any amount they please. And Mr. Crosby concludes, and deduces from his own new theory that salvation is not the result of redemption alone, but of a multitude of other causes combined with it, to bring them that were afar off, nigh by the blood of the covenant; and a multitude of other causes, to be according to his theory.

REDEMPTION.

THE term, redemption of the human family, is with us objectionable, as the scriptures do not warrant us to believe that the human family is redeemed, nor have we the least suspicion that our venerable brother had any such idea; yet the words would bear such a construction. The redemption of the Lord only can embrace those who shall come to Zion with singing and interminable joy, and these constitute the whole family in heaven which are named in Christ Jesus our Lord. Redemption is a cardinal doctrine of the New Testament; it is much talked of, and but little understood, in what is called the religious world; but so momentous in the gospel, that in its absence the gospel would have no application to sinful beings. It contemplates and provides for the maintenance of the perfections of God by due homage to his law, and satisfaction to his justice and truth. It provides a channel for mercy to flow down from heaven to undeserving and helpless sinners on the earth. It delivers the lawful captive in a lawful way, and takes the prey away from the mighty. It unseals the sacred volume of shadows and types with which the Old Testament is filled, and rends asunder from top to bottom the vail of the temple which concealed in impenetrable darkness the holy things of the ark of the covenant, the mercy seat and cherubim of glory. It makes manifest the exceeding love of God, in giving his Son to die, the just for the unjust, in all its beauty and discrimination.

Much discussion and disputation has been lavished on the nature, design and effects of the atonement, on which the redemption of sinners is founded; some have contended that the atonement was general or universal – that it was alike for all mankind; but those who have occupied this ground have made the atonement of but little worth, as according to their theory it absolutely saves none from wrath or condemnation;

it only opens up a way for men to save themselves, if they choose to use the means and comply with the conditions; making their will and work the pivot on which their salvation hinges. If the atonement was general, and some for whom it was made are lost, it proves that the atonement saves none; that there is more saving virtue in what the sinner does than in the blood of Christ.

Others contend that the design and effects of the atonement are restricted, but that in its nature it is general, or universal; so that those for whom it was not designed, and on whom it shall never take effect, may be saved by it if they choose, and that their damnation will be greatly augmented in consequence of it if they do not choose to avail themselves of the opportunity. But the bare thought that the atonement may effect more than God designed, is truly revolting. If it may do more, it may be the same rule do less, and so much less that it may fail to secure the salvation of one soul. Who that knows the Lord, can think him liable to disappointment? Among the New School Baptists of America, Mr. Fuller's theory is thrown far back into the shade, as some of them profess to have discovered that Christ's death and sufferings made no atonement at all; that he only procured the materials out of which to make an atonement, and that with the stock which he procured from earth, he is now prepared in heaven to make atonement for any sinner that will please to give him a call.

There are others also who, while they profess to hold the doctrine of special atonement for the elect of God, and for them only, in their preaching, exhortations and mission lectures, represent that the atonement has very little to do with the salvation of sinners.

In distinction from all these winds of doctrine on the subject, the scriptures speak out plainly and inform the heirs of salvation that he gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works; and as to the efficacy of this offering of himself, without spot, &c., “By one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified.”

Having indulged in a few preliminary remarks on the subject of redemption, we will now attend to the particular inquiry of brother Gonterman. And if anything like originality should be discovered in our views, we trust our brother will not think us designedly singular, as we assure him that we have no recollection of ever hearing an opinion expressed on the points submitted. Premising that what we shall say, will be submitted with deference to the superior light of better informed brethren we assume, and will attempt to maintain that the redemption of every member of Christ, both soul and body, from sin, death, and hell, from the dominion as well as from the penal demands of the law, is secured.

It would be a difficult task to define the soul of man, yet that word which alone can quicken, divides asunder the soul and spirit, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. In all the animal creation there is a spirit, but man only was made a living soul. The soul of man then is a part of what he is as formed or created in Adam, and it is that which distinguishes him from the beasts of the field. Souls as well as bodies were provided for all the human family in Adam, their seminal head, hence unregenerate as well as regenerate men possess souls; yet all that a man can be in an unregenerate state, is what is born of the flesh, as our Lord said, “That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit.” This declaration of our Lord directs our minds to the two distinct headships, Adam and Christ; the one as a living soul, the other as a quickening spirit, the one is of the earth, the other is the Lord from heaven. Now that life which the saints had in Christ required no redemption; was it not lost; it was created in Christ Jesus, (Eph. ii. 10,) chosen in him before the foundation of the world. – Eph. i. 4. "Blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ." according to that choice, &c. Eph. i. 3. "Sanctified by God the Father, preserved in Christ Jesus, and called." – Jude 1. So being created, elected, blessed and preserved in Christ, there was nothing to redeem them from, as they thus existed in him; their life, that is, their spiritual life, being hid with Christ in God. But the human or natural souls and bodies of all men were created in Adam, existed in Adam, and were Adam, and as such actually transgressed the law under which the human family was created in Adam, consequently fell in him under the condemnation and wrath of that law. Here in one lump, we have presented the clay out of which God has fashioned vessels to honor and vessels to dishonor. Vessels foreknown and predestinated to glory and vessels of wrath fitted to destruction. Of the vessels of honor and wrath, we need say no more at this time; but the vessels of honor descending by ordinary generations from Adam, were those into which by regeneration, the life which was given them in Christ was to be communicated in due time. From these considerations it is clear that all that God's chosen people were in Adam, became vile, fallen, and cursed by the law, while all that they were in Christ their Spiritual Head, was preserved spotless and pure.

Now the work of redemption was applicable to that which being under the law was under the curse. And as we have proved that both soul and body were condemned and cursed by the law, it follows that both soul and body must be redeemed from that condemnation and curse, and by redemption brought out of their captivity, in order to receive that heavenly treasure of life and immortality which God had treasured up in Christ for them, from of old, even from everlasting.

Having, as we trust, established our position that the souls and bodies of the people of God were the subjects of redemption they being in a captive state, we will remark that the redemption price required, and promptly paid, confirms the view which we have taken, "For both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified, are all of one; for which cause he (Christ,) is not ashamed to call them brethren." Now this language is not used in reference to the natural souls or bodies of the sanctifed, for as natural men they are of the flesh, and they are of Adam the earthly, and in this sense, flesh, and they are of Adam the earthly, and in this sense, not of one with him that sanctifieth; but in reference to what they are as children of God, Christ is their life, and they in him, and by him, are of God; he the spiritual Head, and they are the members of his spiritual body. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." &c. – Hebrews ii. 11 and 14. Their flesh and blood did not constitute them children of God; they were children before, and as children they partook of flesh and blood in the same manner as Christ did, being in his mediatorial headship the Son of God, himself likewise, or in like or similar manner, took part of the same. For as in their being partakers of flesh and blood they were held in captivity by the law, so it was that by Christ's taking part of the same he came under the law which held them captive. He was made of a woman, made under the law, &c., and this being likewise, or like unto the manner that the children were partakers of flesh and blood, and consequently under the law and in a state of captivity, shows that they were the sons of God in Christ, as independently of their partaking of Adam, as Christ was the Son of God independently of his advent to our wold and incarnation. Not then to redeem the spiritual life of the saints, which was never in captivity, but to redeem those vessels of hone, ordained by (Adam,) of which all vessels both of honor and for wrath had sprung. Christ came in the flesh to put away sin in the flesh. This is what we conceive made it indispensable for Christ to come in the flesh; and meeting the rigid demands of the law of God, he gave his soul a sacrifice for their souls, his body for their bodies. For God had predestinated them to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the First Born among many brethren. Here we have the image. The law required blood for blood, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, so the body of Jesus was seized and slain, and the soul of Christ writhed in sorrow, even unto death, and was poured out to death when he was delivered up for our offences, and raised again for our justification.

In coming into the world, "He took not on him the nature of angels," or spiritual beings; the spiritual relationship to the saints was not assumed by him in his coming into the world, but a body was prepared for him; and as the children are the seed of Abraham, they were taken on him in a legal sense, when he came under the law; and having taken their law place, he was wounded for their transgressions, bruised for their iniquities, the chastisement of their peace was upon him, and by his stripes they are healed. – Isaiah liii. 5.

But his soul was not left in hell, in sorrow, in darkness, or under the curse of the divine law; so neither shall the saints by him redeemed be left under the condemnation and wrath of the law of God. His body did not see corruption, but was raised up from the dead on the third day; so also on the third day, as signified by the prophet Jonah, shall the redeemed bodies of all the saints of God be raised up from the slumbers of the grave, and the last enemy shall be destroyed.

The redemption of both soul and body is confirmed by the testimony of the word of God. The Psalmist says, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave." – Psalm xlix. 15. "For the redemption of their soul is precious and it ceaseth forever." – Psalm xlix. 9. The redemption of the body is still, if possible, more clearly asserted. “But if the Spirit of him that raiseth up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you.” “For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope; because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now; and not only they but ourselves also, which have received the first fruits of the Spirit,” (in the new birth,) “even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body.” – Romans viii. 20-23.

REDUCTION OF KETOCTON, VA., ASSOCIATION.

"The Ketocton Association is one of the oldest associations in Virginia, and formerly one of the most flourishing. In 1833 it contained nineteen churches and about two thousand members. But, says the editor of the Religious Herald, 'The blighted influence of Antinomianism has reduced it to a withered, blasted, lifeless body.' It now numbers six hundred and fifteen members, and it is yearly diminishing. When it began its opposition to the benevolent institutions, then began its downfall. We have a few similar instances of cause and effect in Ohio. All this, however, our anti-effort brethren consider only as a necessary purification of the church, and as a plain indication of the kind regards of their heavenly Father, since 'Whomsoever the Lord loveth, he chasteneth. When will their eyes be open that they may see." – Cross and Journal.

REMARKS.

AND thus old Hagar vaunted when she became the mother of her illegitimate bantling, Ishmael; in the ecstasy of her vain glory, forgetting that she, being a bond woman, could not give birth to a free child, despised her mistress, and that too on account of her barrenness. When will the eyes of these New School mockers be opened to see the close resemblance they bear to their ancient prototype. The position they assume in relation to Ketocton Association, and to all the old fashioned Baptists of the present day, serves only to demonstrate that they are a true and exact copy of the bond woman and her brood of slaves. Hagar could speak as disdainfully of the superannuated body of her mistress, as the Herald, and the Cross and Journal can of the Ketocton

Association; and with as much apparent plausibility. Sarah, and even Abraham seemed despondent at the appearances which, in all human calculation, stood against them and in favor of their bond woman's being the mother of the promised seed. Nevertheless God had promised Abraham, and repeated his promise to Sarah, that Sarah should have a son. Thus stood the case with the despised, insulted, "withered, blasted, lifeless body" of the free woman, until the appointed hour of God's pleasure had arrived, when, contrary to all human reasoning, triumphant over all the boastful insolence of her slave, Sarah embraced the free born boon that God had promised. Even so now stands the case with Ketocton Association, and with all the churches of the primitive faith and order of the gospel; they seem, in the eyes of their enemies, as Mr. Sands has happily expressed, and Mr. Cole has reiterated in the above paragraph, "Reduced to a withered, blasted, lifeless body," having only the promise and oath of God to assure her, that according to his appointed time, God will come, and his anti-typical Sarah shall embrace her heaven born seed.

But, to review the above article, how stands the case in point of truth? These New School mocking children of Hagar assert that "the blighting influence of antinomianism has reduced the Ketocton Association since 1833, from about two thousand members to six hundred and fifteen." As we have not the minutes of 1833 at hand we cannot say what their number was at that date, but we know that about the year 1835 three churches under the ministry of Mr. Gilmore were dropped from this Association; and at the same session, at Broad Run, a resolution was adopted by the Association to withhold their countenance and fellowship from the New School doctrines and operations of the day; this was virtually refusing to leave the very ground they had uniformly occupied from the date of their constitution, sixty-nine years previously. To this resolution the Arminian churches, called Broad Run, Buck Marsh and Ketocton took exception; and greatly to the peace and purity of the Association, they were dropped at the next meeting, in 1836, at Winchester; and subsequently the Thumb Run, and if we mistake not, Goose Creek also were dropped. Thumb Run has since returned, making at least six or seven large churches that were dropped for their corruption, either in faith or practice. In addition to these churches dropped for corruption and disorder, some one or more, we believe, were set off in fellowship to constitute the Rappahannock Association.

Now if these facts will justify the round assertion of these Ishmaelitish editors, that the blighting influence of antinomianism has reduced it from two thousand to six hundred and fifteen members, then have they done the Ketocton Association no injustice; but if, as it evidently appears to us, this reduction has resulted from a close and truly commendable regard for gospel truth and gospel purity, on the part of the Association, then they are persecuted for righteousness' sake, and have abundant reason to rejoice and be exceedingly glad.

To the special attention of Messrs. Sands and Cole we commend Paul's allegory. - Gal. iv. 21-31, inclusive, but more especially the 30th verse: "Nevertheless, what saith the scriptures? Cast out the bond woman and her son; for the son of the bond woman shall not be heir with the son of the free woman."

REFLECTIONS ON ENTERING THE NEW YEAR.

The Lord God of Israel changes not, therefore we are not consumed. The bounds of our habitation and number of our days are immutably fixed in his irrevocable decrees. The measure of our happiness in this world and in the world which is to come, depends on his gracious purpose, and infinitely wise administration. His providence governs the revolving seasons of our years, causing the earth to unbosom to us that succor which our earthly nature requires for sustenance and for comfort, in such measure and manner as seems good in his sight; while from the ample fullness which there is in Christ Jesus our Lord, he, by his Spirit, constantly administers to the spiritual necessities of all those who are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. It is also consoling to know that the afflictions, trials and conflicts of his children, while in the house of their pilgrimage, do not rise up out of the earth, nor come upon them by chance. An even balance is poised in his hand, and the weight, measure and duration of all the sufferings of his children is proportioned with the most exact and infallible certainty to that amount of grace which he bestows on them, whereby they are not only sustained in their deepest afflictions and trials, but made to realize the greatest profit and benefit from them all. From all their conflicts with the world, the flesh, and the devil, they shall emerge in triumph as more than conquerors through him that loved them and gave himself for them. “These light afflictions,” says an inspired apostle, “which are but for a moment, do work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not on the things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." The trials, afflictions, losses and bereavements that we encounter in these vile bodies, are seen, they are visible to the natural sensibilities of the flesh, and therefore our carnal nature writhes under them; and while we look at them, like Peter when he looked on the heaving billows of the sea, we begin to sink; but when our faith looks up to Jesus, and we see his hand outstretched for our deliverance, we glory in that tribulation which afforded opportunity for the cheering revelation. The raging billows on which we are tossed are seen, but faith that looks to Christ is the evidence of things that are not seen. This is the blessed privilege of all the sons of God, to look on things which are not temporal, but eternal. Our fleshly powers, including all the powers, mental and physical, which are born of the flesh, and all that we can have without a new birth, are totally blind to all the things of the Spirit of God, and only able to look on things which are temporal; but that life which is born of God, can discern the things of the Spirit of God. How essential it is then to our happiness that we heed the admonition of the apostle, to crucify the old man with his affections and lusts, and that we sow to the Spirit, that of the Spirit we may reap life everlasting.

With this number we commence the twenty-fourth volume of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and it is reasonable to suppose our readers will expect some expression from us of our prospects, and of our designs. In regard to prospects we can only say, in regard to the things that are seen, we begin the year with a greater number of subscribers than we ever have had before at the commencement of any volume. The unenviable efforts of those who have banded themselves together for the purpose of putting down the SIGNS, have thus far proved quite unavailing. May the Lord forgive them for the misrepresentations and falsehoods they have put in circulation against us. May he enable us to live down all the calumny that has been, or hereafter may be uttered against us. We know, or at least we hope we know, him on whom we have believed, and that he is able to keep us by his power and grace.

"His love in times past forbids us to think He'll leave us at last in trouble to sink."

Through him we can do all things, rush through a troop, or leap over a wall. Having confidence in God, we can say of all our adversaries,

"Then let them fight, and rage, and rave,
I shall perceive their noise no more Than we can hear a shaking leaf,
While rattling thunders round us roar."

Our prospect for the future is involved in the things which are not seen. Our God leads his people in paths that they have not known. To him, with the most unwavering confidence, do we desire to unreservedly commit all that we have, and all that we are, and if it be not his good pleasure to make our periodical a medium of comfort, edification and profit to his dear children, we have no desire that its publication should be continued. But from the assurances received from many thousands of our brethren and sisters, and from every perceptible indication of his will, we feel encouraged to move forward in the work.

As to our designs, we intend, as the Lord shall give us ability, to labor for the edification of the saints, the dissemination of the truth as it is in Jesus, and in opposition to heresy, will-worship, supersitition, bigotry and idolatry. Nothing affords us more real pleasure than to be employed in waiting upon the bride, the Lamb's wife, with the consciousness that in so doing, we have the authority and approval of him who walks amidst the golden candlesticks, and holds the stars in his right hand. We will spare no labor or reasonable expense to make the forthcoming volume more useful, interesting and edifying, than any of the former volumes. In attempting to carry out this design, we shall rely much on the aid of our brethren and sisters who contribute to our columns. Much will depend on the character, spirit and temper manifested in their communications, as well as the tone and character of the editorial articles. All, subjects vitally connected with the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom may be discussed freely, so long as such discussions can be conducted in a spirit of love and brotherly kindness, and all personal thrusts, gibes or insinuations, which are calculated, in our judgment, to irritate, are avoided. It is not our intention to suffer the paper to be the medium of crimination or recrimination among the brethren, nor a repository in which to record or publish all personal grievances. We shall aim at a higher mark. As we hold no secret or private sentiments in regard to the gospel of the grace of God, we shall candidly, fairly and unreservedly give an expression of our own views on any passage of Scripture, or point of doctrine, and on all subjects relating to the ordinances and order of the house of God, whenever called on to do so, to the very best of our ability. But in doing so we wish to have it distinctly understood that we give only the views of the humble editor of this paper. None are bound to indorse our views any farther than they can see them clearly sustained by the Scriptures of truth. Any of our brethren are at liberty to animadvert upon or controvert any sentiment that we may advance, provided they do so in a kind and brotherly manner. We are fully satisfied, from many years' experience, it is not discussion or controversy that wounds or disturbs the minds of our readers, but the harsh, unkind and unbrotherly manner in which such controversies have sometimes been conducted. Brethren cannot be too careful to avoid such expressions as are calculated to irritate the feelings of each other, by impugning each other's motives, or insinuating that they are unsound in the faith, while they may honestly differ in their understanding of the import of some Scripture, or the propriety of some particular expressions. The wise man has told us that “A soft answer turneth away wrath.” How important then that christians should act on that principle while following after the things that make for peace, and things whereby one may edify another.

The world is at this time in a state of general agitation; wars and rumors of wars are current all over the world, to an extent hardly ever before known; and discords are prevalent in our own country, threatening to prostrate our civil, social and political institutions, and to produce anarchy and distress, where freedom has unfurled her joyful banner. It is natural that some difference of opinion should exist among our best and wisest brethren, in regard to those things which agitate the world, and jeopardize our dearest earthly rights. Great care is necessary that we do not wound each other by any rash or premature action or expression in regard to the general tumult. As citizens we have to do with the institutions of our country, and as christians we may be interested in the final issue. But let us not forget that we are citizens of a kingdom that is not of this world, a kingdom that shall stand forever, and whatever privations, tribulations or distress may await us upon these mortal shores, we shall outride the storm at last, and that it will not be long before we shall be called to lay aside our armor, and the weapons of our warfare, and pass into that state where the wicked shall cease from troubling, and the weary shall be at rest.

REGENERATION AND THE NEW BIRTH.

On this subject an esteemed brother in Georgia, has desired us to give our views; and although we have frequently dwelt upon this interesting and important subject, in the pulpit and through the press, for the last twenty-five years, we have no apprehension of overtaxing the patience of our readers by too frequently calling their attention to the consideration of a subject of so much vital importance. To the children of God the subject is as interesting as it is important. It can never become stale with them. Our Redeemer has given to it paramount prominence in the doctrine of the New Testament, in his declaration, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Whatever excellence of character, amiability of disposition, or circumspection of deportment, the sons of men may attain to by all the efforts they can make at reformation, they are still in nature's darkness, and unable to see the kingdom of God, or to perceive the things of the Spirit of God except as they be born again. Nothing then can be of more vital importance to us than to have the evidence that we have passed from death unto life; and as there is no such passage from one state to the other but by the regeneration and the new birth, it is highly important that we should inquire into the nature of that generation and birth, by which alone we are delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. "Marvel not," said our Redeemer, "that I said unto thee, ye must be born again." By our natural birth we are brought forth and manifested as the children of a fallen Adam, in a nature which is depraved and sinful, having only a carnal mind which is enmity against God, not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be; having neither capacity or disposition to understand or enjoy anything of a spiritual nature. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." No course of discipline, no educational improvement, no reformation of the natural man, can elevate that nature above the level of a natural man. And the apostle assures us that the children of the flesh are not the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. (Rom. ix. 8.) Hence the necessity of a generation and birth of a higher order than that which makes us the children of the flesh. Of this higher order of generation and birth we are requested to express our views.

John says, "But as many as received him [Christ], to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." -John i. 12, 13. This appears to us to be very clear; for if a fleshly birth was necessary to manifest us as children of the flesh, so a spiritual birth is necessary to make us manifest as children of the Spirit; if our first or natural generation and birth was required to bring us forth in our earthly relation to the first Adam, so we must be born of God to bring us forth as the children of God. As Jesus said to Nicodemus, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." - John iii. 6. That life which God gave us in our creation in Adam is by natural or fleshly generation developed in us when we are born of the flesh, so that spiritual, immortal and eternal life which is brought forth in our regeneration is a life which was with the Father, and was manifested to us, according to 1 John i. 2.

This spiritual, immortal and eternal life, we are informed is hid with Christ in God; and the record, or testimony of it, by the three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost, and the three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, the water and the blood, is thus stated by divine revelation to us. "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life." - 1 John v. 7,8, 11, 12. This record is clear, positive and emphatic; and it cannot be disputed without involving blasphemy, for "he that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son." - 1 John v. 10. As Christ is one with the Father, so this life is one with Christ. He that hath not the Son of God hath not life; as he that hath the Son, hath the Father also; even so he that hath the Son, hath that eternal life which is hid with Christ in God. As the Father and Christ are so inseparably identified that they cannot be divided, so is this life which God has given us in his Son, so identified with Christ that we cannot have the life only as we have Christ, for Christ is the life of the church, as Christ God. All the fullness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily, (Col. ii. 9,) and he is the only and blessed potentate, the King of kings, and the Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light, which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see; to whom be honor and power everlasting, Amen. (1 Tim. vi. 15, 16.) As Christ is the life, and as he only hath it, we can only possess it as we possess him. He that hath the Son, hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life, so in the revelation of Christ in his incarnation. The Word, which was with God, and which was God, was made flesh and dwelt among us. In him was life, and the life was the light of men. (John i. 14, 14.)

We have presented the two headships, from whence we receive natural and spiritual life, the head and source of our natural life is called the first Adam, and we are informed that he is of the earth, earthy; that he was not spiritual, but natural, and "As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy." By virtue of our relationship to the first Adam, we are earthy, natural, but not spiritual, in the sense in which the saints are made spiritual by their relation to God in Christ. Although Adam was made a living soul, and possessed the spirit of a man, and all his posterity possess souls, and spirits adapted to their nature, the first Adam was not the head of that spiritual and immortal life which our only and blessed Potentate only has. As our earthly head or progenitor is of the earth, so our spiritual, immortal and eternal Progenitor, is the Lord from heaven, the Head of life, and the embodiment of all the spiritual life of his posterity or seed. From these two heads, Adam, who was of the earth, and Christ, who is the Lord from heaven, proceeds all that is developed by ordinary generation or regeneration. In the book of the generations of Adam, (Adam the first, who is the figure of him that was to come, which is Christ, Rom. v. 14,) it is thus written, "In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him; male and female created he them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created. And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; and called his name Seth. And the days of Adam, after he had begotten Seth, were eight hundred years: and he begat sons and daughters. And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enos." - Gen. v. 1-6. And thus the command of God to Adam to be fruitful and to multiply, began to be carried into effect, not by addition, but by multiplication, and the work of multiplication is still progressing to the present hour, and must continue until all the natural posterity of which Adam was the seminal head shall be developed.

The book also of the generation of Jesus Christ, is also written, see Matthew i. 1, compared with Psalm cxxxix. 15, 16, in which we have the record of the three in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost, as corroborated by the three that bear record in earth, as stated 1 John v.7,8, 11,

12. Showing in this family record, that Christ's substance was not hid from the omniscient eye of the Father. "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book, all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them." It is also recorded, "A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation." - Psalm xxii. 30. The prophet Isaiah, when viewing him in his humiliation, led as a lamb to the slaughter, taken from prison and from judgment, was led to inquire, "And who shall declare his generation?" - Isaiah liii. 8. But the response is given in the same chapter, "When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands. He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied." - Isaiah liii. 10, 11.

In the gospel, the sealed book is opened by the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and the Lamb's book of life contains the registry of all his members which were chosen in him before the foundation of the world.

Regeneration, as we understand it, like generation, involves the begetting, conception and birth, of that which is generated, and in both cases, implies that that which is so generated had a seminal existence in its progenitor before its manifestation by generation; as Levi was in the loins of Abraham when Melchizedek met him, and as we all as natural men were in Adam the day he was created, and as the spiritual seed was chosen and preserved in Christ Jesus before the world began. In the order of regeneration, or the development of the children of God, no intermediate agencies are employed, no system of means can bring forth the promised seed, as was demonstrated in the case of Hagar and Ishmael; it is the immediate work of God himself. "Of his own will begat he us, with the word of truth." - James i. 18. How, by the word of truth? Jesus saith, "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." - John vi. 63. In the preceding chapter Christ testified of the power of that word which is spirit and life, by which the children of God are begotten, quickened and born; saying, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live." - John v. 25. But will all the dead be thus quickened by his words which are spirit and life? No, for he says, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father which gave them me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one." "And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him; for they know his voice." - John x. 4, 27-30. He who saith, "For I am the Lord, thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Savior," says, "Fear not, for I am with thee, I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; even every one that is called by my name; for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him, yea, I have made him." -Isa. xliii. 5-7. The word of the Lord, which is Spirit, and which is life, which liveth and abideth forever, is that by which regeneration is affected; not merely by the Scriptures in their letter, nor reading or preaching them, but the words which Jesus himself speaks to the individual persons who are made to hear and live. Hence Peter could say, "To whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." - John vi. 68, 69. Until this word, which is spirit and life, is spoken by Christ himself, who is the quickening Spirit, or life-giving Spirit, to an individual, that individual is in a state of alienation from God, dead in trespasses and sins, and utterly beyond the reach of any power, short of that which is in Christ, to quicken him. "As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." When a sinner is thus quickened, the incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever, is implanted in his heart, and the evidence of this implantation is first given by a sense of the purity and holiness of God, and the spirituality of his law, contrasted with a sense of guilt, pollution and just condemnation of the person to whom this communication is made, and consequently a struggle for deliverance. The ear is now opened to hear the thunders of Sinai, and the eye is made to see the justice of God as a sin avenger; a brokenness of heart that he or she, as the case may be, has been all their lifetime in open rebellion against so holy, just and righteous a God, who has followed them with his mercies all their days. A sense of his goodness leads them to repentance, contrition and humble acknowledgment of their guilt. Now the quickened and awakened sinner becomes burdened with the load of depravity, which they vainly try to put away from them; an effort is made to reform; a resolution is formed to sin no more; tears flow in anguish of spirit, and prayers are offered for pardon; the sinner is pricked in the heart, and cries out, Men and brethren, what shall I do? But all that he can do for himself, and all that kind, sympathizing friends can do for him, does not ease his pain or lighten his burden. At length he concludes there is no hope in his case, he sees that all his efforts, cries and tears, have been unavailing, and all hope of salvation seems to be shut out from his view.

Now all this conviction, contrition, lamentation and distress, is the legitimate consequence resulting from life implanted, and indicates to all who know experimentally the way of life, that the poor sin-burdened soul is drawing near to the time of his birth, or deliverance. He who has thus arrested him, and brought him to a sense of his lost and helpless estate, will perform the work in his own time, but the burdened soul must wait until "God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shines in [not into] his heart, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." -2 Cor. iv. 6. Or, as Paul relates his own experience, "When it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me." -Gal. i. 15. Then by the revelation of Christ in us the hope of glory, the way of salvation through him is brought to view, the burden of guilt is removed, the blood of Christ is applied, the demands of the law are canceled, the curse is removed, the prison doors are opened, the captive is delivered, the love of God is shed abroad in the heart, old things are passed away; behold all things have become new; a new song is put in his mouth, even praise unto God, the gospel pours its joyful sound into his quickened ears, his goings are established and he is a new creature, the old man of his corrupt nature is subdued, not dead, that which is born of the flesh continues to be flesh, and only that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. (John iii. 6.) And, as in the flesh there is nothing good, so in the spirit, there is nothing evil. That which is born of the flesh is corruptible, because it is born of corruptible seed, but whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. Here then the christian finds in him, two men, which are called the old man and the new man. (Eph. iv. 22-24; Col. iii. 9,10.) Outward man, and inward man, (2 Cor. iv. 16,) and the hidden man of the heart. (1 Peter iii. 4.) The old, outward man, is called the flesh, because it is born of the flesh; but the new, inward, and hidden man of the heart, is called spirit; because it is born of the Spirit. The works of the flesh are these, adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies. But the fruits of the spirit are, love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law. (Gal. v. 19-23.) These two men, or opposing principles in the christian, occasion a warfare and make him groan being burdened. "For the flesh, [that which is born of the flesh] lusteth against the spirit, [that which is born of the Spirit] and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye (christians) cannot do the things that ye would." - Gal. v. 17.

Finally, we see from the testimony of the Scriptures, as we also learn by our experience, all that is corrupt, carnal, and opposed to the law of our mind, is born of the flesh, and all that we possess that delights in the law of God, that loves holiness and hates sin, is that which belongs to our new and heavenly birth, and while we remain in this earthly tabernacle, the warfare will continue, and we are admonished to crucify the old man with his affections and lusts, and to deny ourselves, keep the body under, and to put on the new man, which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness, to walk after the Spirit, and we shall not fulfill the desires of the flesh. The new man being born of God, must live on that bread which comes down from heaven, but the old man being of the earth earthy, must have its sustenance from the earth, until it returns to the dust of the ground from whence it was taken; for dust it is, and to the dust it shall return. But we have the blessed assurance that in the resurrection, these vile bodies of the saints, which now occasion us so much trouble, shall be changed, and made like unto the glorious body of our risen Redeemer, and then, but not till then, shall they be made spiritual and immortal.

We have endeavored to give our views on the subject proposed by our brother, and in doing so, to trace the generation of the children of God, as a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation; which are born, not of a corruptible seed, but of an incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. What we have written are our views, and what we have understood to be the views of the Old order of Baptists, from the days of John; but if we are mistaken in our views, (and we are liable to be) or in any part of them, we hope that our brethren will in all christian kindness point out to us the more excellent way.

REGENERATION AND THE NEW BIRTH.

Dunkirk, Ind., April 17, 1867.

Brother Beebe: - Having finished the business part of my letter, and feeling a deep interest in the welfare of the Lord's chosen ones, I feel disposed to present a few thoughts for their consideration on the subject of regeneration and the new birth, a subject on which many precious brethren have given their views, and on which there seems to be diversity of opinion, which, to me, seems to be more in the manner of expression with some, than in real sentiment.

Dear brethren and sisters in Christ, on a subject so sublime, and so fully taught in Christian experience, it seems to me, there should be no difference among Old School Baptists. I conclude that instruction has taught nothing in the New Testament relating to the subject but what it teaches every child of grace. Hence Christian experience and the New Testament must harmonize. Christ says, "That which is born of the flesh, is flesh (John 3:6)." Now a birth is the result of a precious cause (generate). Does Christian experience teach it? I answer, It does. Let us inquire? Go back, my dear brethren and sisters, to the time and place when and where you first got a sight and sense of your fleshly nature. Does not your experience teach you that, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so death hath passed upon all men, for that all have sinned;" (that sin is hereditary) and that all your sins, whether in thought or act, proceeds from that corrupt fountain within your own nature, generated by the father of lies. Thus being generated or begotten in sin, we see the birth or fruit of sin in that which is born or produced by it, which is the fruit of the flesh. For the fruit, or works, of the flesh are manifest, which are these: "adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditious, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like (Galatians 5:19-21)." Now, dear kindred in Christ, are not all these the effects of a previous cause, which is sin? The first moving cause is interwoven in our Adamic nature, over which the child of grace mourns; because when he would do good, evil is present. Now, brethren, are not all the internal enemies of the child of God, and all the powers of anti-christ, and every species of heresy, from first to last, all the works of the flesh, proceeding from that natural generation, the influence of sin, called the old man? Why did you loathe your own person? Not because your own flesh was different from, or more corrupt than, the flesh of others whom you esteemed highly; but it was because of the works or fruits of the flesh which were so God-dishonoring in your estimation. But, lest I should be tedious, I will pass.

Regeneration and the New Birth. "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit (John 3:6)." Christ said to his disciples, "Ye that have followed me in the regeneration," etc. Now regeneration is the first flow in a child or subject of grace. The apostle says, "We love him because he first loved us." Dear brethren, was it not the love of God shed abroad in your poor hearts that made you love God, and hate yourself, and abhor the works of the flesh? Then the love of God the Father that was operating on your heart produced spiritual life and action in you. A hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and you became weary of sin, and heavy laden with guilt and condemnation.

Regenerating grace, or the love of God shed abroad in the heart of a poor sinner, not only produces spiritual vitality, but gives him eyes to see, ears to hear, and a heart to understand, alike with an appreciating conscience, and a feeling sense of his awful condition of condemnation which rests on him; guilt raniding in his bosom, and vengeance pursuing to the utmost. The apostle says, "According to his mercy he hath saved us by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." O what a cleansing! Not the purifying of the flesh, but denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, living soberly, righteously and godly. For where sin abounded, there did grace much more abound. Those who are thus regenerated are created in Christ Jesus unto good works which God hath before ordained that they should walk therein. Being delivered from the power of darkness, they are translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son.

We see in all this the fruits of the Spirit, by which they were quickened, or regenerated, which are love, love to God, to his word, to his ordinances, to his cause, and to his salvation by grace, and by grace alone. Joy fills his soul, for pardoned sins, and for a finished redemption. Peace flows like a river, to satiate a thirsty soul. Jesus appears, not only as a hiding place from the wind, and covert from the storm, but also as rivers of water in a dry place, and the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. The love of God produces long-suffering, and humble submission to the will of high heaven. Gentleness also, no murmurings against the counsels of God, ever trusting alone in that grace which is sufficient for every emergency. These are fruits of the Spirit and evidences of the new birth.

Now, my dear kindred in Christ, I have penned a few thoughts on the subject of regeneration and the new birth. I do not understand them to be one and inseparable, regeneration proceeding and producing the new birth. As stated above, regeneration is the first flow or communication of divine life, which is effected alone by the quickening power of the second Adam, the Lord from heaven. And the new birth is the effect of regeneration in delivering the redeemed from the power of darkness, and translating them into the kingdom of God's dear Son, with all the powers and peculiarities of the children of God.

Brother Beebe, this imperfect scribble is submitted to your disposal. Do with it as you think fit.

Yours as ever.
J. Buckles.

Reply: We agree with Elder Buckles in the opinion expressed by him, that much of the seeming difference of views recently expressed on the subject of regeneration and the new birth arises from a failure with brethren to perfectly understand each other. Much labor is, in some cases, lost in argument to prove what no one intends to dispute, and to establish points which belong not to the general issue. We presume that all Old School Baptists fully agree, so far as they understand each other, in what constitutes a genuine and reliable Christian experience, at least so far as the sensible demonstration of God's quickening power is felt and witnessed by all the children of God. So that in examining those who desire our fellowship, and apply for admission to the communion of the church, we have no trouble in understanding the relation they give of the dealings of the Lord with them. Even the tongue of the stammerer can pronounce the Shibboleth clear and distinctly.

We also, with brother Buckles, hold that regeneration, in the order of things, and according to the word, must precede the new birth. How can that be born of God that is not first begotten of him? And as the seed which alone can generate and bring forth the children of God must come from God, it must be an incorruptible seed, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever; and as the seed is incorruptible, and every seed, by the decree of God, must bring forth a chosen generation as incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading as the seed that produced them. That which is incorruptible is not only pure and uncorrupted, but absolutely insusceptible of corruption, therefore we are assured that, "Whatsoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God (I John 3:9)." Yet we are conscious that sin still remains in our flesh, which is born only of the flesh. The principal question at issue is in substance this: When the child of God is born of the Spirit, does his flesh, or any of his fleshly powers and faculties, then put on immortality and become incorruptible? Is his fleshly nature then delivered from the bonds of corruption, and is his mortality then swallowed up of life, or does his mortal powers and faculties still retain their mortality, and their corruptibles retain their corruption, until the resurrection of their bodies in the power of that endless life of which they are made partakers in the new birth? We all agree that the life which we receive in the new birth is born of God, and by it we are sealed to the resurrection, when this same life shall pervade and quicken, change and fashion all the bodies of the saints to the likeness of Christ's risen and glorious body. But can we say that our fleshly bodies are now spiritual? If others can, we know of some who cannot. We who have received the first fruits of the spirit (in our new birth), "even we ourselves do groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit: the redemption of our body (Romans 8:23)."

THE REGENERATION AND THE NEW BIRTH.

From what has been written and published in our columns on these two very important points of the doctrine of God our Savior, there seems to us to be a failure on the part of some of our dear brethren, either to understand the scriptural import of these words, or to comprehend the meaning of each other; and we are confident that the difference is much greater in appearance than in reality. The divine command to the saints of God requires of them to be of one mind; and it is therefore of great importance that on subjects of vital moment, we should all labor to obviate every seeming difference, and to see eye to eye. Every proposition should be carefully tested by the only infallible standard, the Scriptures. Nothing can redound to the glory of God, or conduce to the edification of the saints, that is not sustained by the Scriptures of truth. That even the saints, while in the flesh, should fail to understand every portion of the word alike is not surprising; for we can only perfectly understand the inspired testimony of the Bible so far as it is opened to us by the Spirit, which Christ has given to lead his disciples into all truth. When any difference, or seeming difference, arises, and we are drawn into any thing like controversy, we should carefully avoid all fleshly ambition to excel, or strive for mastery; and above all, that we inflict no unnecessary wound on those of God's children who may fail to appreciate the force of our arguments. In reviewing the communications of brethren, before we indulge in any severe animadversions, we should be sure that we understand the positions assumed by them. It is true, whatever is published by any brother is open to the careful examination and criticism of all who read it, and should be candidly, but kindly, scrutinized; that we may prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. All who write with the single desire to elucidate truth for the edification and comfort of the saints will desire to have their views tested by the divinely authorized standard; and if any thing be detected which the Scriptures will not sustain, especially any thing conflicting with divine testimony, its detection and exposure should be regarded as a favor equally to the writer and the readers.

Recently some difference has been obvious in the views of brethren in regard to the scriptural signification of the word regeneration, as used in the New Testament; some holding that it is, and others that it is not, the same in signification and application with what is called the new birth. Some applying the word regeneration to the resurrection power of God which brought again from the dead the crucified body of Christ, and in him the resurrection life and immortality of all his mystical body and members, from under the law which was the ministration of death, into the resurrection life and immortality of the Son of God.

Now, as a birth, either natural or spiritual, always implies a generation, because without generation there can be no birth; and whatever is born is the development of that which was generated, it is not strange that the two terms have been thought by many to mean one and the same thing. Such indeed had been our view for years; but as we now conceive, because we had not been led to closely investigate the subject until it was presented for consideration by some of the brethren. Here let us observe that those who take the position that the terms regeneration and the new birth mean one and the same, and that both apply to the experimental quickening of the children of God, do not deny that all the saints are redeemed and quickened together with Christ, and raised up together, and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. Nor, on the other hand, do those brethren who apply the word regeneration to the quickening of the whole elect family of God by the resurrection of Christ hold with less tenacity the vital importance of the new birth, as it has always been held by the church of God, in its personal application to all the saints in their individual experience, in being quickened by the Spirit, and born into the liberty of the sons of God.

While, so far as we understand them, we agree with our brethren that the regeneration which is mentioned but twice in the Bible, in both cases refers to the reproduction from death of the whole mystical body of Christ, by his resurrection, we at the same time hold, as we have ever held, that every member of the body of Christ must experience the new and spiritual birth, of which Christ spake to Nicodemus in John 3:3-10.

Still in perfect harmony with that vitally important sentiment, we also believe that Christ in his incarnation took on him the seed of Abraham, and that all who are Christ's are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise; and that they were so identified with him in his assumption of our flesh, that when he died, they were legally dead with him; and when he arose from the dead, they were quickened together with him, and they were raised up together, and made to sit together in the heavenly places. The whole church, as the body of Christ, was buried with him by baptism into death, regenerated, or reproduced from death, by the resurrection life of his resurrection; so that in like manner as they were buried with him into his death, they were raised from the dead with him to newness of life; married and identified with him in resurrection, or regeneration life. How else can it be said we are quickened, and raised up together with him; that we are risen with Christ, and dead to the law by his body? How else shall we understand that we are raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, to walk in newness of life? Raised up from under that law which holds dominion over a man as long as he lives; being by that law crucified with Christ, dead with him to the law by his body, and regenerated in a new life, and reproduced in a new relationship, over the which the law of wrath and condemnation has no dominion. And being thus risen with Christ, now instead of continuing to seek for righteousness by the works of the law, or for those things which belong to the legal dispensation or worldly sanctuary, we who are risen with Christ are instructed to seek those things which are above, even in the heavenly places of the regeneration, which are the heavenly places of the spiritual kingdom, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.

If it be conceded that our participation of flesh and blood by our creation and generation in the first Adam placed us in and with him under the law that he was created under, which he transgressed, and by the transgression of which he involved us in guilt and death, from which Christ, the second Adam, to redeem us was required to be made flesh, and to dwell among us, under the same law, and that in doing this, he took on him the seed of Abraham, that seed of Abraham which was reckoned in Isaac (not seeds, as of many, but to thy seed, Abraham's seed, which is Christ), and that in being made flesh, he was to suffer in the flesh, bear our sins in the body of his flesh, be put to death in the flesh; then not only was he put to death in the flesh, but the flesh in which he suffered was also put to death. Now observe, the reproduction of those thus buried in death by his baptism of suffering was not a mere resuscitation, or recovering to that life which was put away, but a resurrection to immortal life, and to a spiritual state perfectly free from guilt, condemnation and death. Hence it is said that God hath begotten us again to a lively (or vital, immortal) hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance which is (like the seed by which this immortality is generated) incorruptible, undefiled, and fadeth not away. Is it heresy to call this regeneration? Redeemed from the generation of the earthly Adam, reproduced in the life and immortality of the second Adam, which is the Lord from heaven, our relation to earth, to the flesh, to the law, to sin, corruption and death is dissolved and we are identified with the risen Savior in his resurrection life, is not this regeneration?

But, in other words, was not that life which quickened and resurrected the crucified body of our Lord, the same resurrection life of which we are made experimentally the partakers when we are born again? If so, was it not communicated to the whole church of God, in her spiritual Head, when he was raised from the dead? If not, at what period was it communicated from God the Father, through Christ, the Mediator, to his mystical body and members? But why apply the terms generation, regeneration, begetting and birth, to this reproduction of the church in her spiritual life? Because the Bible uses terms which, in our judgment, fully warrant us. That his resurrection was a regeneration will appear from the record. He was begotten in the flesh by the Holy Ghost, conceived in the womb of the virgin Mary, and that holy thing which should be born of her should and was called the Son of God. Thus by generation he was made flesh, made of a woman, made under the law, that in this flesh he should be put to death. In his resurrection divine inspiration has used similar terms. "Thou art my Son. This day have I begotten thee (Psalm 2:7)." And in Acts 13:32, 33, these very words are applied to the resurrection of Christ. "And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise made to the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." If these Scriptures, together with those which declare him to be "the first begotten of the dead (Revelation 1:5);" "The first born from the dead (Colossians 1:18)," do not imply a regeneration, then we are at a complete loss to find words in our language to express the idea. Generated, in being made flesh, circumcised, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ, and begotten again from the dead, and born from the dead, in immortal life, over which death hath no power; and to be known no more in the flesh, but to be known henceforth as the Resurrection and the Life of all his members.

But, admitting the application of the term, to the resurrection of Christ from the dead, some may ask why we include it in the regeneration of the church.

Well, let us see. Did Christ arise from the dead and leave his church, or any part thereof, behind him, and under the curse of the law, the guilt of sin and dominion of death, or did he not rather abolish death, and bring immortality to light in his resurrection? When he went forth weeping and bearing precious seed, did he not return again rejoicing, bearing his sheaves with him (Psalm 126:6)? In what other sense, or by what other generation, does Christ claim his members as the children of the resurrection? Can the relationship of children exist without generation? It is written, "A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation. They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done it (Psalm 22:30,31)." Is it not presumptuous to deny that the church was quickened together with Christ, and that they were raised up together? In what other sense can we understand that impressive and striking illustration which he himself gave of his death and resurrection? "Verily, verily I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit (John 12:24)." The context proves that this double asseveration was used to impress deeply on the minds of his disciples the application of the figure, as illustrative of his death, and the quickening and reproduction of his seed, whom he would redeem from the earth, and bring up with him, and in him, as their Resurrection. A very similar figure is used in illustration of the resurrection of the saints (see I Corinthians 15:36-38). "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die: And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain. But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." If Christ is that corn of wheat which fell into the ground and died, what is his own body which God has given him in his resurrection? Let the inspired apostle answer: "And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come: And hath put all things under his feet and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all (Ephesians 1:19-23)."

"Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead (Isaiah 26:19)." Compare with Hosea 6:1,2; "Come, and let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will also bind us up. After two days will he revive us; and in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight." Ages and generations may pass before all the members of Christ's mystical body shall be quickened and live in the sight of any but God. But in the sight of the omniscient eye, when his soul was poured out unto death, all his seed was clearly seen, as living in his sight, and in that life which is hid with Christ in God, and which in the absence of Christ can never be seen. When, and wherever he, who is their life, appears, then, and there, do all his members appear with him in glory. In his death, the corn of wheat containing the germ of all the harvest fell into the ground and died. Here is the planting in the likeness of his death, which is set forth by Christian baptism; and resurrection with him to newness of life. By death this relation to the earth is dissolved. We have known him in the flesh, as a man of sorrow, acquainted with grief, subject to pain and death: but henceforth know we him no more. "He was taken from prison and from judgment; and who shall declare *his generation;*for he is cut off out of the land of the living (Isaiah 53:8)." "Thou sowest not that body which shall be." Before his death he was under the law, laden with all the sins of his people, for God hath laid on him the iniquities of all his people, prepared him for the sufferings of death, and made him a little lower than the angels. "But God giveth it a body as hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." Now, in his own body, the church, quickened and immortal, or resurrection life, he dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. The greatness of God's mighty power is displayed, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him up from the dead. Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments, which were on him when he was put to death in the flesh. He has nailed them to his cross, and leaving these all behind, he has arisen from the dead in a spiritual resurrection body, begotten by the Father from the dead, he is exalted in his resurrection body, "far above all principality and power, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come." The seed which fell into the ground and died has burst the bands of death, and triumphed over the grave. Bearing his sheaves with him, he enters the portals of immortality as our triumphant Prince and Savior. "God has gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet."

"Lift up your heads,
Ye everlasting doors, fly wide
Make ready to receive my bride;
Ye harps of heaven, come sound aloud,
Here comes the purchase of my blood."

Now tune your sweetest harps, ye ransomed sons of God, and without a jarring note, swell the immortal notes written by Peter, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again." Don't falter at that strain - heaven shall resound with its melody; sing it loud, sound it clearly, and high as the heavens your voices raise when you repeat the chorus. Blessed God, who hath begotten us in this resurrection regeneration, "to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance which is incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away; reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."

Now, brethren, does this doctrine of resurrection regeneration alarm any of you? Examine it closely, carefully, and prayerfully, and compare it with the Scriptures and with your experience.

We have called your attention to the Scriptures on the subject; now suffer us to appeal to your own experience. You are born again of an incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. What think you; was that incorruptible seed in Christ when like a corn of wheat he fell into the earth and died for you? Were you quickened by the power of the resurrection of the Son of God when you passed from death unto life? If not, from what begetting did your new birth proceed? To what generation do you by it belong? Do you really think the Head of the church was begotten from the dead at one time, and the body and fullness of Christ at another? Has your new birth brought you forth as children of the resurrection? Is the life of the Head of the church the same that is the life of his body? Is Jesus Christ your resurrection and your life?

But, say you, Jesus arose from the dead eighteen hundred years ago; and our birth transpired but recently. True, but can you ascribe it to anything short of the death and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ? Had he failed to have risen from the dead, could you have been born again? Was not the very first gleam of hope that cheered your desponding heart a view, by faith, of the risen Savior? Could you rest upon any other hope than that power which God wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead? Were you quickened and made to believe in God, as were the saints at Ephesus, and all the faithful in Christ Jesus, according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead? If you were born of the Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead, then rest assured that he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you (Romans 8:11).

Now let us review the decree, in the second psalm, "Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee," and the inspired explanation of it in Acts 13:32,33; "And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made to the fathers, God hath fulfilled unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is written in the second psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." How is the resurrection of Jesus Christ the fulfillment of the promise made to the fathers, unto us their children? This risen Jesus is our resurrection and our life. The day of this decree of God was ushered in by the resurrection of Christ, and cannot terminate until all who are begotten by his resurrection shall be born of the Spirit that raised him from the dead. It has been rightly said by some of our brethren that generation must always precede a birth; begetting and quickening are always before the new birth. This generation chosen in Christ, as a seed that shall serve him, which shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation, shall come and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born (Psalm 22:30,31). Paul declares to us the gracious purpose of God in quickening, and raising us up together (or simultaneously) with Christ; and it is "That in the ages to come," for in order of time, ages are required for the development of this regeneration, and the personal development of that people, who, being already regenerated in Christ, shall be born of his resurrection life and spirit; yet all this shall certainly be accomplished in the one day, in which God will make up his jewels, and in which a nation shall be born. So in the ages to come, the ages which have come, and the ages yet in the future, God will shew the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus (Ephesians 2:7).

One further consideration. Our Lord Jesus Christ is expressly called the Only Begotten of the Father; how then is it possible for us to be brought into the vital relationship of sons of God, unless we were begotten and regenerated in him, as sons of God, and heirs of immortality? We have supposed that the eternal deity or Godhead of Christ is unbegotten, underived, self-existent and eternal; and that his Sonship has reference to his Mediatorial Headship of the church over which he presides, and that the members of the church, as being the members of his body, have their sonship in his Sonship, their life in his life, their righteousness in his righteousness, and their heirship jointly with his, to an inheritance of glory. In what other way we can be sons or heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, we cannot conceive. In the election of grace all his people were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, and their eternal life was and still is hid with him in God. In the divine purpose, so far as that purpose is made known to us, our God ordained to manifest the body of Christ in all its members, by a first and second birth; provided for them through the first and second Adam. Through the generations of the first (in the order of their development) in Adam, they were partakers of flesh and blood, in which they were subjects of the law under which Adam was created and under which he fell; so that in Adam all die; and in their Adamic nature they were all children of wrath, even as others; but in their regeneration and new birth by, and through the second Adam, which is the Lord from heaven, they are made partakers of the divine nature, are washed from all pollutions, and cleansed from all guilt, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost.

Hereafter, we propose to treat on the new birth as taught in the word and experienced personally by the saints.

REGENERATION, NEW BIRTH, &C.

REPLY TO AMOS FOX.

THE first subject in order may be stated thus: What is the difference, if any, between regeneration, the new birth, and conversion? By regeneration, we understand that work of the spirit of God, by which the subjects of divine grace are quickened from a state of death in trespasses and sins into spiritual life. In this work that life which was given them in Jesus Christ before the world began, is communicated to them by the instantaneous operation of the Holy Ghost. This work is as independently and emphatically the sovereign work of God, as was the creation of the world, and consequently admits of no instrumentality or secondary causes of any kind, quantity or quality whatever. "When it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, to reveal his Son in me, straightway I conferred not with flesh and blood." Regeneration brings its subjects into that state wherein the subject is alive to spiritual sensations; being quickened, he can realize something of the holiness of the law, of his sinful state, of the mountain of his guilt, the justice of his condemnation; of his utter inability to appease the wrath or cancel the demands of the law of God. Though ushered, by regeneration, into a new condition, so that he feels, sees, hears and understands things very differently from what he ever did before, yet he cannot see how God, can sustain his justice short of executing on him the sentence of the law. The opening to the understanding of the poor, distressed, quickened soul, the joys of his salvation, to bring him to the experience of the forgiveness of sins, to remove the load of his guilt, to hush the thunders of Mount Sinai, and to open to him the blissful portals of light, life, joy and immortality, is what we mean by the new birth.

In the new birth the laboring soul is set at liberty; is born into light, love and peace; into a new element, new joys, new desires and new exercises; "old things are passed away, and all things are become new;" the terrors have subsided, the thunders have ceased; joy succeeds the smart, and the whole soul is absorbed in the love of God - love to God, to his word, to his people, his ordinances, and to all things lovely in the divine estimation. This gracious work qualifies a man to see, the kingdom of God; but this alone does not bring him into that kingdom; he was a member of the spiritual kingdom before, but of the visible he is not a member until he takes on him the yoke of Jesus in the ordinance of baptism.

Conversion is a term which may be applied to any change either in men or things. Regeneration and the new birth are certainly a conversion, because a change is effected; but many conversions may take place where there is no saving change wrought. Thus we have in a brief way expresses our views on the first items of the inquiry.

THE REGENERATION.

Since the publication of brother J. F. Johnson's communication on the subject of regeneration, we have received several letters from brethren, some approving and others querying as to the correctness of his position. We are inclined to believe that his views have not been perfectly understood by all our readers. If we have correctly understood him, his views on the subject of the new birth differ not from the views generally held by all sound Old School Baptists, namely, that every one of God's chosen people are in time quickened by the Holy Spirit, and born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. That the personal experience of the saints, in being delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the marvelous light and liberty of the sons of God, is what is in the New Testament called being born again. Not that our earthly nature is born over again and made spiritual and holy, for this every child of God knows is not the case; but that life and immortality which was given them in Jesus Christ is by a spiritual birth brought into manifestation. As our earthly nature was brought into manifestation by our natural birth, yet so that, that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and continues to be flesh, after the new birth has developed in them the new man, which after God (Christ, not after Adam) is created in righteousness and true holiness. That which is born of the Spirit is Spirit, not renewed flesh, nor human nature revised, new-modeled or reconstructed. The flesh which is born of the flesh and the spirit which is born of the Spirit both exist in the Christian so long as he continues in the flesh, and they not only are not the same, in nature or parentage, but they are essentially different in all respects. The one is natural, the other spiritual; the one is human, the other is divine; the one mortal, the other immortal; the one cannot sin because it is born of God, and is incorruptible, the other cannot be subject to the law of God, because it is carnal and depraved. The one is life, the other is death; the one is to be put on, the other to be put off. The one knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God, which can only be spiritually discerned, and the other searches all things, even the deep things of God. The one is Christ in you the hope of glory; the other is Adam, and sin and pollution in you. These are not only in every way distinct and dissimilar, but they are in direct and deadly hostility to each other. They who by the first and second birth, like the Shulamite, in the Canticles, present in each saint the belligerent elements of two armies. The flesh wars against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other, and a perpetual warfare is the result until the dissolution of the flesh and triumph of the Spirit, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life.

But while it is conceded that the saints of all ages are personally and experimentally subjects of the new birth, as defined in the foregoing remarks, it is held that the Scriptures in no case apply the word regeneration to this birth. The word regeneration occurs but twice in the Bible, and in both instances it is believed to be applied to the death, burial and resurrection of Christ as the Head and embodiment of his church. After describing the inefficiency of sacrifices and offering which were made under the law, Christ is heard to say, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." And in so coming to do what the law could not, in that it was weak through the flesh, he says, "But a body hast thou prepared me (Hebrews 10:5)." And in Hebrews 2:16, it is declared: "for verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham." And in Galatians 3:29, "And if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage (Hebrews 2:15,16)." Here we have the profound mystery which is without controversy. "God is manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, preached among the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." And an apostle declares that he is an anti-christ who shall deny that Christ is come in the flesh. The great object of his assumption of our flesh was to offer up that body, as demanded by the law, and required by inflexible justice. "He was made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of children." In this identity with his church, which is his body, he was delivered for our offences. Baptized deep in death, all the billows of divine wrath went over him, and the grave closed upon him. And his love constrained us because we thus judge, that if one died for all (all that body which he took) then were all dead. "Crucified with Christ." "Put to death in the flesh." Yielding to law and justice all the jots and tittles which they demanded. Here in the sacrifice that life which was demanded was given up, and that death which was denounced was endured. But "he was raised again for our justification." Not by restoration of that body to primeval innocence, but by being quickened by the Spirit of Immortality, a resurrection life over which sin and death can never exert a dominion. Death is from his resurrected body abolished, and immortality is brought to light in the resurrection. Thus, "God, who is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us [or made us alive] together with Christ, and hath raised us up together with him (Ephesians 2:4-6)." Thus in the mediatorial offering the law has its full demand, and lawful captives are redeemed; their relation to the law is dead, and they are dead to the law by the body of Christ, that they should be married to him who is risen from the dead and participate in his immortal resurrection life. "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead [not by the mortality of Adamic animation, but] by the glory of the Father [the immortality of the self-existent and eternal Godhead], even so we also should walk [or be quickened and animated by, and] in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also of resurrection." Omitting the supplied words, the above is a correct rendering. "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin. Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him. Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord (Romans 6:3-1 1)." We might follow the arguments of the apostle through this and the next chapter, and indeed throughout the whole epistle. In confirmation of the doctrine of the identity of the church, or body of Christ with him, is his death, burial and resurrection, which is so strikingly set forth as a baptism into death and resurrection to a new, spiritual, immortal life, which is born of God and not of the flesh. It sustains the same relation to God that the immortality of Christ sustains to him. Almost a literal repetition of these arguments and illustrations are also found in Colossians 2:10-15.

In the doctrine thus far stated, we apprehend no serious disagreement among Old School, or Bible Baptists. Where the word regeneration, as used but twice in the Scriptures, is applicable to this circumcision of Christ, and crucifixion of the old man, baptism into death and resurrection of the church in Christ in new immortal life, or to the personal individual experience of the children of God, is the question on which there may be some difference of opinion. The word regeneration occurs in Titus 3:5, signifying not only a cleansing which only the blood of Christ could possibly effect, but also an inspiration of a new spiritual life which is shed upon the church, through Christ our Savior, and in this new life we are justified, and made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. First, the apostle declares what we once were, that is, in that earthly Adamic nature in which we were held guilty and condemned by the law, which life was under the law, married to the law, and which life the law demanded, and which was yielded up in the circumcision of Christ, so that all the members of Christ were buried with Christ by baptism into his death, became dead to the law, and in his resurrection life the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of Immortality, was abundantly shed on us, through Jesus Christ our Savior; that being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. This atoning work, wherein we are redeemed from our relation to the earthly Adam, and from the tribes and kindred of the earth, and quickened with the life and immortality of Christ, was indispensable to our being made heirs. In our earthly relations we could only be heirs to an earthly inheritance. But Christ was made of a woman, made under the law to redeem us from under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And if sons, in this new relationship to God, in Christ, then heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; and hence we are made heirs according to the hope of eternal life, in distinction from the mortal life of our earthly generation in the earthly Adam. "For this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." Our generation in Adam makes us heirs of sin and corruption; but our regeneration in the life and immortality of the Son of God makes us heirs of an inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, and which is according to the hope of eternal life. This hope of eternal life, which God who cannot lie promised before the world began, comes not to us by or through our regeneration in Adam, but by and through our regeneration in Jesus Christ.

Let us now inquire, is this death and resurrection of Christ, and of his church in him, set forth in the light of a regeneration in the Scriptures? Generation, whether natural or spiritual, is understood to involve begetting, conception and birth, by which the life of the progenitor is brought into manifestation in a posterity. Generation cannot be applied to the eternal Godhead, for that is underived, unbegotten, self existent and eternal; but it is applied to Christ in his mediatorial identity, as the Son of God and Head of the church.

By a miraculous conception, the Word was made flesh when he took on him the seed of Abraham, and was made under the law to redeem his people. In this generation he was made a little lower than the angels for the sufferings of death, and having accomplished that suffering, the exceeding greatness of God's mighty power was wrought in him, in raising him from the dead, and in setting him far above all principalities and powers. That exceeding greatness of the power of God is thus declared by God himself. "I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee (Psalm 2:7)." What day? Dr. Gill, we believe, says it was the day of eternity; but an inspired apostle testifies thus: "And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made to the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us, their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is written in the second Psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee (Acts 13:32,33)." "John to the seven churches which are in Asia, grace be unto you, and peace from him which is, and which was, and which is to come, and from the seven spirits which are before the throne; and from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, and the first begotten from the dead (Revelations 1:5)." God "hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the world: who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee? And again, I will be unto him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son? And again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he said, And let all the angels of God worship him (Hebrews 1:1-6)."

In this begetting Christ from the dead, we are told that he was raised up by the glory of the Father, which we understand to be the life and immortality of the eternal Godhead, "the power of an endless life." "Put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit." This was spoken of by the prophet, "the spirit of the Lord God is upon me," etc. And was typified by the precious ointment poured on the head of Aaron, which ran down his beard and descended to the skirt of his garment, thus anointing both the Head and the Body of Christ. It was predicted, "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord. My spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and forever (Isaiah 59:20,21)." In this regeneration, that life which was with the Father and was given to the members of Christ in him, is by the resurrection of Christ made manifest. In his resurrection from the dead he has abolished death and brought life and immortality to light, and God in the exceeding greatness of his mighty power to usward, which he wrought in Christ in raising him from the dead, hath quickened us together with him, and hath raised us up together, as the legitimate children of the resurrection, as a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people. When he was begotten from the dead by the glory or immortality of the Father, his children in him were and are "Begotten again to a lively [living or vital] hope by the resurrection of Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God [the power of an endless life], through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed at the last time." "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot: Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you. Who by him do believe in God that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God (I Peter 1:18-21)."

To our understanding this begetting from the dead in him who from the dead has the pre-eminence as the first born of the dead, is called the regeneration, in which all the chosen of God are redeemed from that corruptible nature which they received by their natural generation, and by the resurrection of Christ begotten again to a lively hope to eternal life and to an incorruptible inheritance and immortal glory.

That Christ was begotten and born from the dead is so clearly stated in the word as to forbid all controversy on the subject, and that he was raised up as the embodiment of his church, as his body, as a perfect man, the fullness of him that filleth all in all, and perfectly filling up the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, Head and body, and all his members, is confirmed by its exact conformity to the prophecy of Isaiah. "Who hath heard such a thing? Who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? Or shall a nation be born at once? For as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children (Isaiah 66.8)."

"T'was for his saints Christ tasted death,
All glory to his name;
And when he breath'd his dying breath,
With him his saints o'ercame.

Since Jesus slept among the dead,
His saints have nought to fear,
For with their glorious suffering Head
His members sojourned there.

When from the dead we see him rise,
Triumphant o'er his foes,
He bore his members to the skies;
With Jesus they arose."

Viewed in her identity with Christ, the church which is his body was not left behind when he arose from the dead; the doors of death were opened, and the portals of immortality were entered. Death and the grave were vanquished, and he who was delivered for our offences arose for our justification. The church of God is redeemed; the law holds no further dominion over her; her life is now with Christ in God, and she sits with him in heavenly places, and all his redeemed must in due time follow him experimentally in this regeneration.

With him on the cross, and in the tomb, they shall all be in experimental fellowship with his sufferings here, and participate in his glory hereafter in a world without end.

REGULAR BAPTISTS.

MR. SANDS, of the Religious Herald, Richmond, Va., in remarking upon a letter of Mr. John Ogilive, says that "Winchester, the sixth town in the state (Va.) in commercial importance, and the seventh in point of population, has never had a Regular Baptist Church. A small anti-mission body has existed for several rears, exercising no influence on the community, and has now we presume become extinct."

It would seem from this extract that no church is considered regular unless she unites in the missionary operations of the New School Baptists. We believe the Baptist Church at Winchester is among the oldest churches in the State of Virginia, and for more than half a century has been recognized as a member of the Ketocton Association, and at the last (77th) session of that body represented eighty-four members under the pastoral care of Eld. Wm. Marven.

If modern missionism is to be the test of regularity, what claim had the primitive churches of our Lord Jesus Christ to that distinction? Or, what claim had any church in the State of Virginia to the standing of a regular Baptist Church forty years ago? According to the standard of decision set up by the New School party, there were no regular Baptist Churches in the apostolic age – none until the missionary touch of the nineteenth century was given by the inventive genius of men.

If the Baptist Church at Winchester has exercised no influence on the community, how has she provoked the wrath of the New School? Why did their hired mendicant, Crane, complain of their existence in a late number of the Religious Herald?

Mr. Ogilive publishes that the meeting-house of the Old School Baptist Church at Winchester has been recently purchased by Mr. Joseph Baker, a clergyman of the New School order; and the editor of the Herald seems to exult in the embarrassment of the church which compelled them to sell their meeting-house to cancel the debts that were held against it. So much for New School benevolence. We doubt not that they would gladly dispossess every Old School Church in the United States of its place of worship, if it were in their power. Mr. Baker has hitherto professed to be an. Old School Baptist himself, but has uniformly acted with the New School party, and by his tact at changing his colors, has been able, to some extent, to sow discord among some of the members of the Winchester Church. The discords produced through his instrumentality, have unquestionably contributed largely, if not entirely, to the production of the embarrassment of the church, which has compelled them at length to relinquish their meeting-house.

But let not the New School exult; let not the disciples of Jesus despond; God will overrule this event and all others for the good of his people, and the declarative glory of his great name. The New School propose to hold a protracted meeting at Winchester, and to have it conducted by some of their most efficient spirits; they will undoubtedly make converts enough to form a party, and if there be any rotten materials in the old church, the new party will present such attractions as will be likely to draw them out; while the depression of the old party, being driven from their old place of worship to hold their meetings in. private rooms or in the open air, will favor the sifting, and render the church, more pure The line of discrimination will be drawn between those whose faith stands in the wisdom of men, and those whose faith stands in the power of God. We rejoice in the stability manifested by the church in her hour of trial, that she will give up her meeting-house and suffer reproach rather than yield the ground of truth, or sell her order for the smiles of the enemy or golden bribes which are held out to her. Let the saints not be disheartened: “They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion that cannot be removed.”

REIGN OF DEATH.

BROTHER E. E. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, has requested our views on Rom. v. 14. “Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam’s transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come.”

In presenting the deliverance of the church from the dominion and wrath of the law, and establishing her justification upon the atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ, the apostle in this place dwells with great beauty and comfort on the two headships - Adam and Christ. The fact being established that Adam was a type of Christ, by the record handed down of the creation of the world, that God made man in his own likeness, image, &c., and that that image was not in all its bearings completed until man had followed the woman in the transgression, and had “become as one of us,” knowing good and evil. Had the likeness in which Adam was created consisted, as some have supposed, in righteousness and true holiness, he would have been spiritual, and consequently immutable; and therefore could not have fallen. He was never designed to be like his Maker in the peculiar perfections of the divine nature, for that would have been to make him a god and not a man. Nor could he have been like God in point of holiness, as immutability, omnipotence, eternity and self-existence are essential attributes of the Holy One; these holy qualities man did not originally possess; and the apostle Paul, inspired by God himself, declares that Adam was not spiritual. By the terms likeness of God, and image of God, we are therefore to understand that Adam is the figure of him that was to come. An image or likeness is a figure or type; the terms in this case are perfectly synonymous, and are used as convertible terms throughout the scriptures.

The two very lucid communications in this number on this part of our subject, written by brethren Flint, of Ohio, and West, of Pennsylvania, will supercede the necessity of our tracing the general analogy of the figure. It will suffice, in this place, to repeat what has often been insisted on in our paper, viz: that Adam, as the head and representative of all the human race, comprising the entire family of mankind in himself as he came from the hand of his Maker, was a lively figure of that spiritual Head and representative of the whole spiritual family which were created in him; who in a spiritual life is the beginning of the creation of God, and the first-born of every creature; and who being set up - from everlasting, did contain in himself a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a peculiar people, to which people the Psalmist says he has been a dwelling-place in all generations, even from everlasting, &c. As therefore all the natural life of all his posterity was created in Adam, and all the long succession of generations down from him to the end of time will develop or bring into formation no more human beings or life than what were created in Adam, so neither will length of days, use of means, or powers on high, or powers below, bring forward one single soul, in the scale of spiritual being, that was not fully represented in Christ before the heavens were garnished by his hand; or one particle of spiritual life, light, joy or faith that was not hid with Christ in God from the ancients of eternity. Therefore in regard to the people of God, when they are born into this world by ordinary generation they are quickened into that natural life in which they were created and represented in the natural Adam; but when they are born again they are quickened by extraordinary generation by the Holy Ghost, with spiritual life, in which they were created in Christ Jesus before the world began. “That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.” “As is the earthy, such are they that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.”

In the subject under consideration the apostle shows the application of the atonement to all the spiritual seed of Christ, by the figure of Adam's involving his whole natural posterity in death by his transgression. "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. For until the law sin was in the world, (that is, prior to the giving of the law by Moses,) but sin is not imputed where there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." Is it not easy to perceive the design of the apostle's argument in this connection? To Adam God gave a law in the day of his creation, describing the extent of his liberty, and the penalty for exceeding such limitation. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." As we have shown that all the natural seed, or human family, were in the loins of Adam when he was created under the law, when he received the law, and when he transgressed the law, so we prove that all the human family were created under that law, they all received it, they all transgressed it, and consequently death passed on them all, because all had sinned.

"Death was the sentence - death began
To take possession of the man;
His unborn race received the wound,
And heavy curses smote the ground."

Those who lived from Adam to Moses were sinners, and subject to and under the reigning dominion of death, although they had not personally sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression; and this was a proof that all were involved in the guilt of Adam's sin, for until, or before, the law, which Moses gave, sin was in the world; but as sin could not be imputed where there was no law, the imputation of sin and death to them anterior to the law by Moses, shows their identity with Adam in the sin and in the curse. By the similitude of Adam's transgression, we understand the likeness, or in the same manner; for it was beyond the power of man, from Adam to Moses, to sin as Adam sinned. Where there is no law there can be no transgression. To understand correctly a similitude, we must examine the original. Adam's sin consisted in a transgression of a law which God had given him in express terms. "Thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." With a perfect understanding of this law, (for Adam was not deceived,) he ate of the forbidden fruit; but from Adam to Moses, (a lapse of about 2300 years,) neither the law that Adam had transgressed, nor that which Moses brought, had been by any authorized proclamation enjoined on the sons of men. That given to Adam was for a test of creature perfection; it had accomplished this, and there remained no further necessity for its promulgation. Hence the very existence of sin and death in the world from Adam to Moses established the point for which Paul contended, viz: that they were not held under the reigning power of sin and death by personally eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; but that by one offence, many were made sinners, and by the disobedience of one man, &c. The original transgression of Adam was therefore the transgression of all his natural seed, and the dreadful sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return," was as emphatically passed on all that Adam represented as on himself personally.

The apostle further continues the subject in this chapter, showing that the Sinai covenant, or the law of Moses, was not added either as a test of creature excellency or as a way of life; for all human excellency was prostrated in the original violation of divine authority, and man irretrievably (by human power or providence) consigned to the curse and to the dark domain of death. But Paul adds, "Moreover the law entered that the offence might abound," &c. Not that offences might abound, nor that man should become a greater sinner. There could have been no call for such an entrance; but as by the law is the knowledge of sin, so the law which was given on Sinai, which Paul says was holy, just and good, showed that we were carnal, i. e., fleshly, or having a fleshly nature derived from Adam, and consequently sold under sin. Hence also the law, emanating from and being, to some extent at least, a transcript of the perfections of God, shows sin to be exeedingly sinful, as the plumb-line and the rule will show the imperfection of a defective piece of work. The plumb-line does not make the work or building disproportionate, but shows the enormity of the fault. Thus also in the christian's experience, "I was alive once without the law; but when the commandment came, sin revived (or abounded) and I died." "I had not known sin except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet."

Finally, in the concluding clause of the text, the apostle gives us to understand very definitely the object of his tracing so minutely all the prominent features of the man Adam, as the head of mankind, viz: he is the figure of him that was to come. As he and the natural posterity which he represented could not be separated in the transgression, guilt and consequences of eating the forbidden fruit, so neither is it possible to divide between Christ and his spiritual seed, body, bride, or church; and as the one offence of one man, legally representing all natural men, involved them, legally, justly and indiscriminately, in the ruin of his apostacy, so the obedience of one, even the man Christ Jesus, as necessarily, as legally, and emphatically must extend deliverance to all the spiritual family.

From the letter of brother Hawkins, which we intend to publish hereafter should opportunity serve, we conclude there is some difference between us and some of our western brethren on the subject of the headships, and of the seeds which they respectively represent. Where our Lord says that certain characters are not of God; that they are from beneath, of their father the devil, &c., we understand him to speak not of their creation; but of the spirit by which they are actuated, and of their spiritual relation to the prince of darkness; of their utter destitution of any part or lot in the provisions of the gospel, or the inheritance of the saints. Serpents, vipers, goats and wolves are used figuratively to set forth their fixed opposition to God and the economy of his grace. And when our Lord says, "I am from above, and my kingdom is from above, Jerusalem which is above or coming down from God out of heaven," &c., he alludes to the spiritual life and grace given to the people of the saints in him before the world began. Both the elect and reprobate of mankind are on an even level in their Adamic natures, hence their bodies are alike corruptible; but the heaven-born child is born of God; a life which is hid with Christ in God is communicated to him, Christ dwells within him the, hope of glory. All others of the human stock are under the influence of that spirit which is from beneath; and the ministers of anti-christ are from these considerations called the angels of the devil, the children of the devil, serpents, scorpions, vipers, &c.

RELATIONSHIP OF GOD'S PEOPLE TO GOD IN CHRIST.

ELDER BEEBE – DEAR FRIEND: – Are not all whom God predestinated to himself {I mean to be saved} before the foundation of the world, just as much his children before their hearts are changed here, {or before they are born again} as after they are changed? Though they are steeped in sin, are they not his children just the same? Please answer me through the SIGNS, as I do not wish my name mentioned. By so doing you will confer a favor on one who wishes and tries to do right, but falls far short.

REPLY. The relationship of God's people to God, is in Christ Jesus, as their Mediatorial head; and that, as we understand the scriptures, was complete and indissoluble from everlasting. But this is a relationship of life which is entirely spiritual. "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." I John 5:11. In the Son of God, therefore, the relationship of life was complete before the world began.

God as our Creator also gave us a seminal existence in the earthly Adam, and in him called our name Adam in the day we were created. Gen. 5:2. "And Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living." Gen. 3:20. And this name for this cause was given her before any of her children were born.

But still it was necessary that we should be born of the flesh to develop this relation to our first parents. And it is also indispensable that as children of God we should in due time be born of the Spirit, to develop our spiritual relationship to God.

The peculiar statement of the question renders it difficult for one of only a very limited understanding of the scriptures to give a categorical answer. If we were as much, or as fully children, before we were born, as subsequently, then our birth could have contributed nothing to make us children.

Our understanding is that a child of the first Adam must be born of the flesh to establish the relationship. And if any man have not the Spirit of God, {which he cannot have until he is born of the Spirit} he is none of his. But, “as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God.”

The great and all important question with us is, Have we the Spirit of Christ? Are we led by that Spirit? For if we are in possession of these, we can confidently leave all the rest in the hands of God.

RELATIVE DUTIES OF PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

HOPKINSVILLE, March 9, 1841.

DEAR SIR: - I should like to hear from you on an all-important subject to us in this country, which is, The duty of the laity to the clergy. We have gone as far upon one extreme as the New School have upon the other, and are letting our ministers starve temporally, whilst they are ministering to our spiritual wants. If they neglect their stated appointments, there is a great hue and cry to know what is the matter. We do not first inquire if we have done our duty; we seem to want them to have no natural affection for their dear families. I might say a great deal on this subject, but I shall leave it with you, hoping you will let us hear from you.

I subscribe myself your brother, in hope of eternal life,
H. C. CATLETT.

REPLY: WE discard from our vocabulary the words laity and clergy, coined by Popish prelates, and adapted only to such as are more aristocratic than Old School Baptists. We should prefer the statement of the query thus: "What is the duty of the members of the church of Christ towards those whom God has called to labor in the ministry of his gospel?

Some remarks on this truly important subject may be adapted to other meridians than that of our brother in Kentucky. There are many relative duties devolving upon the children of God, in their social connection with each other, and there are many obligations binding upon the saints in relation to their pastors, besides that of communicating to their pecuniary support; but as this latter is the particular duty to which brother C. has called our attention, we will show our opinion. As in every other matter, even so in this, we are bound by our allegiance to the King of Zion to take the New Testament as the rule of our faith and practice.

In several of his epistles, Paul quoted two passages of scripture upon this very point; the one Dent. xix. 15, and the other the words of Christ, Matt. x. 10. The former reads thus: “Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn.” Upon this precept of the ceremonial law, the apostle in his official character, on one of the twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, (of the spiritual Israel,) has rendered the decisive judgment from which no disciple of Christ can appeal. His inspired illustration of the figure is thus recorded, (1 Cor. ix. 9 - 14) “Doth God take care for oxen? or saith he it altogether for our sakes I For our sakes, no doubt, this was written, that he that plougheth should plough in hope, and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope. If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?” Again, “Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things, live (or feed) of the temple . and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar?”

The other quotation made by Paul to Timothy, v. 18, (from Matt. x. 10.) is, “For the workman is worthy of of his meat.” That all these instances are directly applicable to to the question before us, is demonstrated thus:

First. Christ addressed his words to a company of gospel pioneers, when in the act of sending them forth to preach his gospel among his and their enemies, as lambs in the midst of wolves; indicating to them, that as he sent them without purse or scrip, and where they could reasonably look for no favor, he would display those signs and wonders that should attend his gospel, by opening the hearts of those among whom they should minister, to supply them with what was needful.

Second. In connection with his argument, (1 Cor. ix) Paul glories in that he has not in preaching the gospel availed himself of these privileges, which he had a right to claim at the hands of his brethren; for he says, “Who goeth a warfare at his own charges? Who planteth a vineyard and eateth not of the fruit thereof? Who feedeth a flock and eateth not or the milk of the flock? Say I these things as a man or saith not the law the same things?” And then produces those passages of the law to which allusion has been made.

Finally. His words (Gal. vi. 6; also Rom. xv. 27) cannot be easily misconstrued: “Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things.” Not, as some narrow-minded, penurious professors have been wont to interpret this apostolic injunction, to communicate to those who teach them in the word, of their lean things, or, in other words, to simply communicate the bare necessaries of life, to prevent their preacher from actually starving to death; but Paul commands that they communicate in all good things.

We cannot, without doing violence to the word, suppose that the churches are to make lords of their ministering servants; to rob themselves and families of the comforts of life, in order to pamper and enrich their preachers, to make merchandise of them, or of the gospel; nor that they are to withhold from them such things as they themselves enjoy. We understand the obligation to involve an imperative duty to make the ministering servants of Jesus as comfortable in the enjoyment of carnal things, as those are to whom they minister in spiritual things. The duties of minister and people are reciprocal; if the minister does not labor to feed the flock of God on the sincere milk of the word, on the best and most glorious things of the Spirit, into which the Lord has instructed him, we would suppose him unworthy to participate in the enjoyment of the best carnal things his brethren could bestow.

Ministers and brethren in general, are all called stewards. Titus i. 7, 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2, 1 Peter iv. 10. In those cases referred to in Titus and Corinthians, ministers are intended; and in 1 Peter, all the household of faith are called stewards. All, therefore, that we possess, whether spiritual or temporal, is the Lord's; and we ourselves are his; hence when the servant of Jesus is divinely enabled to feed the sheep and lambs of his dear flock, he feeds them as the Lord's stewards, and deals out to them of the good things God has provided for them: so also the brethren, in supplying the ministers, and also the flock, with the comforts of this life, are only acting as God's chosen stewards, over those things which he has appointed them stewards of. We wish not to confine the stewardship of the saints to carnal things, for Peter extends it to the manifold grace of God.

There is, probably, too much occasion for the assertion of brother C., that we have gone to as great an extreme on one hand, as the New School have on the other; but this remark, we trust, can only apply to some sections of country; and the best apology we can frame for such of the Old School as have erred, is, that they have been so much disgusted with the greedy avarice of the anti-christian retailers of abomination, the life, and soul, and body of whose faith and practice is their love of filthy lucre, that, to avoid giving the least countenance to such, they have in some instances failed to come up to the plain requisitions of the New Testament. Nor is this fault to be laid altogether at the door of the churches; the ministers themselves have in many instances refused to receive that support which the brethren would willingly giver from fear of being like the hirelings of anti-christ; and churches after having become accustomed to feeding their pastors on good wishes, are apt to adopt the sentiment, "If the Lord will keep their preachers humble, they will keep them poor."

We are no advocate for stateed salaries. We do not believe in preaching by the day, by the month, or by virtue of any contract between the preacher and his people. To us, it appears more scriptural for the ministers to preach the preaching that the Lord bids them, as he bids them, when and where he bids them. This is incumbent on them; and this they will do, if they are called of God to the work; and if their brethren neglect to discharge their duties toward them, leave the case with the Lord. The Lord will either stir them up to faithfulness, or in his holy providence open some other door; perhaps they may be furnished with a job at tent making, or something else, by which they will ultimately be provided for. The Lord has commanded them, "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Their heavenly Father knoweth they have need of these things; and he that adorns the lilly, feeds the raven, and numbers the hairs of their heads, is able and willing to supply all they need.

Neither the churches nor individual brethren should wait for their ministers to call upon them for support; they ought to act from nobler principles; for while the emissaries of Satan are bold in their appeals for aid, the humble disciple of Jesus is more modest, more diffident on this subject, than on any other. At this peculiarly trying time in Zion, the children of God ought, as far as God has prospered them in the things of this world, to endeavor to loosen the hands of the ministers of Christ, to free them from the harrassing and perplexing cares of this life, that as far as possible, they may be engaged in visiting the destitute branches of Zion. We have known some instances where professors of religion that were rich in the things of this world, have lavished high encomiums upon their ministers, while they were by no means too forward in communicating to their comfort. We speak not in reference to any with whom we stand immediately connected; our lot has always been cast among generous and kind brethren; but we have felt a deep sympathy for some of our contemporaries situated among a more penurious and niggardly people.

Finally, We hold these truths to be self evident - The ministers of the cross should go forth and feed the flock of Christ in all the faithfulness and patience they are in possession of, and leave the matter of support for themselves and dependent families entirely to God and their brethren; and on the other hand, we hold it as a binding duty on the church, to sustain the ministers, so far as God has In his providence made them stewards of the good things of this life, not grudgingly, but of a ready mind; and those who would not feel a real pleasure in doing this, we honestly believe, act in a manner unworthy of the sacred name of Old School Baptists.

RELIABLE EVIDENCE

Dear Brother Beebe: I have thought for some time of writing for the Signs of the Times and have made the attempt two or three times, but not finding it convenient to send it to the office immediately, on a subsequent perusal committed it to the flames, which in all probability will be the fate of this.

I have been reading with interest recently in the Signs of the Times some calculations in relation to the time of "Slaying the two witnesses," which may be all very correct. I do not profess to know much about it, but it has been the cause of some reflections which, to my mind, is of more importance to poor fallen, perishing sinners than as to "When these things shall be." It is to know whether we are prepared for the great result treated on, or whether we are prepared to meet our God. O! solemn thought! Me! a poor sinful reprobate, who was born a sinner, have been but only evil all the time! Yet, some times I hope the Lord, for Christ's sake, has pardoned my sins; and, ever since that time, if indeed he has extended to me so great a boon, my life has been a life of up and down, down most of the time. Am I prepared for that great and awful meeting? Brother Beebe, have we (old fashioned Baptists, I mean) been as prayerful as we should have been? Have we been as circumspect in our walk and conversation? Have we been as devoted to the service of God, and our own best interest, as we have been to Mammon, the peif of this world? Let each of us examine ourselves, and come to judgment in our own cases, and with one voice we would cry, Guilty before God! And be compelled to say, "My punishment, though great, is not as severe as I deserve." Can we then look for any thing from the Lord but chastisement? Has he not said, if his children neglect his law, and walk not in his statutes, "I will visit their transgressions with a rod, and their iniquities with stripes." But then he has said for the comfort of his children, "Nevertheless, my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail." He will bring his children off more than conquerors through him that loveth them. Is it not, brother Beebe, a much more important enquiry for us to make, Am I interested in the atoning blood of the Saviour of sinners, than as to when these things should be? Could not some of the fathers, Trott, Rittenhouse, Johnson, Power, Owen, or yourself, who write so well, tell us something of the way-marks along the road that leads to heaven and immortal glory, that we poor ignorant stumblers may arrive at some thing of a certainty as to whether we are in the way - whether we have started right - and which is the right road - tell us whether we have an interest there as a son, or a daughter - and whether we will finally rest in his embraces? If our claim to heaven and immortal glory is good, then come wars, come trouble of any kind - come that final dissolution of all things earthly, while we are in the embraces of our blessed Jesus, all is well - for he has all power given him both in heaven and earth, - and he has said, "Father I will that they which thou hast given me may be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory." Will not that be enough, to be where Jesus is, and to behold his glory? Brother Beebe, I feel as though to publish this in the Signs of the Times will be excluding more interesting matter, therefore, do with it as seemeth good to you, and all will be right with your friend, and I sometimes hope, brother.

REPLY: Nothing can be of more vital importance to the saints than a reliable evidence of a personal interest in the blood and righteousness of our Lord Jesus Christ; and next to that evidence that we be found endeavoring to observe all things whatsoever Christ our King has commanded us; as our evidences of acceptance with God through our Lord Jesus Christ can not afford us peace and comfort, if we find not in our hearts a paramount desire to glorify God in our body and spirit, which are his. If we are indeed quickened by the spirit of immortality we can not live without aspirations after holiness; therefore, we have reason to doubt the validity of any evidence of a glorious state in the absence of a hungering and thirsting after righteousness. But while it is enjoined on the saints to examine themselves, whether they be in the faith, and that they add to their faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity; it is also most solemnly enjoined on them that they should observe the "signs of the times," and watch the fulfillment of the declarations of prophecy in regard to what the Spirit hath expressly spoken concerning what shall be developed in the last days, both in regard to the saints, and the revelation of the Man of Sin, the son of perdition. We are not prepared to say that our research for the testimony establishing our personal interest in the grace of God is any more important than our attention to the solemn charge which Christ and his apostles have enjoined upon us to watch the indications of the coming of the day of the Lord, which shall come as a thief in the night. Both are commanded by the same authority. The first we should do, and the other we should not leave undone. "Take heed," said Jesus, "that no man deceive you." And Peter exhorts us to be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the "commandments" of us, the apostles of the Lord and Saviour; knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts. Paul also calls attention frequently to the same important charge, "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." But he adds, "Ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." And he has also admonished the saints to forsake not the assembling of themselves together as the manner of some is, but to exhort one another, and so much the more as they should see the day approaching. It is true there are many things said and implied in the figurative language of the book of Revelation, and of the prophet Daniel, and elsewhere, which we may not yet any of us clearly and fully understand; but, should we, therefore, pass them heedlessly? Then for the same reason may we not be excused from searching the scriptures altogether, for who perfectly and fully comprehends any portion of the scriptures? Rather let us, as we feel conscious that we lack wisdom, ask of God, who giveth unto all men liberally, and upbraideth not. To many of our most enlightened brethren there seems to be evident indications of the near approach of the termination of the forty and two months of the prophesying of the Lord's two witnesses in sack-cloth, and of their being slain; and however imperfectly the whole scope of that important subject and its minor details may be understood, it does claim the most profound consideration of all the saints who are looking for and hastening to the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens, being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. "Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye, being led away with the error of wicked, fall from your own steadfastness."

RELIABLE EVIDENCES

Perhaps there is no subject in which the feeble, fearful, trembling, tempted and doubting children of God feel a greater interest than to know what are the scriptural evidences of being in a quickened and regenerated state; as there can be no subject in which they feel so much concerned. One brother writes that he would be in despair if it were not for one bright spot in his life, alluding to the time when Christ was first revealed to him as his Savior, but recalling to mind his happy frame on that occasion, his hope is frequently revived. In reflecting on this remark, we have felt inclined to enquire, Can it be possible that the brother has never had but one reliable evidence in his long life, that he is a subject of saving grace? We know that it is very natural for us to revert to our first experience when doubts and fears assail our faith and hope in God. We do not object to this calling to mind God's former loving-kindness unto us as evidences of his saving grace. Jeremiah remembered the time of the wormwood and the gall from which God had graciously delivered him, and his hope was thereby revived. But is it right to overlook all other evidences and rely only on the first displays of God's love and mercy to us? To such exclusive reliance we object, because it under rates and overlooks the daily experience of the saints, which, although in many instances they may not be as vivid and satisfactory to us as the first, are equally important and reliable, and should therefore be as fully appreciated, not only for the comfort of the saints, but also for the praise of the glory of God.

Sometimes it tends to be a repudiation of all subsequent evidences as being less conclusive and reliable, or worthless. How many have hung down their heads despairingly, because their first experiences were not so distinctly marked as those of others of whom they have heard or read; and although they can keep even pace with others in every subsequent step of their religious travel, are all their lifetime in bondage, through fear that they have started wrong, and therefore all subsequent experience has been but a delusion.

It may be that the general practice of our churches in the examination of applicants for baptism and membership has been faulty in making the first experiences of the candidate far more important than other exercises. While we love to hear related the more wonderful displays of God's power and grace in bringing sinners to a knowledge of the truth, we should also listen very attentively to the "still small voice" which has whispered peace and salvation to the trembling ones. According to our own observation for more than fifty years in the church of Christ, those who have been the most fearful and trembling have proved the most watchful and prayerful among the followers of Christ. Some have made us doubt the genuineness of their evidences, by the extravagant marvelousness of what they have related, while others who could scarcely say they had a hope have showed such evident marks of the spirit of humility, self-abasement, and fear of being a disparagement to the church, that they have taken every step with the greatest fear and trembling, have given us the more satisfactory evidence of the work of grace wrought in their hearts by the finger of God. But we need not advert to observation, nor to feelings of satisfaction, for we have a more sure word of prophecy or instruction, to which we do well to take heed. The scriptures of truth do not leave us uninformed as to the heaven-stamped and sealed evidences of a quickened state. Let us examine some of them. The case of Philip and the Eunuch (Acts 8:26-39) is in point. Here is an application for the ordinance, and the great question, What doth hinder me to be baptized? is asked. The man of God, who was full of the Holy Ghost, is amply qualified to decide this matter, which concerns all others as well as the Eunuch. How does Philip settle this question? Whatever impediment might be in the way to hinder the Eunuch is still in the way of all others, and whatever qualifications entitled him to the privilege are equally applicable to all others who possess them. Philip did not say, If you can distinctly call to mind your first religious exercises; if you saw the flaming gulf open to receive you; and all your sins were distinctly presented to your terror-stricken soul; if you were held in that distressing state a certain length of time; and can distinctly tell how you felt and what you thought during this time of bitter anguish of your soul; and if you know just when and where and how you were delivered, and how you felt at that time; and if you do not now feel too unworthy to be numbered with the saints. These are not the questions proposed, nor the prerequisites demanded. If they had been, it would have debarred thousands of the precious children of God from that holy ordinance, and perhaps the Eunuch himself would have been rejected. But observe; the only question was as to the then present state of the Eunuch, and not a question was asked in regard to his former exercises of mind. "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." Shall any one now dare impose any other requisite than that which the Holy Ghost, through Philip, then required? That which applied to one equally applies to every subject of grace. But let it be remembered that the question implied more than a former profession of belief. It is not enough that the natural judgment or understanding should assent to the truth, for it is with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. This belief must come from the heart, not the head; for the law of Christ is written in the hearts of the children of God. A new heart is given them, for the old heart is destitute of the faith of the Son of God; and a new spirit is put within them, for their faith is the fruit of the Spirit; if, therefore, the candidate believes with all his heart, it is an infallible testimony that he has received this new heart, and a new Spirit is given him. Now, according to this example, we insist that the church and the administrator should be satisfied that the candidate has passed from death unto life - is born again, and has that full belief in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, which can only result from the faith of Jesus Christ dwelling in his heart.

There are many who without any change of heart, without any love to God, or knowledge of their own lost and helpless condition, with no saving knowledge of God, of Christ, or the way of salvation, may say, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and speaking after the manner of men, they do; that is, they have a traditional belief; knowing no reason why they should disbelieve what they have read or heard others say. But in the case of the Eunuch, there were strong circumstantial evidences that God had wrought this faith in his heart. His mind was directed to the scriptures; he is found reading the book of the prophet Isaiah; he is buried in deep thought; he is earnest to understand the scriptures. He has a thirst for a knowledge of him of whom the prophet wrote, and although a man of high standing, and in great authority, he had a child-like humility, and desired that some one of clearer understanding in divine things should guide him. The minister of Christ is gladly received into his chariot; he has a hearing ear, and an understanding heart, and as he hears of Jesus, as preached by Philip, in his heart receives the testimony, gladly receives the word, and most unwaveringly believes that this Jesus is the Son of God, of whom the prophet testified. Another evidence of his heavenly birth is given in his desire to take on him the yoke of Jesus, to follow him in the ordinance of baptism. Absorbed in thought as he heard of Jesus, and transported with new light upon the subject and theme of prophecy, and attentively listening to the preaching of Jesus by Philip though he was at that time, he did not pass the baptismal waters unnoticed. "See here is water!" Never before had water presented such attraction to his eyes. Wonder, ye heavens! what heavenly beauty his faith discovers in that water; the footprints of his Savior; the bright example for all his children are seen. Did water ever before seem so lovely? The Savior's high command, "If ye love me, keep my commandments," is applied with power. O what a joyful privilege it would be, he may have thought, if I were worthy to follow Jesus in that delightful ordinance! Nay, I cannot be denied, unworthy though I am. Thou man of God, "See here is water! What doth hinder me to be baptized?"

Indeed, we know of no authority in the scriptures for attaching more importance to past than to present evidences of our having passed from death unto life.

The apostle John says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Not because our first evidences were so clear, or strongly marked. Not because we have acted so well our part; not because our natures have become better than they were before, nor because we feel that we are now worthy of a place in the house of God, and communion with his saints; but simply because we love them, and desire to be with them.

And Paul says, "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." The test is not laid on what is past; but what is present. If we are led by the Spirit of God, it will lead us to Jesus; to his work; to his laws; his ordinances; and to his people. It will make us feel that we are very, very unworthy of his favor, and to admire and gaze and wonder at the manner of love which God hath bestowed on us that we should be called the sons of God.

Another present and reliable evidence that we are the children of God is that "God dealeth with us as with sons." "If ye endure chastening," then have ye the evidence. "But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons."

How many present evidences are found in the scriptures of our sonship, and heirship, as sons of God and heirs of glory; and who shall tell us that any one, or all of these are less reliable than the first that we ever received?

We would by no means depreciate or under-value the first evidences which were given us in our new birth; for without that birth we should be forever destitute of all the other evidences. But if we can not find in our first experience the extraordinary exercises that some others can, we are fully warranted in relying on those which our God has seen proper to give us. If because we cannot tell when, where, or under what circumstances we were born into the natural world, would we be reasonable in concluding that we never were born? The very fact that we are now alive is sufficient evidence that there was a time when we began to live. If today we love God, it is because he first loved us. And if we ever have loved him, the evidence is the same, for we could not possibly love him from any other cause.

There is one other evidence we will name, and that is, If we are involved in the Christian warfare, then have we the same evidence of a heavenly birth that Paul had. Until we were born of God, the whole current of our nature ran in one way; our element was sin; it was sweet to our taste, and we drank it like the ox drinketh water. There can be no war where there is but one party. In the Shulamite we see as it were the company of two armies. So in every Christian is seen two opposite determined hostile parties. The one is born of the flesh and is flesh; and he held his palace in peace, without opposition, until another party came to occupy the same house, or person. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. These are opposite one to the other; for the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, and so terribly does the battle sometimes rage that we cannot do the things we would. All who are born of God, but no others, will so long as they are here in the flesh find a law in their fleshly members warring against the law of their mind, which will at times bring them into captivity to the law of sin which is in their members. All the doubts and unbelief that ever assailed or troubled a Christian in regard to his interest in Christ arises from his fleshly nature. Doubts, fears and temptations, unbelief and despondent fears are the artillery of the flesh and of Satan, planted against the law of their mind; but however the faith of God's people may be stormed, faith shall most assuredly triumph ultimately, for God giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Dead fish will float down with the current; only the living fish will stem the tide. Those who never have any conflict can never know the joys of victory. Those who have no temptations cannot appreciate deliverance. And those who have no clouds must live in a very dry pasture.

THE RELIGION OF THE TIMES.

FROM an article copied into the Cross and Journal, we extract the following paragraph, quoted by the writer of the article from an address delivered at Worcester, by "Rev." C. C. Mason:

"The religion of the times demands the existence of such organizations, to teach its professors the great duties they owe to God and to one another. If religion were this hour baptized with the spirit that breathes throughout every branch of the order of the Sons of Temperance, the world would not now witness the horrors of a solitary war. It would then be invested with the spirit of a nobler charity."

If the religion of the times demands the organization of Temperance Societies, with all their kindred institutions of human invention, it is because it differs from the religion of Jesus Christ. That system of religion which the Holy Ghost teaches in the scriptures, and by his operation upon the hearts of God's elect, makes no such demand; but without the aid of humanly devised organizations of any kind whatever – without pledges oral or written, without denouncing any of God's creatures which he has given as blessings, as a curse, the religion of God our Savior teaches us (its happy recipients) that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. We do not, we cannot, we will not dispute that the religion of the times requires to go on crutches, as it is a sorry and lame concern. Based on free-will, boasting of free agency and voluntary humility, it unquestionably requires all the props, stays, screws and bolsters that human ingenuity can invent to keep it alive. But the religion which is from heaven, instead of deriving life and sustenance from its possessors, imparts life, light and liberty to all such as are, by grace, made experimentally acquainted with its power.

If the religion of the times were the religion which exists only among the regenerated heirs of glory, its possessors could never need human devices or organizations to teach them either their relation or duties to their God or to their neighbors.

This Rev. sinner admits that the spirit breathed throughout every branch of the order of the Sons of Temperance is not the spirit of religion. Religion, in his view, would be so greatly improved by being buried into the spirit of this worldly institution, as to restore peace and tranquility, lasting and uninterrupted, to the conflicting nations of the earth. It would then be invested with a noble charity; that is, a charity of a different kind from that with which the christian religion is invested. Compared with the charity of these mushroom societies, the charity of the religion of Christ is regarded as ignoble, defective and inefficient.

RELIGION, RUM AND RUIN!

FROM the Boston Recorder we copy the following remarks as introductory to a very long letter from the South Sea Islands, in which the writer shows that the religion carried thither by American Missionaries, is not proof against temptation, rum and ruin.

"AFFECTING INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

Appended to several of our London Magazines for July, we find a letter addressed to the directors and friends of Bible and Missionary institutions in Great Britain and America, by R. Ferguson, of the British and Foreign Sailor's Society. It is headed "Affecting Intelligence from the South Sea Islands," and is intended to show that all which has been done by Christians in Britain and America, for the Islanders of the Pacific during the last 40 or 50 years, is in danger of being lost in consequence of the vices of British and American seamen who visit the islands, and especially by the introduction of ardent spirits in British and American ships. We copy the letter below, in the hope that it will arrest the attention of those who are best able to devise and apply a remedy to the evil."

REMARKS.

What a pity! The labor, expense and piety of forty or fifty years is likely to be LOST! The cob-house begins to totter to its centre, and an overthrow of missionism on these ill-fated islands seems inevitable. O Baal, Awake! Ye Britains and all ye saintly sons of Columbia, Arouse from your slumbers! Apply the remedy, the best remedy, and that speedily, else will the magnificence of your missionary idol be in danger. Let the governments of America and Great Britain apply the remedy! Let them forthwith supply a mighty fleet, (manned with pious officers and crews) to protect those Islanders from the impending danger; and let them deal out thunderbolts of vengeance and of death to any who may approach these consecrated islands, except they be Sound in the missionary creed. The pious missionaries have toiled forty or fifty years incessantly. Millions of money have probably been spent for the support of these missionaries; and after so much labor, piety and expense, the missionaries have reported the number of their converts - but how can they stay converted unless something can be done to keep sin off the Islands? The missionaries can undoubtedly keep their converts sober if the governments of England and America will prevent their being able to obtain intoxicating drink. They can manage to keep them orderly so long as there are no temptations before them; but to keep them sober and chaste when the temptation is presented, is more than can reasonably be expected from any system of religion ever invented by man since the world began.

What a comment the missionists have in this case furnished on their own delusions. In order to convert the heathen, immense labor, money and time are brought into requisition; and then to keep them converted, the governments of the nations of the earth must interpose their authority, or all that men have done to save souls is lost, utterly lost. As the letter written itself remarks, "But what can be expected, while these poor islander are exposed to temptations and disease brought among them by the notorious crews of the shipping, whose vicious practices cannot fail to subvert and banish every virtuous feeling.

But ere we close these remarks, we wish to call attention to a kind of religion very different in origin, nature and effects: we allude to the Religion of the Lord Jesus Christ; that which eminates from God, not from Mission Societies. That which effects a radical change in those who are favored of God and become the subjects of it, and which can never fail to lead its subjects to desire and pursue after holiness, in life and conversation - that which can meet and resist the fiery temptation, and that which teacheth us to deny ourselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live soberly, righteously and godly in the present world. For we, Old School Baptists, are confident of this very thing, that he that bath begun a good work in us will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ: and that he is able to keep that which we have committed to him against that day. What the Lord doeth is well done, it is done forever; none can add to it or take from it, and the Lord doeth it that men may fear before him.

THE RELIGIOUS EXCITEMENT.

We have been prevented, by sickness and other causes, from noticing the religious panic which has for several weeks prevailed in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston and elsewhere, and which, like an infectious epidemic, has found its way into the villages and rural districts of our northern states, and is hailed by the great mass of will-worshipers and Arminians generally, as the dawning of their long looked for millennium. Like every other development of the man of sin, this outburst of delusion and ranting fanaticism is strongly marked with the mystic names which were written on the forehead of her who sat upon the scarlet colored beast, Rev. xvii. 5, "Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." While this mystery of iniquity shall be clearly distinguished from the pure and undefiled religion of our Lord Jesus Christ, by all who have ears to hear what the Spirit says unto the churches, it is expressly said that they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold this beast that was, and is not, and yet is. (Rev. xvii. 8.) The peculiar development of this mystery of iniquity, is foretold by Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 3-12, as the man of sin, and son of perdition, "Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God." "Even him whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they receive not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." The church of God is, in the book of Revelation, represented as dwelling in heaven, and not on the earth. (Rev. xii. 12.) As standing in the sun. (Rev. xii. 1.) As standing on Mount Sion. (Rev. xiv. 1.) As standing on a sea of glass, in heaven. (Rev. xv. 2.) But the antichristian organizations are represented as dwelling upon the earth. Their origin being earthly, their doctrines, ordinances, signs and wonders, are all of earth. Their names are not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world. Their religion originates in their own earthly nature, and their revivals and excitements differ essentially from those of the saints. Seasons of refreshing descend upon the church of God from the presence of the Lord; but the revivals of antichrist have to be got up. And of this they seem to be aware, for they generally speak of getting up revivals, and of sustaining them by their own human exertions. The present excitement is strongly marked in all these particulars. First, a convention for the purpose is held; a committee of arrangements is appointed, and called the Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. This Association is composed of all such sectarian denominations as can unite in the enterprise, and their committee is authorized to superintend the getting up of the revival. Meetinghouses are thrown open daily, storehouses and even public theatres are also employed for the same purpose, advertisements are published in the daily papers, and cards of invitation are issued, calling on all who want to get religion to attend the meetings from twelve to one o'clock of each day, and three minutes are allowed for each to pray or exhort.

These meetings are called Union Prayer Meetings; but what is united in them? Presbyterians, Methodists, New School Baptists, Congregationalists and the world in general. The novelty of these meetings serve as a charm to draw crowds together, and when thus assembled every human device is resorted to to excite the animal feelings and passions of the weak and nervous; for the religion engendered by them is not that connected with a faith that works by love and purifies the heart; but it is a kind of faith and religion which only works by fear, by terror and excitement, and which corrupts the heart. For it is a notorious fact, that every convert made in these hot-beds of fanaticism, in their conversion imbibe a deeper and more malignant hatred to the truth as it is in Jesus, to God's method of salvation by sovereign grace alone, to the order and ordinances of the church of God, and to the real children of God, and to God's ministers especially, than they ever possessed or evinced before. Like the proselytes made by the ancient pharisees, they make them two-fold more the children of hell.

Are not these things so? What success would be expected at any of these meetings, were the managers of them to cease their efforts to terrify and frighten the people? Nothing is found so effectual as the preaching of fire and brimstone, and death-bed scenes of impenitent sinners, and the unclapping of hell, &c., together with the declaration that this is the last opportunity the unconverted will ever have of getting religion. Hundreds, by this course of treatment, have become so much excited as to deprive them of their reason, and if they have not thereby been fitted for filling up their churches, they have been duly qualified to fill the lunatic asylums. In that salvation which is of God, it is the goodness of God that leads men to repentance; but in these excitement meetings, the terrors of hell and torments of the damned are chiefly relied upon to produce what they call repentance.

Again, the religion which is of God, produces in those who are the subjects of it, a love and reverence for the Scriptures, and a sacred regard for what God has said in his word; but it is a remarkable feature in these modern excitement meetings that the Bible is totally disregarded, so far as respects its testimony. The converters and converted, at these meetings, will laugh you to scorn if you attempt to call their attention to the word and testimony of God. Tell them that God has said in his word that sinners are saved by grace, and not by works; that the new birth is produced, not of a corruptible seed, but of an incorruptible; that it is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God, and what respect will they show to this divine testimony? We might as well read to them an almanac as an inspired message from Jehovah.

Their whole machinery moves upon the presumption that every man has the power to save himself, and that if he neglects to use his power for that purpose, God himself cannot save him. This declaration has frequently been made at these excitement meetings, and the Scripture doctrine, that salvation is of the Lord alone, has been made the theme of ridicule. At a meeting, a short time since, in Burton's Theatre, in New York, Henry Ward Beecher, of Sharpe's Rifle notoriety, openly and publicly repudiated the work of the Spirit of God, in the experience of the new birth; and although at a union meeting, and associated with his fellow-craftsmen of the same occupation, many of whom were with him on the stage; not one word of objection or remonstrance was uttered by any of them, to his bold and blasphemous declarations, nor have we, up to this hour, heard of any who is connected with this general excitement, either in city or country, objecting to his sentiment. We will give his own words, as published in the city papers, the Times, and the Tribune, vis:

"The Rev. Mr. Beecher then commenced his expected address. He had not come there to deliver a sermon or a speech, but to converse with the multitude before him as if he had each individual singly with him in some quiet room. It was strange that in this christian county it should seem necessary to go over the same ground as with heathens. Had they not sermons every day in the form of praying parents, the solicitude of converted wives and husbands, and what better sermons could they have? Every man in that crowd was in a position to become a true christian THAT VERY DAY. It had been imagined each individual must first pass through a few days of SERIOUSNESS, then he must be very ANXIOUS, and having passed that Heilgate, perhaps he might in due time lay hold on the christian hope. Shame on such perversions of truth. The work might be done in a moment."

In our own village, and within a few rods of where we now sit, Union Prayer Meetings, as they are called, have been held daily for several weeks, in which the Old and New School Presbytrians, New School Baptists, Methodists and Congregationalists, all profess to unite, and cards of invitation are sent to almost every family, to draw them out, (not even excepting the editor of this paper) and specially urging the young to come and participate in the performances. Morning prayer meetings have been held, as we are told, at several places; but the grand Union Prayer Meeting has been held from one to two o'clock every day; and at night all the sects who have bells begin at an early hour to ring them in earnest, as though exceedingly fearful that each sect was in danger of not securing a due share of the game. Every trap is set and baited, and every effort is made to draw men, women and children into their nets.

Such are some of the prominent signs of the times among us; how far this delusion is to extend is only known to him "Who now letteth, and who will let, until that Wicked be revealed whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming."

RELIGIOUS FANATICISM

We had intended to devote some portion of this number to an account of what is now, and has been for a few months past going on in most of the cities and towns of our Northern States, under the name of a religious revival, but more properly a revelation of that man of sin of which God has given due warning to his church. (2 Thess. ii. 3-12.) Whose coming is after the workings of Satan, with all power and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish. Such is truly the power of the present delusion that they who dwell upon the earth are made to cry, “Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with the beast?” The grand lever by which the world is to be moved out of its place, is a general conglomeration of the various Arminian sects with as many of the non-professing portion of the community as they can decoy into their net, under the name of Union Prayer Meetings, in theatres, and other places of the kind, where from two to three minutes only are allowed to each, to insult heaven by their mock prayers, and workmongrel harangues. In a future number we will give further particulars.

RELIGIOUS JUGGLING VS. YANKEE TRICKERY.

Our readers have probably all heard the ludicrous tales which have been frequently told on Yankee peddlers of their oak leaf sugars, wooden cucumber seeds, &c., and all have united in the general verdict against that class of our community. But should a question be raised for discussion at this day on the comparative merits of the clergy and the Yankees, who will undertake to show up one roguish trick of the Yankees for every score we can detect in. the proceedings of the religious jugglers of this nineteenth century?

In looking through the columns of a stray number of the American Messenger, a paper published by and devoted to the interest of the American Tract Society, we were involuntarily led to make the comparison implied in the words at the head of this article, and to strike the balance greatly in favor of Yankee trickery! We have no knowledge of any class of the non-professing world that is not left far in the distance, for dishonest, hypocritical, sly, artful and cunning plots and schemes for gulling the public of its wealth, character and self-government, by those who wear sacerdotal garments, and love to be greeted in the market places.

From the number of the Messenger before us, (No. iv. Of Vol. i.) we copied a few articles into the last number of the SIGNS, accompanied with our remarks, and we shall give one or two more in the present.

The disposition betrayed by the society in the following article, to usurp a censorship over the press, and to dictate to the community what books are proper to be read, and what should be suppressed, deserves a rebuke. Those who purchase hare not always time to examine, and if they hare, their discrimination or ability to judge and choose for themselves what kind of books to introduce into their families, is questioned. How very kind and benevolent in the Tract society to appoint a committee of, if not black legs, black coats, who have plenty of time, being supported on public bounty, and who have discrimination in quantum sufficit to suppress all books which are not published by themselves, and shut out every ray of light which would be calculated to expose the corruption and base hypocrisy of their abominable institutions.

Their committee consists, as we are gravely told, of men who are thoroughly evangelical. Cobb defines the word Evangelical to mean according to the gospel. But what resemblance can be traced between this hireling nest of money-begging mammon worshipers and their doctrines, and the gospel of Jesus Christ, no ordinary intellect can conceive. If this committee is composed of men w ho are thoroughly conformed to the gospel, why do they belong to separate and conflicting denominations? Can they all be thoroughly conformed to gospel rule and yet remain as widely apart from all other in faith and practice as Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, &c., agreeing in nothing but their schemes to gull the public, oppress and persecute the saints of God, and gormandize upon their ill-gotten plunder? With what effrontery they challenge, “What evangelical christian, fully acquainted with the American Tract Society, doubts that all this is true of their publishing committee, and of every publication it issues?” We answer, every one to whom the name of christian and the character of evangelical legitimately be longs, not only doubts, but has painful evidence to the contrary. The committee of that institution is composed of such men as Herod and Pilate, who can lay aside their sectarian wrangling only for the purpose of uniting their hostility to God and to his Christ. We doubt not that they would gladly select all our books for us, and all our preachers, our sentiments, and our laws, both civil and religious. To look for protection from imposition, heresy, or from anything that is abominable, to such men, would be like seeking for a cool and safe retreat in the bowels of Vesuvius.

“SELECTING GOOD BOOKS.”

“It has been loudly complained of, and most justly too, that editors of papers, and eminent ministers and laymen often give their endorsement to books of very little worth, not to say of a highly injurious tendency. He who would purchase for himself or others has not always the time to examine, even if he has discrimination to decide on the merits of a book.

“Of how much value, then, is an institution having an able committee consisting of men thoroughly evangelical, known and loved in the churches, and connected with different communions, who carefully examine every book they issue, and send out nothing to poison the minds of youth, or give false or distorted views of religion or of human life.

“What evangelical christian fully acquainted with the American Tract Society, doubts that all this is true of its Publishing Committee, and every publication it issues? In this aspect alone is it not an institution of incalculable worth? You wish to circulate good books over the land and world – here they are furnished to your hand, every one of them worthy of the labor and the cost you may expend.”

Now let the reader compare the spirit manifested in the above article, and the general policy of the American Tract Society, ‘with all its kindred institutions, with the following, copied from the same Messenger, (of Satan) and point out the difference, if any difference there be, between the Jesuits of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and the New School Baptists and other arminian denominations in the United States of the nineteenth century – as exemplified in the general character of the latter as well as in the Jamaica case in particular. In both cases creeds are conformed to carnal taste and numbers and funds thereby acquired.

“THE JESUITS.”

“This learned and artful society in the Romish church was founded by Ignatius Loyola, a Spaniard, in 1537, and became the grand bulwark of papacy. Their characteristics were craft and subtlety; and the facility with which they relaxed the moral system of christianity, and accommodated it to the propensities of mankind, rendered them exceedingly popular as spiritual advisers and confessors. They were perfectly unscrupulous in the use of means for the accomplishment of their ends. This powerful society was suppressed first by the French Parliament, then by Spain, Portugal, Italy, &c., and finally the order was extinguished by Pope Clement XIV. in 1773. This was a grievous blow to the papacy. In the course of the present century this dangerous order has been revived by Pope Pius VII. and is beginning again to trouble the church. It is spreading itself secretly, but taking root firmly in Europe and in the United States, and with its wonted policy seeming to adapt itself to the institutions of the country, while by getting the control of education it prepares to modify and direct those institutions at its will.” – Palmer’s Church History, 1842.

“ONE MISSION COMPLETED.”

“The churches in Jamaica, West Indies, which have been nurtured by the English Missionary Society, have resolved hereafter themselves to support the gospel, and the aid of the Missionary Society is no longer required.” – American Messenger.

No doubt the disclosures of Weston, published in a former number of the SIGNS, have led to this result. When these missionists have drilled their victims to the tune of five or six thousand dollars per annum, the work is pronounced completed.

REMARKS ON A LETTER

Remarks on the Letter of Brother John S. Cox - We are well pleased with the general tenor and argument of our brother, and, indeed, if we correctly understand him, we have no exception to make. We do not discover any proposition that we do not cordially receive. But we do believe there is a want of agreement among some of our brethren in regard to the doctrine of the new and heavenly birth, which arises from a misapprehension of each other's views - each having his peculiar manner of expressing his views; for it cannot be that those who are the subjects of that spiritual birth, and have been led by the one Spirit, and in the same one hope of their calling, can very widely differ in the real sentiment of their hearts in regard to that subject.

Brother Cox, in the latter part of his able article, remarks, "So that I cannot avoid the conclusion that it was the same man that had been born of the flesh, that Jesus said must be born again, to enable him to see the kingdom of God. So that whilst his birth of the flesh elemented and adapted him to the enjoyment of earthly things, his heavenly birth elements adapts him to the enjoyment of heavenly things," etc. Take this sentence in its connection with the other parts of the letter, and we know of none of our brethren who would controvert his conclusion. It must be the same man who was or is first born of the flesh, that must be born again or he cannot see the kingdom of God. This declaration was made by our Lord to Nicodemus, who had been born of the flesh, and that too of Abraham's posterity, and had been religionized, and had graduated in the religious instructions taught by the Scribes and Pharisees, and stood pre-eminent among his brethren as a teacher in Israel and ruler of the Jews; and Jesus, in re-asserting the declaration, said to him, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." We have no intimation given us in the scriptures that any man had ever been born again of the Spirit, who had not antecedently been born of the flesh. The very term man or a man, in its most common and familiar application, signifies one who has been born. The seed of Adam, to be developed as men, must be born of the flesh; besides the term again, or born again, certainly implies a previous birth. This position, as it appears to us, will admit of no controversy. If, therefore, brother Cox, or any other brother, has understood us, or any of our correspondents, to controvert that conclusion, we think he has misapprehended our views; at least we can speak confidently for ourself for while we have objected to the idea of a part of a man being born again, we have insisted on the precise words of Christ, "Except a man be born again", etc.

But let us compare our notes a little farther. Brother Cox has expressed our views in regard to both births, so far as he has pursued the subject in his letter. The first birth has developed our earthly nature, and has resulted from a time union with the earthly Adam, and he has well remarked that not a son or daughter of Adam could possibly have been born of the flesh that was not created in Adam; for if we were not created in Adam, we do not belong to his posterity, cannot be involved in the sin and guilt of his transgression, nor from him inherit a corrupt nature, nor die a natural death by that decree which has passed upon all men as a consequence of Adam's transgression; for how can we be involved in the consequence if we are not Adam's children according to the flesh? And farther, our fleshly birth has developed us in the flesh as the children of men. A fleshly birth has not made us manifest as the children of God, or it would not require that we should be born again in order to see the kingdom of God. But as brother Cox has very fitly said, our fleshly birth has elemented and adapted us for natural or fleshly things. And as the Master has said that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit. As the fleshly birth cannot produce spiritual life and immortality, so neither can a spiritual birth produce a fleshly man, a fleshly nature, a carnal, depraved, mortal existence; for, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed abideth in him; and he cannot sin because he is born of God." How wide the difference between the two that's which occur in the words of Christ to Nicodemus. That which is born of the flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit. The two that's differ in their paternity; the one is of the flesh, the other is of the Spirit; the one is of corruptible, the other of incorruptible seed; the one is born of a woman, the other is born of God; the one is in the course of natural generation of blood of the will of the flesh and of the will of man, the other is born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man. The same difference is traced in the nature of the two that's. That which is born of the flesh is elemented and adapted to this world, and desires here to remain and to enjoy the carnal pleasures of a sensual state. But that which is born of the Spirit desires spiritual, heavenly and divine things - to live by faith upon the Son of God, to eat that bread which cometh down from heaven; it desireth the sincere milk of the word and the hidden manna, which only the spiritual Israelites can feed upon. Well, what are the two that's? We think no Christian in his right mind would be willing to dispute the definition given by him who cannot err. One of these that's, Jesus says, is flesh. Well, what is the other that? Is it also flesh? Is it renovated, refined, spiritualized, born over again flesh? But stop - can we answer any one of these interrogatives affirmatively without rejecting the interpretation given by our Lord himself? If we may say that which is born of the flesh is Spirit, and that which is born of the Spirit is flesh, and these two that's are essentially the same, how can we reconcile such views with the express declaration that the one is flesh and that the other is Spirit? But if we mistake not there is still more difficulty to be encountered in the support of such an identity. It not only denies what Truth himself has said, but if the spiritual birth has reproduced the fleshly man, that man in his reproduction is no longer flesh but Spirit; for that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. It is no longer sinful and sinning, for whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin. It is no longer corruptible, for it is born of incorruptible seed. It cannot be mortal, for it liveth and abideth forever. It cannot be captivated by the world, for that which is born of God overcometh the world. But is it so? Is there a subject of regeneration to be found who does not feel constrained to say with Paul, "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing"? Is there one who does not find a law or governing principle in his flesh that wars against the law of his mind, bring him into captivity to the law of sin which reigns in his mortal body? If so we will only say he differs from us.

If any child of God feels perplexed upon this subject, we commend to his attention the text, Songs vi. 13: "Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may look upon thee." And it will be well to take a good look and consider the lesson well. "What will ye see in the Shulamite? As it were the company of two armies." The flesh lusting against the Spirit. What flesh? That which is born of the flesh. This flesh in the same Shulamite cannot war or lust against the spirit, if that spirit is not there. And the spirit warreth against the flesh, and these two are - identically the same? By no means; the one is contrary to the other; and those who, like the Shulamite, find them both, like two belligerent armies struggling within them for the mastery are commanded to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, and to follow after the other.

Opposite as these two parties are, a man cannot be a Christian who has not both. The Christian was first born of the flesh; this made him manifest as a member of the human family, involved in guilt and ruin, and standing in need of the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. The other birth has made him manifest as a child of God, a member of Christ and an heir of glory.

But perhaps brother Cox has sufficiently identified the production of the two births, the one as the new man - the inner man, which is renewed day by day; the other as the old man, the outer man that perishes, that grows old - is subject to corruption, mortality - to death. But how cheering the prospect brought to view in the closing paragraph of brother Cox's letter. Although this flesh is not now spiritual, incorruptible nor immortal, it shall be when death shall be swallowed up of life. Though it goes down to the grave a mortal body, it is raised a spiritual, holy, immortal, imperishable body, changed, fashioned and make like unto the glorious body of our risen Redeemer. "For whom he did foreknow, them he did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren." Even "now is Christ risen indeed, and become the first-fruits of them that slept"; and as the heavens have received him, so he has given his poor tried saints the divine assurance that where he is there shall they be also, that they may behold him in the glory which he had with the Father before the world was.

Brother Cox, we feel persuaded, will not consider us as criticising or controverting his views, but rather as attempting to show that there is a harmony of sentiment on this subject, that the same heir of immortal glory is brought forth into manifestation by two distinct births, and these are both provided for him, and in each he is passive, in neither has he himself had any power to aid or prevent; all is of God, and with grateful hearts let us together sing - "His decrees, who form'd the earth, Has fix'd my first and second birth; Parents, native place and time, All appointed were by him."

REMARKS ON BROTHER MOORHEAD'S LETTER.

It has been the pleasure of God to withhold from the curious of the world a history of his church from the apostolic age to the present time. While all the various branches of anti-christ, including the mother and all her harlot daughters, have commanded the admiration of the world, and by alliance with the kingdoms of the earth, patronized by empires, thrones and dominions of the earth, defended by mighty armies in the field, courts of Inquisition, with all their implements of cruelty, with wealth and worldly influence to give them notoriety; the kingdom of our God and his Christ has not come by observation; for "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Nearly all Ecclesiastical history for the last eighteen hundred years has been written by the enemies of the true church of the living God, all of whom have given about as unfair and untruthful accounts of the church of Christ, as is generally given at the present time of the Old School Baptists by those who advocate the doctrines and measures which have, like some of the idols mentioned in the scriptures, "come newly up." For many centuries all truthful history of the church has been suppressed by persecution, and the writers on whom we might rely, with their records, have been committed together to the flames. In wading through the labyrinthian volumes of Ecclesiastical history, anti-christ is presented as the church, and the true church is only incidentally pointed at, and alluded to from time to time by way of reproach, and grossly misrepresented. Her real track is only found by marks of violence and blood. From such data as historians have supplied, but little more of the real history of the gospel church can be collected, than what brother Moorhead has embodied in his short communication.

It is very evident, as shown by our brother, that the church of Christ in the apostolic age, having none to contest her identity, required no distinctive, denominational, or adjective words to distinguish has as the bride, the Lamb's wife. In the scriptures she is called the church of God which he has purchased with his own blood. She is also spoken of as the elect, the kingdom of heaven, a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, &c. Her peculiar characteristics by which she should be known throughout all time are very clearly delineated by the pen of the inspired writers, and by these her identity should be known. That her identity should be contested by the mother of harlots and her prolific brood, was anticipated by those who were inspired to predict the advent of "that wicked," whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all signs and lying wonders, and all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish. Instead of leaving the children of God to rely on uninspired historians to point out to them the church of the First Born, God has put on her certain distinguishing marks, which shall never be found on any of the spurious organizations that shall ever arise to contest her identity. We have but to examine the New Testament to find the unmistakable marks by which God has distinguished her from all other religious organizations. In coming to the scriptures as a standard, we will freely concede, that if in all, or among all the religious sects and denominations on earth, the true church of Christ can be found, outside of what is at the present time known as the Old School, or Primitive Baptist church, then we are not the church of Christ; and if we are the true church, then all others are false and spurious.

On this vitally important subject we have a sure word of prophecy, to which we do well to take heed. First; we know that the gospel church which was organized on the Day of Pentecost was composed exclusively of baptized believers. Quickened by the Spirit which was poured out at that time according to the prophecy of Joel, they were pricked in their hearts, and made sensible of their lost condition; they pricked in their hearts, and made sensible of their lost condition; they cried out, “Men and brethren, what shall we do?” The gospel of Christ was preached to them, and they that gladly received the word were baptized, and added to the church. They were believers, for they continued steadfast in the apostles’ doctrine and fellowship, which they could not have done if they were not believers. And the Lord added to “the church” daily of such as should be saved. They were then called the church, and at this day they would be called the Baptist church, for none were admitted to the apostles’ fellowship but such as were steadfastly in the apostles’ doctrine, and were duly baptized, and these exclusively, who also continued steadfastly in breaking of bread, and in the prayers and devotional exercises of the church of God.

Second. The doctrine of the apostles which was preached on that day, recognized the foreknowledge and determinate counsel of God in the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus Christ, and his resurrection from the dead, and exaltation to his Mediatorial throne as the Head over all things to his church, and through him the salvation of all for whom he laid down his life, as embraced in the promise which was unto them, and unto their children, and unto all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.

Third. This primitive apostolic church were by the divine command of Christ, in the commission given to them, taught by the apostles to observe all things whatsoever Christ had commanded them, {the apostles,} no more nor any less was ever to be observed religiously by the church of God, than simply what Christ, the Head of the church, had commanded the apostles to teach them to observe.

In all subsequent ages of the church, in every part of the world, those who bear these indelible marks shall be known as the church of Christ, while all religionists who do not bear them are denominated in the scriptures as anti-christian.

Soon after the apostles' days, a system of means was instituted for augmenting the number of disciples, by catechisms, and other human devices, in disobedience to the laws of Christ, by which the number of nominal professors was greatly increased; innovations upon the strict order as taught by the apostles were multiplied, until the great apostasy which was predicted, I Tim. 4:1-5, was most fearfully realized, and the party departing from the faith and giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, were largely in the majority, and claimed to be the church, and persecuted even to the death those who still bore the essential characteristics of the church of God, by still continuing steadfast in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship. The apostate party was soon patronized by Constantine and other princes and monarchs of the earth, who by pains and penalties, proscription, tortures and death, attempted the extermination of all who refused to regard this seven headed and ten horned beast, as the Holy Catholic, true apostolic church. And the church, composed exclusively of baptized believers, who refused to receive the mark of the beast, or his image, or the number of his name, were driven by persecution into obscurity, into the wilderness, where God had provided for her a place to be nourished for a time, times, and the dividing of time, from the fury of the beast.

All the Protestant denominations on earth at this time trace their lineage to this apostate mother, and their descent from her is confirmed by the testimony of the scriptures. But the church of the living God has always from her organization, whether in the wilderness or in open manifestation, continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and always will bear the same discriminating marks, which shall distinguish her from all other religious orders or denominations.

To every honest enquirer after truth we will say in conclusion of these remarks; If you would know which if any of those of our day who profess godliness are truly the church of God, try them by the only infallible standard. “To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them.” Isa. 8:20.

The Old School Baptists are charged with opposition to Missionary Boards, Sunday School Unions, Tract Societies, and many other modern institutions which are popular in almost every other religious denomination; try us by the apostolic pattern, and if it can be shown that the church at Pentecost had Mission Boards, or funds, or any of the other institutions which we reject, then it will be clearly apparent that we have departed from the apostles’ doctrine and fellowship. And so also let our doctrine and order, our faith and practice, be fairly tested; for only so far as we conform to this pattern have we a right to claim that we are the church of the living God, the ground and pillar of the truth.

REMARKS ON BROTHER VANMETER'S LETTER.

In regard to the change experienced by the subjects of the new and heavenly birth, there is probably a want of a clearer understanding among some of our brethren, in comprehending each other's views, and the manner in which they are expressed. On the one hand, brethren hold that the new birth develops in those who are born again a new man, which after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness, embodying all the elements of a spiritual man, and that they are brought into the possession and experience of all the fruits of the Spirit, such as love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance, as the legitimate fruits of the Spirit, and that none of these fruits ever emanated from the fleshly nature, which is born of the flesh, either before or subsequently to their new and spiritual birth. The difference between the works of the flesh and the fruits of the Spirit is so great as to produce a bitter and unreconcilable warfare between the flesh and the spirit in all who are the subjects of both births. Those who hold these scriptural views, as did Paul, whose flesh (though he were born of God, and was an apostle of the Lamb) still lusted against his spirit, and his spirit warred constantly against his flesh, and so much so as to bring him into captivity to the law of sin, which was still in his members, may in the avowal of their experience, be misunderstood to mean that the new birth effects no change in the man who is born again, because they accept the declarations of the Scriptures, that "that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." "And these are contrary one to the other." They see another law in their members warring against the law of their mind, and they deny that anything spiritual, holy and good is born of the flesh, or that anything carnal, earthly, sensual or devilish is born of the Spirit of God.

While those who believe, with brother Vanmeter, that their heart, soul, spirit, conscience, mind, understanding, will and affections are changed, embracing all their mental or intellectual faculties, and so changed by regeneration and the new birth, that they now have become pure, holy, spiritual, and subject to the law of Christ, may still, with our esteemed brother, after all only mean, as he expresses in the latter part of his letter, that "Regeneration does not destroy any of the faculties of the mind or soul; but changes their course right about, to will and to do of his good pleasure." And that there is still an opposite inclination of the flesh, from that of the spirit in the children of God, causing a warfare between them, and that the flesh, from which all this opposition to the Spirit proceeds, is called the old man. And the spirit from which holiness proceeds in the Christian is called the new man; and that these two are as contrary to each other as sin and holiness can make them.

With this last expression of his views, we can understand what would otherwise have been a mystery to us, namely, how our brother can feel so deeply, and confess so freely his own personal imperfections, lack of knowledge, want of perfection, etc., if his mind and understanding, his intellectual and mental faculties were all made perfect and spiritual, by regeneration or the new birth. The apostle has informed us that "He that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ (I Corinthians 2:15,16)."

This, then, is the key to the secret. Brother Vanmeter's natural mind, faculties, understanding and perceptive powers, may only be turned into a new channel, or directed in a new course, by the powers of the new man, by which he keeps his body under; and yet like all his brethren, be very imperfect and unable to see or comprehend the things of the Spirit, only so far as the things of the Spirit are revealed by the Spirit of his faith, by which he has the mind of Christ. It has been the same with us; it is the same with all the saints; it was so with Paul; for he was not sufficient to think anything as of himself. See II Corinthians 3:5. We are glad to learn that the same conflict is felt in our brother, between his carnal, or fleshly mind, and the mind of Christ, which by virtue of his new and heavenly birth, has been given him.

In the absence of his closing explanatory remarks, we would perhaps have done him injustice by imputing to him what his words seemed to us to imply, but which he probably does not mean.

It has been contended by some that the new birth makes that which is born of the flesh spiritual; that the sinner is in his earthly nature, soul, body and spirit all changed from natural to spiritual. This brother V. has not said; but we should have concluded that, with the exception of the corporal substance of the fleshly body, he held that the whole man had become spiritual and holy. This we now think could not have been his meaning; for if all the faculties of the natural man were changed from being natural, and had become spiritual, his mind, conscience, understanding, affections and desires would cease to be natural; and if spiritual, then pure and immortal, in which case they could never err, or commit transgression; and the fleshly body, without the soul, mind, understanding, or any of its former faculties, could never sin; for in their absence the fleshly body would be dead, and he that is dead is free from committing sin; it could then no longer maintain a warfare between the flesh and the spirit.

Now in regard to what change is wrought in those who are born of God, we do understand, and presume, that our brethren generally agree with us that the redeemed sinner of Adam's race, who was dead, is quickened by the quickening Spirit and power of God; that he is passed from death unto life; that he who was a child of wrath, even as others, is quickened together with Christ. He that was lost is found. He that was blind is made to see; is delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. He who hated God is filled with the love of God. He who was guilty and condemned is now freely justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. He who was without hope, has now a hope that is sure and steadfast. He who was an infidel is now a believer. He who persecuted the saints now esteems them as the excellent ones of the earth, in whom he delights; he now desires a place and home with them, though feeling himself less than the least of all. The stranger and foreigner is made nigh by the blood of Christ. And he who had always been under the delusion that he possessed faculties, fleshly powers and abilities with which he could serve God is stripped of all his self-conceit, and self-righteousness, and is manifestly "of the circumcision who worship God in the spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." He who knew no warfare before sees a law in his members warring against the law of his mind, bringing him into captivity to the law of sin, which is in his members.

Now we ask, is there no change in all this? The course of the man is changed. He that was a profane swearer prayeth; the mouth that was full of cursing is engaged in singing the praise of God. Does a denial that any or all these gifts bestowed on us by the Spirit, in our new and spiritual birth, are born of our flesh, or that our carnal, depraved nature, with its natural faculties, are born of the Spirit, necessarily involve a denial of any change wrought in us by the implantation of the Spirit of the living God? We think not.

We believe that every one who is born of God is astonished at the wonderful change that God has wrought in him; and while every day of his life he has the unmistakable evidence that his old carnal nature is the same as it was before, causing him to mourn and weep, to doubt and fear, to groan and confess his vileness; he is amazed to contemplate what God has wrought in bringing him to see, feel and confess that in him, that is, in his flesh, which is born of the flesh, there dwells no good thing. Still he has in him a hope, full of immortality, that the conflict between the old man, that is born of the flesh, and the new man, which is born of the Spirit, will cease when this mortal shall put on immortality, and when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and that glorious saying that is written shall be brought to pass, "that death is swallowed up of victory." Thanks, eternal thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

We cannot, without extending this article to too great a length, show the perfect harmony of all those passages of Scriptures quoted by brother Vanmeter, and the doctrine held by all consistent and divinely instructed Old School or Primitive Baptists. If there is among all the readers of the "Signs of the Times" a Christian who feels sure that in his new birth his old nature is changed from carnal to spiritual, whose carnal mind has (Paul's declaration to the contrary notwithstanding) become spiritual and subject to the law of God, and whose natural understanding has become spiritual, so that he is competent to judge all things, and yet himself be judged of no man, who being so radically changed that he has no more doubts or fears to encounter, no more lusts to suppress, no more vain thoughts to rise in his mind, no more propensity to transgress, we ask that man to let us hear from him.

Brethren, in pointing out what may seem to them to be error in the views of other brethren of the household of faith, should be exceedingly careful to make their differences seem no greater than they really are. Walk as charitably as we may, we shall all find enough in ourselves and others to deplore, pity and forgive, without exaggeration or magnifying our differences. From what we can learn, there has been too little prudence in some quarters in the discussion of the subject of the change which is wrought in the subjects of grace by the new birth.

As an example, take the case now on hand. Who, in reading the communication of brother Vanmeter, if totally unacquainted with the views of the editor of the "Signs of the Times" and eminent brethren who have expressed their views in the "Signs," would not conclude that he had to encounter those who hold that the new birth makes no change in the person who is born again? Such an impression would naturally arise from the frank acknowledgement of his conscientious dissent from our views; and then, instead of carefully identifying the views to which he objects, he leaves the reader to infer that we entertain and have promulgated views through the "Signs of the Times," which conflict with the long array of Scriptures which he has produced, as though he intended to demolish our views and to establish his own. We are very slow to believe that there can be found any where in the connection of the Old School or Primitive Baptists even one intelligent brother or sister, who does not as sacredly regard the full force of every passage as brother Vanmeter can. Nor is there any change expressed or implied in any or in all of them, that is disputed by those brethren who have and do deny that any of our natural powers are or ever will be made spiritual until God shall in our final resurrection change these vile bodies, and fashion them like unto Christ's glorious body.

Brother Vanmeter understands "that the Scriptures abundantly teach a change of heart, soul, spirit, conscience, mind, understanding, will, affections, etc." Let all this be taken in connection with his concluding remarks, that all these faculties or elements of the man are brought into subordination to the spirit of holiness of which he is born again, and we will not dispute his position. What we dispute is that these faculties are changed from natural to spiritual. And even this we hope we may have no occasion to dispute with brother Vanmeter; for he with us holds that they are turned right about by that power that works in us both to will and do of God's good pleasure. Now here is the point. What power is it that worketh in the saints to will and to do of his good pleasure? The apostle says it is God; then it is not our fleshly faculties made spiritual; but it is God himself, by his own power, that subjects us to his own pleasure by curbing our wills and controlling our actions. If our fleshly faculties had become changed from their nature and relation to our flesh, and had by a heavenly birth become spiritual, then they would be pure and holy, and would never lead us astray.

Let us illustrate: If our old natural heart is changed into a spiritual, pure and holy heart, why are the saints still reproved for being "slow of heart to believe?" And why do censurable thoughts still arise in them? It is true God has given to us a new heart, in which he has written his law, and he has put within us a right spirit, but every Christian finds his old natural heart as full of doubts, fears, unbelief, vain thoughts, murmurings, rebellions and inconstancies as ever; but still he has a heart which believes unto righteousness, and a mouth with which confession is made unto salvation. We fully agree with our brother that those who are born again "were dead, but are now quickened and made alive."

But the death in which they were held has not become life, but is death still, and the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness. Christ is our life, and he has taken his abode in us. “We are dead, and our life is hid with Christ in God.” “And the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God.” So it is not the flesh that is quickened and becomes immortal, but an immortal life is given us, and as long as we remain in the flesh we shall feel the conflict going on between the two opposite principles of death and life. This brother Vanmeter says is attributable to the opposite inclinations of the flesh and spirit, and so say we. But what is the flesh? And what is the spirit that their inclinations should be so conflicting? Our Savior has settled this question. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. The one wars against the other, for in the flesh dwells no good thing, and in the spirit dwells no evil thing. The one is of the earth, earthly; the other is born of God, and cannot sin, because it is born of God. But was there nothing but the material substance of our bodies born of the flesh? “Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image.” To be like Adam, his son must have possessed all the faculties of his father. Had Cain, or Abel, or Seth, in their organizations, lacked the essential elements of a man: say had they been born without a soul, or mind, or the faculties which distinguish a man from a beast, he would not be begotten and born in the likeness and image of Adam. The word flesh, as used by our Lord, included all that is born of the flesh, just as much as the Spirit which is born of God includes all that is born of God. In our first or earthly birth were born all the elements, nature and faculties that we had before we were born again, and that they have who were never born again, and these all being born of the flesh are flesh, and although God has ordained to bring all these elements of the flesh to subserve his purpose. and give to the development of the new birth a controlling power over them; still, the flesh is flesh, and the spirit continues to be spirit, just as our Lord said to Nicodemus.

Now let us look after these subjugated faculties in the order in which our brother has presented them. We have noticed that the saints were dead but are quickened into life, or rather, life is given unto them. Blind, but now they see. What is blind? "The natural man." The man who has all the faculties of a natural man, or a man that is not born again, such a man "receiveth not the things of the Spirit, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned." Bring all the lights of nature, of reason, or science or education to bear upon that natural man with all his natural faculties, either before or after his new birth, and still the inability remains, the natural man cannot see, by any faculty, those things which God himself declares can only be discerned by a spiritual capacity. Can even a Christian, by searching, find out God? If they can, why do they "seek him oft, and find him not?"

Still, the blind, notwithstanding their own blindness, do see, "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us (II Corinthians 4:6)." How much does an earthen pot comprehend of the light, or understand of the power of the treasure which is put in it? It is put in the earthen vessel expressly that its excellency shall reflect all the honor to God, and not to the vessel. Christ is the true light. "In him was life, and the life was the light of men; and the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not (John 1:4,5)." This light is life, and this life is Christ, and this Christ is God, and this God is he that hath shined in the hearts of his people; as treasure to put in earthen vessels, and it is to the faith of those who are born of God that this revelation of light is made; for, "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Not seen by human discernment. "While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal (II Corinthians 4:18)." So this transition from darkness and blindness to marvelous light is not a revision of our natural powers. For with our natural sight no man hath seen the Father at any time; for he dwells in light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen nor can see, to whom be honor and power everlasting. Amen. See I Timothy 6:16.

"They were ignorant, but made wise." This is true as the book; but is their ignorance converted into wisdom? Their ignorance is just what it was before; but they are delivered from its power, and Christ is of God, made unto them wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption. The Christian who has been made wise unto salvation can rise no higher above his native ignorance of divine and spiritual things by the exercise of his natural powers, or faculties, than he could before his translation from darkness to light. "Who is among you that feareth the Lord, and obeyed the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light?" What then? Shall he try his own faculties, kindle a fire, compass himself about with sparks, walk in the light of his own fire and sparks which he has kindled? If he does, he shall, from the hand of God, lie down in sorrow. Instead of falling back on his own wisdom, faculties or works, "Let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God." See Isaiah 50:10,11. How many a child of God has learned by sad experience that his fleshly faculties have not become spiritual, that they cannot aid him in searching for spiritual things. Was it for lack of mental light that Job broke forth in his lamentation, "Oh, that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat," etc. Is it for want of faculties the spouse is heard to cry:

"With long desire and anxious thought,
I seek him oft but find him not."

Still it is true, though our fleshly perceptions are as blind to everything spiritual, as before, yet as born of God, they are children of the light, for God (not their improved faculties), is their light and their salvation. But he is never seen even by his own children, only in his own light (Psalm 36:9). By any effort of our own powers or faculties we can no more see God than by the light of a taper we can see the sun at midnight.

"We were afar off, but now made nigh." This is a glorious truth where the inspired apostle applied it to us poor Gentile sinners, who are redeemed and made nigh unto God by the blood of Christ. But, let us ask brother Vanmeter if the disparity between the eternal perfections of God, and our groveling mortal faculties, is any less than has been at any previous time? Are not his thoughts and ways still as far transcending ours as heaven is arched above the earth? The nearer any of us are brought unto God in our spiritual exercises, the more fully we shall realize the weakness of all our mortal powers. When Isaiah in rapturous vision saw the glory of the Lord, he cried, "Wo is me, for I am undone." The more we know of God, the less will be our confidence in the flesh.

Most heartily do we endorse the following sentiment of brother Vanmeter, "Indeed they are now new creatures; God, by his Spirit, having created these new desires, and feelings of heart and illuminated the understanding."

This is the very point the editor and his brethren have been contending for; that, "If any man be of Christ Jesus, he is a new creature." Old things are past away, all things are become new. "And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new; and he said unto me, Write; for these words are true and faithful. And he said unto me, It is done! I am Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End (Revelation 21:5,6)." Not a revision of our poor old corrupt nature, but a new creature of desires and feelings, of heart, of light and understanding of spiritual things, which we never had or knew anything about until we were born of God. Those who are born again have reason to know the truth of brother Vanmeter's remarks, that "Regeneration does not destroy any of the faculties of the mind or soul, but changes their course right about," etc. The strong man armed that had kept the palace is overmatched by a stranger, who binds him and spoils his goods. These faculties are subordinate to the new creation, to the reign of grace which triumphs over all the evil propensities and carnal faculties of the old depraved nature. But these faculties, powers and passions, like the Canaanites of old, are left within the walls, for a trial to the people of God.

"The spirit impresses the image of God, or the divine nature in the heart." Not on the old carnal heart of stone, but the new heart which God has covenanted to give them, and in which he has written his law. The faculties of the old fleshly heart, although subjugated, are nevertheless carnal still. God's image cannot be found on any one of them, nor is the divine nature imparted to any one of them. Try them separately - sight, for instance - can the mere natural faculty of seeing perceive the things of the Spirit? If so, why are Christians ever in the dark? Our natural perception is no greater than it was before, for we walk not by sight, but by faith, which is a faculty, if we may so speak of the properties of the new man, a fruit of the Spirit and a gift of God. Our carnal mind has not become spiritual, for "it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Every Christian has a carnal and a spiritual mind; with the spiritual he serves the law, while to be carnally minded is death. The Christian is warned against adhering to his carnal mind, because it is enmity against God. The affections of our nature are not made spiritual and holy in our heavenly birth; for we are exhorted to put off the old man with its affections and lusts. We could have neither to put off if the image and nature of our God were enstamped on them; but we have the mind of Christ, the spirit of holiness, the love of God, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God; on all these the image of God and the divine nature appear. These are not faculties belonging to the old man, either before or after the new birth; but they belong to the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. This new man must bear the image of God, because instead of being created after Adam, it is after God created, and in his righteousness made manifest.

The warfare is everywhere imputed to the opposite influences of the flesh and spirit; the former, under the influence of indwelling sin, and the renewed faculties of the heart, under the influence of the spirit. The former is called the old man; the latter the new; and these are as opposite as sin and holiness can make them. We may not fully comprehend the meaning of our brother, but certain we are that in the Scriptures, and in the experience of the saints, the Christian warfare is attributed to the opposite inclinations and powers of the flesh and spirit. The Christian being born first of the flesh, afterwards of the Spirit, the fleshly nature is of the earth earthy, and is, with all its faculties, called the old man. And that which is developed in the new birth is altogether unlike that which is born of the flesh, and it is called Spirit, and this newborn Spirit is called the new man, and these are contrary the one to the other, and this contrariety of nature and disposition is what occasions the Christian warfare. We have failed to find any of those places, either in the Scriptures or in the Christian's experience, where the renewed faculties of the heart are called the new man, or where they are even mentioned. We do not wish to impute to our brother what he does not intend to express, nor to criticize or cavil about words. But if it be intended that the natural faculties of our carnal nature have ceased to be carnal, have become holy, so as to partake of the divine nature of God, and to bear the image of the invisible God, and have become so distinct from and opposite to the fleshly nature, of which they formed that part which distinguish men from beasts, as to make the difference as great as the extremes of sin and holiness, we would ask what power there is in the flesh, in the absence of all its faculties, to maintain a warfare against the new man?

Paul's instructions on this subject seems to us more clear. In describing the nature and violence of the warfare, he admonishes the saints thus, "This I say then, Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfill the lusts of the flesh; for the flesh lusteth against the Spirit and the Spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would. But if ye be led by the Spirit," (not by the renewed faculties of the flesh) "ye are not under the law. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness. Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

"But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts (Galatians 5:16-24)." Now, we ask, can any or all of these works of the flesh be performed independently of the faculties of the flesh? Brother Vanmeter has defined these faculties as embracing "soul, mind, understanding, conscience," etc. Can a man without a soul, if such a thing can be, or without a mind, or understanding, or a conscience, or any other faculty, commit adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strifes, seditions, heresies, envies, murders, drunkenness, revelings and such like? Or can a Christian, if all the faculties of his earthly nature have become spiritual, and as holy as holiness can make them, possibly commit any or all these works of the flesh? If Christians cannot, why are they admonished against committing them? If in all their faculties they are partakers of the divine nature, and bear the image of God, how can the flesh, with all its faculties made pure, lust against the Spirit? If it cannot, then where is the warfare?

But we would rather charitably hope and believe that our brother means by renewed faculties, those graces which the apostle calls fruits of the Spirit. The Christian loves; not with that affection of the flesh which he is commanded to crucify, but with that love which is born of God, flowing from a pure heart, with fervency. He joys, but his rejoicings are in the Holy Ghost; he has peace, but it comes from God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ; he is long suffering, but his patience and endurance is not of the flesh; he is petulant, fretful, and murmuring; he is meek, quiet and gentle; but all this he has learned of him whose yoke he wears; he has goodness, but it does not consist in the perfection of his fleshly faculties; it is among the spiritual blessings which were given him in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world; he has faith, but it is the faith of the Son of God, who loved him and gave himself for him. And thus we may examine all the fruits, and we shall find that "every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning."

If we had not already extended our remarks to so great a length, we would notice the entire array of Scriptures brought forward by our brother with a seeming design to disprove what he regards as errors of the editor and contributors of the "Signs". We have carefully examined these Scriptures, but fail to find in them any bearing against any sentiment held by us. For instance, brother Vanmeter proves clearly from plain Scripture testimony that the heart of man is deceitful, and desperately wicked; this we fully admit, and have never denied; but he says this wicked heart is purified by faith; but to prove that the natural heart of man is so changed as to become spiritual, pure, clean, and holy, he quotes Acts 15:9, in which the Gentiles have been purged from their idolatry, and have received the faith of the Son of God, equally with the primitive saints which were called from among the Jews. And further, that the "stony heart is taken away, and a heart of flesh is given." To our mind this Scripture not only fails to sustain the position that the natural mind has become spiritual and holy, but proves rather what we have hitherto contended for, that the old heart is still the seat of natural vitality, affections and lusts, which are excluded from the spiritual kingdom, by the circumcision of Christ; and a new heart is given them, which is the seat of spiritual life, light, love, and purity. This new heart is born of God, as the old heart was born of the flesh, and is the seat and center of the new man which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. We also wish to be understood by every little child in the kingdom of Christ; and we therefore ask, Is there a little child in the house of God who does not still find in his old carnal nature an evil heart of unbelief, departing from the living God? And again we ask of all the little children, When love, joy, and peace, with holy desires, grateful emotions, and heavenly exercises gush forth from the overflowing fountain of life which is in them as a well of water ever springing up to immortality, do you ever so far mistake, as to ascribe it to the present goodness of your natural heart?

But, at least for the present, we must bring our remarks to a close; and in conclusion will say that if brother Vanmeter, or any other brother or sister, can find in his or her fleshly nature, on in any thing thereunto pertaining, any good thing, whether it be called a faculty, or by any other name, then they can find in them what Paul could not find in himself. It is the Spirit only that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. "The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from Heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption (II Corinthians 15:47-50)."

In his letter, brother Vanmeter has admitted all that we contend for; but he has rendered his views somewhat obscure by some forms of expression which seem to conflict with our views and his admissions; and as he has been frank to tell us that he differs from us in some things published in the "Signs", we have felt called on the review his letter, not, we trust, in a fault-finding spirit, or to provoke controversy, but rather to contend earnestly for what we understand to be the truth. We wish not to hurt his feelings, nor would we give offense to Jew or Gentile - nor to the church of God.

REMARKS ON BROTHER VANMETER'S LETTER.

We do not feel inclined to prolong the discussion of the points involved by an attempt to review what is contained in his letter which we publish in this number. We simply refer our readers to those articles and communications to which his present letter purports to be a reply, for our views, and for the views of our brethren, on the subject of regeneration and the new birth. If we have, any of us, contended that Christ is the mother of his members, or if any thing published in the "Signs of the Times," by any fair inference involves any such absurdity, we have been, and still are, unable to perceive it. It has been our design to set forth the scriptural doctrine that Christ is the Everlasting Father of all his spiritual seed; the Second Adam, the Lord from heaven. We have, in common with all our brethren, understood that our natural seminal existence was given us in the earthly Adam, that we were in him when he sinned, and that death passed upon all, in him, and that in him we all die; but we did not know that that doctrine of seminal relation would make Adam the mother of mankind. We have understood, also, that the Second Adam is the Lord from heaven, a spiritual head, in whom as our spiritual seminal head, that spiritual life which was with the Eternal Father and was manifest, was given to us. And according as we have read the record of the three that bear record in heaven, attested by the concurrent testimony of the three that bear witness on earth, that this is the record, that God hath given us eternal life, and that this life is in his Son, so that he that hath the Son of God hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. Consequently we found ourselves obliged to believe that all who have eternal life have the Son of God; we had therefore accepted the inference that our eternal life, and all spiritual blessings were given us in Christ, according as God had chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, and that all spiritual blessings, including our relation to God through the Spirit, as sons of Christ's sonship, as heirs through and by virtue of his heirship. And as Christ himself declares that he is the resurrection and the life of his people, we had really believed that our resurrection, life, regeneration, new birth, and all things that qualify us for a spiritual inheritance in glory were spiritual blessings, which were given us in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world; and that God had provided no other medium through which any spiritual blessing ever did, or possibly could, descend from God to men; or by or through which any man can come to the Father. But after all, if this involves the conclusion that Christ is our mother, we will only say we had not so understood it. Our extreme dullness of comprehension may, however, result from the fact that our carnal mind has not been remodeled, nor our old man revised, nor any of our earthly faculties born over again, nor made spiritual and pure: for it is ours still to go bowed down with a sense of inbred depravity and indwelling sin. And if our eternal destiny depended on our finding in us, that is in our flesh including all in us that is born of the flesh, one good thing, we could not find it; we should certainly be lost. If brother Vanmeter, and the host of those who hold his views on this subject, who are urging him to defend the theory, have the faculties of their earthly nature made spiritual and holy, we would not deprive them of all the comfort it affords them. We will only say it is not so with us; they are far more holy than we. We groan, being burdened; and what in them is made spiritual and holy, in us is but the body of this death from which we look for no deliverance until our mortality shall be swallowed up of life.

We had never before been informed of our maternal relation to the covenant. We had supposed that the Jerusalem, which John saw descending from God out of heaven adorned as a bride prepared for her husband, was the mother of all those who, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise. We had been led to so understand it from the frequency of their being in the Scriptures spoken of as being her children, the sons of Zion, children of the kingdom, and we had also inferred it from the declarations of the Scriptures that she is the wife of him whom we believed was, and is, the only spiritual progenitor of all the spiritual posterity.

With the exception of what we have noticed, we have discovered nothing in this communication that was not as fully expressed in the former, and that has been repeatedly met.

The note which brother Vanmeter did not design for publication was not marked as private or confidential; and as we gathered from it that he also felt the infirmities of a fleshly nature, and hoping that we were not so widely separated in our views as we had feared, we were elated, and hastened to make it known to the brethren. But as he has now resumed his first position, we feel disposed to close the discussion on the subject. As many brethren seem opposed to controversy in the “Signs,” we leave our readers to compare what has been written on all sides, and may God grant us light and counsel from above, and lead us all into the way of truth and righteousness, for our Redeemer’s sake.

We are not conscious of any unkind feeling towards brother Vanmeter, and feel inclined to believe that the difference in our views arises from his attributing to the faculties of our old depraved, sinful, dying nature, what we regard as the development of the new man which is born of God. But should we prolong this discussion, it is feared that both of us may demonstrate some traits in our natural faculties, minds, understandings and feelings that could hardly be thought were born of God, or come directly from heaven. That which is born of God cannot commit sin. If born of incorruptible seed, that seed can produce nothing but what is as pure and incorruptible as the seed; we must of necessity conclude that all impurities, betrayed by us after that birth, arises from our fleshly nature. However others may think, we dare not impute them to any thing that is born of God.

The foregoing remarks were written soon after we received brother Vanmeter's letter, which drew them forth, and it was then our design to publish both the letter and the remarks as soon as we could conveniently make room for them in our columns. But on after reflection, it occurred to us that a protraction of the discussion was causing excitement among the brethren who are strongly averse to controversy, and we feared that the insertion of the letter, with or without our editorial remarks, would have a tendency to make the difference between Elder Vanmeter and ourself seem to be far greater than it really is. We cannot persuade ourself that our personal experience differs; although we have so differently construed each other's use of words.

Brother Vanmeter speaks of the same warfare in his own experience which we find raging in us, between our flesh and spirit, between the old man and the new man, in us. We have differed very widely in our interpretation of the meaning of some words which have been used by both of us. As, for instance, regeneration, the new birth, soul, faculties, etc. But avoiding our manner of employing these words, we are probably as well agreed, in regard to the experience of the children of God, as it is common for brethren of the same faith to be. Let us then avoid "doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife," etc., and we shall the better promote each other's peace, and more sacredly keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.

REMARKS ON ELDER J. H. BIGGS' LETTER.

It is gratifying to know that in all our trials and persecutions, we have kind, constant, true and faithful brethren and sisters who sympathize with us, and whose ardent prayers ascend to God on our behalf. We would much rather endure all the malicious calumny and reproach to which we have been inured from our youth, than to be deprived of the love and fellowship of kind confiding brethren and sisters who have been taught of the Lord to "bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ." It could hardly have been expected that one so weak, and imperfect as ourself, could have occupied so prominent a position as we have been called to fill, for nearly forty years, without provoking the malignity of enemies, and calling for the sympathy and support of friends. Indeed we seriously doubt whether among the most gifted of the sons of Zion, any one could be singled out to fill the same public position, who would altogether escape the bitter aspersions of those who are hostile to the cause we advocate. If such a one can be found, we would cheerfully resign our place in his favor. It is not our privilege to claim that our course has been without fault; that in the thirty-seven years our pages have been free from marks of defection; that we have on all occasions pursued the most judicious course. Such pretentious we have never made. But we do assert that we have aimed to make our paper a useful and truthful medium of correspondence; and to the best of our ability we have battled error, and contended for the truth as it is in Jesus. We have never designedly advanced an error, nor shunned to declare the whole truth.

We have neither been disappointed, nor disheartened by the opposition which we have encountered from our avowed opponents; but the opposition we have in some few instances received from those on whom we have relied on as brethren, has occasioned us grief. If it were not that some precious brethren may have been misled by the slanderous misrepresentations of designing men, we would willingly bear all the reproach and vituperation of all others. But we esteem too highly the confidence and fellowship of our brethren to feel unmoved when they are by the wiley arts of wicked men drawn into the ranks of our opposers.

As to those preachers who can find no better employment than to malign our correspondents or ourself, we leave them in the hands of him who judgeth righteously. We are not inclined to retaliate, or to return railing for railing, or reviling for reviling; we would rather pray the Lord, if consistent with his holy will, to subdue the enmity of their hearts, and incline them to a better employment. Those persons named by brother Biggs, {whose names we suppress} may injure us to some extent, by their calumny in misleading some honest brethren, for their hatred is cruel, but their friendship would be to us far more intolerable, so long as they retain so much rankling venom in their hearts.

We have thought that the purification of the church of God requires such agencies, or the Lord would rebuke them. As those who love and fear the Lord can only comfortably affiliate with those religiously who are of like precious faith, so, on the other hand, those who cherish hatred and malice, envies and evil speaking in their hearts, will naturally attract and draw out from the churches those who are of a similar proclivity. If we have in our connection those who love to slander the saints; and to oppose those who are contending for the truth, it will greatly relieve the churches when they go to their own company. It need not disturb us that such “vain talkers and deceivers” should plunge deeper and deeper into the popular heresies of the times; this will tend to dismantle them ultimately of their sheep’s clothing, in which they lie in wait to deceive, and expose them in their detestable ugliness.

Their threats to crush the “Signs of the Times” we have heard before, and frequently reiterated for about thirty years; but the “Signs of the Times” still survives their wrath, and, for aught we can see to the contrary, is like to continue. But if it should be annihilated, still God will preserve his church, and defend his truth. The general character of the paper and the sentiments of its humble editor, are too well known throughout the continent to suffer much from their aspersions.

REMARKS ON EPHESIANS II. 5.

BROTHER BEEEE: - Will you give us your views on Eph. ii. 5. “Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ (By grace ye are saved.)”

ISAAC BRISCOE.

REPLY: IN reply to our brother, we will say, Such as we have, we will give; and certainly nothing more can reasonably be required at our hands. We understand the apostle in this epistle to a Gentile church, and with them, to all the faithful in Christ Jesus, to be laboring to show that all spiritual blessings result to us from the fixed purpose and determinate decrees of God, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will; and flowing to the heirs of promise in precise accordance with the doctrine of election - According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world. And having in the first chapter brought to view the the firm, immutable and everlasting basis of our hope for life and salvation, dwells, in the immediate connection of our text, on the quickening power of God, in reference to the execution of his eternal and unfrustrable design in the salvation of his people. In the passage presented for consideration, the saints are spoken of as being quickened together with Christ, and saved by grace. We presume the following considerations are fairly involved in the subject before us, viz:

First. The life which the saints had in Christ before they fell in Adam. That the saints had any personal individual existence other than that which was given them in Christ, we shall not contend; but that they existed as the spiritual body of which Christ is the Head, is as clearly proven in the scriptures, as is the existence of Christ as Head of his body; and that the body of Christ was created in Christ, as that Eve was created in Adam; and that they were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, and in him were predestinated to all that they were by Jehovah destined to be, either in time or eternity, is fully implied in the first chapter of this epistle. The omniscient eye could, and did see the substance of Christ, lying in embyo; and in his book all his members were written, when as yet there was none of them. Psa. 16. In. him was life, and the life was the light of men. John i. 4. Do we inquire, What life was in him, who was with God, and who was God? The apostle answers: "Your life is hid with Christ in God." "When he who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Col. iii. 3, 4. In perfect harmony with this sentiment, is the expression of the psalmist. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." Psa. xci. 1. The place where God has hidden the life of his people, must be a secret place, and under the shadow or protection of the Almighty; and that such is the place of the saints' security, see Deut. xxxiii. 27. "Tue Eternal God is thy refuge," &c. And that such has ever been the spiritual habitation of the saints, see Psa. xc. 1, 2. "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place ill all generations; before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world; even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God," &c. As we apprehend no danger of these premises being disputed by Old School brethren, for brevity's sake we pass.

Second. The cause and nature of alienation, death, &c. In the preceding part of the chapter from which we have our text, the apostle connects our death with our existence in an earthly Adam, or under the law, as transgressors thereof; dead, he says, in trespasses and sins. He has elsewhere informed us that sin is a transgression of the law; but where there is no law there is no transgression. Hence this death has reference to our law state; and consequently to our relation to an earthly Adam. Now if we were to speak of the first great cause of all causes, we would say with the psalmist, (xi. 3) “Thou turnest men to destruction, and sayest, Return, ye children of men.” Or in the language of the apostle, (Rom. viii. 20) “For the creature was made subject to vanity; not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope.” But when speaking as to the procuring cause, on the part of man, we conceive that our alienation from God, and total depravity, and death in sins, is attributable to the introduction of sin into the world. In Romans v. 17, the apostle tells us, that by one man’s offence, death reigned by one, &c. And again in this epistle, (iv. 18) this apostle attributes our alienation from the life of God, to that ignorance which is, to us, in consequence of our depravity by sin. Hence he very justly denominates it a death in trespasses and sins. The nature of our alienation is properly compared to a state of captivity “All we like sheep have gone astray.” Isa. liii. 6, 1 Peter ii. 25. The law under which we were created in Adam required of us perfect and perpetual obedience; and said in a voice of thunder, The soul that sinneth, it shall die. We had all sinned and come short of his glory; hence we fell under the condemning sentence of the law, became lawful captives, were by the law cast into the prison of death, and there held in chains of darkness, without hope, and without God in the world; and, as the apostle here tells us, “ That at this time we were without Christ, (or life - for Christ is our life) being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, (Gentiles literally,) and condemned sinners, in the spiritual view of the subject, and strangers to the covenants of promise.” The covenants of promise made with Abraham, were figurative of the provisions of grace locked up in the cabinet of the divine mind, for the heirs of salvation; and in our degradation we were utter strangers to that provision, and equally so to any other way of life and salvation. Notwithstanding our captivity, darkness, bondage, guilt and death, we are not to suppose that what was treasured up in Christ for us, had undergone any change; God is immutable; and Jude assures us that the saints which were sanctified by God the Father, were preserved in Christ Jesus. Jude 1, And Paul has named them as the "reserved ones;" (Rom. xi. 4) and our text, as we propose to show, forbids the notion that God's love towards us could be abated by any thing which we could do. "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." - Songs viii. 7. Nor can all the substance of poor, lost, sinful mortals buy it; it is sovereign, discriminating, eternal, immutable, and invincible. Could we admit that in our fall in Adam, we fell out of Christ, or that the vital relationship of his children to him was dissolved, in relation to that life which was given us in him, and secured for us in him before all worlds, we should despair of salvation by him; for the lawful captive must be lawfully; and by virtue of the eternal indissoluble union; the right of redemption was vested in Christ; and on this principle he came into the world, and was made under the law, (not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it) to redeem them that were under the law. In this relationship he could, and did as truly represent us, in the obedience which he rendered to the divine law, as Adam had represented us in. his first transgression of divine authority; hence, says the apostle, "Therefore, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men unto condemnation, even so (or exactly so) by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life; for, as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." - Rom. v. 18, 19.

In the foregoing, we have expressed our views of the life we had in Christ from everlasting, of our fallen state, and alienation in our earthly Adam, our captivity, bondage, &c., and also the way of life through the obedience and death of Christ; but our text says, we are "quickened together with Christ." Apart from him we must have been, had the preexisting bond been severed; and a part from him there was no way possible for us to be quickened. Our natural head, Adam, was made a living soul; our spiritual representative was made a Quickening Spirit. quickeneth whomsoever he will. Together with him. How sweet! how heavenly the language! Together with him, we had life before the world began. Together with him, we are in due time quickened and raised from the deal. Together with Christ, are we sons of God, and heirs of immortal glory; and so completely together, or united, that when he died for us all, then were we all dead; dead to the law by the body of Christ; all our accumulated guilt was laid on him; bearing for us all the dreadful curse of the law, billows of divine wrath overwhelming his soul, and baptized him deep in death; but soon the bands of death gave way, soon the auspicious morning dawned, which gave ample demonstration of his complete victory over sin, death and hell, while the radiant flame of his refulgent glory brought life and immortality to light, for all the members of his mystical body. In the resurrection of Christ, the prophecy of Isaiah (xxvi. 19.) was fulfilled. "Thy dead men shall live; together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Having thus in him suffered the vengeance of the law, been crucified together with him, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance (not to a purchased possession) incorruptible, and undefiled, (notwithstanding our fall in Adam) and that fadeth not away; reserved (not newly procured) in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation." - See I Peter i. 3-5. Hence we see in the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, the all-sufficiency of his atonement, complete satisfaction rendered to law and divine justice, the prison doors are unbarred, the jubilee trumpet is blown, liberty is proclaimed to captives, the prisoners are brought up out of their prison houses; and as he bursts forth from the confines of the tomb, his ransomed church is seen emerging from the dead, while from the old heaven, now dissolving with fervent heat, the shout is heard, "Lift up up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in." - Psa. xxiv. 7 - 9. When God went up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet. - Psa. xlvii. 5. full of consolation is the contemplation of the union of Christ and the church.

"One in the tomb, one when he rose,
One when he triumph'd o'er his foes,
One when in heav'n he took his seat,
While seraphs sung all hell's defeat."

Lastly. That this astonishing work was done for us when we were dead in sins, is worthy of special attention. Before we were dead, we needed no such work as quickening, or the resurrection of our blessed Lord for us, as the whole need not a physician. "But God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us. Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him." - Rom. v. 8, 9. And again. This great work being performed for us when we were dead in sins, shows that it could not possibly rest on any merit, work or will of ours; therefore the apostle adds the words, "By grace ye are saved;" and afterwards declares that it is not of works, lest any man should boast; but that we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God had before ordained that we should in them.

In conclusion, be it ours to reflect with wonder, joy and gratitude to God, on the revelation of a way of life and salvation so completely adapted to our ruined condition, and so admirably calculated to abase the proud man in the dust before God. Not unto us, not unto us, O God, but to thy name give all the glory. Amen.

REMARKS ON FASTING

Dear Brother Beebe: Times, religiously, are quite as flattering as when I last wrote. Since my last letter was written, I have baptized some fifteen or more. How long these happy seasons of refreshings from the presence of the Lord will continue I cannot tell; for at present the public mind, and also the mind of the church, is much disturbed by the distracted condition of our once happy country. I herewith send you a copy of a resolution passed by the Bethlehem Church of Regular Baptists, at her regular meeting of business, Saturday, May 4,1861:

Resolved: That this church order and ordain that Thursday, the 6th day of June, 1861, be observed and kept as a day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer to Almighty God, for the interposition of his wisdom and power in the settling of our national difficulties, and that he would restore peace to us as a nation and a church. And further

Resolved: That a copy of this resolution be sent to all the churches of our Association, that they may join with us on that day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer, for the purpose above stated.

Joel Hume, Moderator.
William Williams, Clerk.

I believe all our churches will respond to the call, and not only ours, but all the churches of our sister Associations, who may hear what the above church has done. Please publish this at the earliest possible day.

Your affectionate brother, James Strickland.

Remarks on Fasting - We have complied with the request of our esteemed brother Elder James Strickland in publishing the order and appointment of the Bethlehem church of Regular Baptists, to observe a day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer, for the interposition of divine power to save our beloved country from the calamity of civil and fratricidal war and anarchy. While we most heartily approve their object, and would most devoutly join them in humble supplication to God to allay the fury of the belligerent elements, and roll back the cloud of strife, and extend the peaceful spirit of the gospel far abroad, we cannot easily suppress our doubts in regard to the manner proposed. The instructions of our Lord on the subject forbids us to fast after the manner of those who make a public display of their fastings and prayers. These are the words of instruction to the disciples of Jesus on the subject: "Moreover when ye fast, be not as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance; for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily, I say unto you, They have their reward. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head and wash thy face; that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which is in secret shall reward thee openly." Our fasting should be a secret matter with our God. But if we pass resolutions appointing a day for fasting, and publicly announce our appointments, wherein do we in those particulars differ from the hypocrites? We do not mean to be understood as doubting the purity of the motives of our brethren. In their object there is a very wide difference; but in manner, in making their fasting a public matter, do they not transgress the instructions of their Lord? We cannot set a day in the future when we will be humble, devotional, prayerful and abstineous. But when immediately under the humbling power of the Spirit, then, and only then, can we abase ourselves before God, while our outward appearance must not betray to men that we are fasting. The New School Baptist State convention in Georgia has recently presented to the Congress of the seceded States a set of resolutions, in which they pledge themselves to sustain the war, and request the Congress to appoint a fast day; while nearly all the pulpits in the Northern States are equally bent on war and public fasting. In all candor we ask, do not those ostentatious religious flourishes justify the words of the Lord, by Isaiah 58:4, “Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness,” etc.?

It is truly a time when christians should fast and pray and cry mightily unto the Lord to visit our guilty land in mercy, pardon our sins, blot out our transgressions and spare us in mercy from the consequences of our own madness and folly. And we do hope that not only the Bethlehem church of Illinois, and those in her vicinity, but every branch of the church of God in our country, both North and South, may pray without ceasing for a return of peace and prosperity to all parts of our country, and for a general outpouring of his Spirit, and revival of his cause. But in our humiliation and devotion let us observe the instructions of our Lord, and avoid ostentation and parade.

REMARKS ON ISAIAH 32:1.

“Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment.” Isa.32:1.

That the King of whom this prediction was written is the King of saints, whom God has set upon his holy hill of Zion, who bears the titles; King of Glory, King of Righteousness, and King Eternal, Immortal and Invisible, the only wise God our Savior, there can be no reasonable doubt; and that his imperial title which is written upon his vesture and his thigh is expressive of his supreme power and dominion over all beings and all events and all worlds. In his coronation he is set over all the works of God, having all power in heaven and in earth given into his hands, so that “in his times he shall shew, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords.” While in his supreme Godhead, abstractly considered, his power and glory is underived and eternal, so that it can neither be increased nor diminished, it is said of him, in his Mediatorial Sonship, that “the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever.” Isa. 9:6,7. While as the God of providence his empire extends throughout all space, as the King of saints his kingdom is not of this world. It is a spiritual kingdom, composed of spiritual subjects, and ruled by laws peculiarly adapted for the government of his chosen generation, royal priesthood and holy nation. It is unquestionably of him as the King of saints this prophecy is uttered, as anticipating that kingdom and government which the God of heaven should set up in the time of the kings of which Daniel prophesied.

Whole volumes would not suffice to record all the glory of his kingdom, or to tell of the excellency of his power, we shall only attempt in this article to speak of a few things in regard to the reign of this most glorious King, and his subjects and laws.

First, “He shall reign.” To be called a king, and yet have no absolute reigning power, would be but an empty title. Or to occupy a throne by the suffrage only of his subjects, would not justify the emphatic declaration of our text, “Behold a king shall reign.” These words imply an absolute power, imperial authority and unrestricted dominion of all the subjects of the kingdom over which such a king shall sway his sceptre.

To reign signifies that all his subjects are governed by him. That his will is their law, and that he has the power to command and secure strict and implicit obedience to his laws, and to punish and chastise every transgression and disobedience of his subjects. Reigning as an absolute monarch, he is the sole legislator in his kingdom; no law has any force or validity within his dominion that he has not himself made and given. All, and whatsoever he has not commanded, is positively forbidden to his subjects. Not even his holy apostles were permitted to amend, restrict, or expand his laws or his dominion. While they as enthroned princes were empowered and qualified to “rule in judgment,” they were not allowed to either add to or diminish from his laws. Fearful judgments are written against such as shall presume to add to the words of the book of this prophecy, or to take anything therefrom. “Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples.” “To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them.” Isa. 8:16 & 20.

The peculiar structure of his kingdom forbids that it shall be governed by any other than the King of saints; for all the vitality and spirituality of the entire kingdom is of him. No man can see it until born of his Spirit, nor can its laws, ordinances or provisions be known until they are revealed by his Spirit. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, for they are only spiritually discerned. God has revealed them to us by his Spirit. As his laws are purely spiritual, they cannot be like the old covenant requisitions, written on tables of stone, nor understood by carnal men, as were the laws of a carnal commandment, but by the power of an endless life. They are written in the hearts and printed in the minds of his heaven born subjects. It is called the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, and it makes those in whom it is written free from the law of sin and death. The laws of this kingdom have no application to the ungodly of mankind. The carnal or fleshly mind is enmity against God, it is not subject to this law, neither indeed can be. Carnal men cannot obey the precepts which Christ has enjoined on the subjects of his kingdom, therefore if they should do the very things which he has commanded his disciples to do, it would not be obedience, for who hath required such works at their hands? Only they that love Jesus are the subjects of his laws. He has said, “If ye love me, keep my commandments.” “For love is of God, and every one that loveth is born of God, for God is love.” They who are not born of God do not love, and therefore the laws given to those who do love him and are born of him, do not apply to such as are still under the law of sin and death. They that love him are commanded to deny themselves, take up their cross and follow him. And he says, “Then are ye my disciples indeed, if ye do whatsoever I command you.” He commands all who love him to be baptized; but he does not command them who hate, or who do not love him, to be baptized; it would not therefore be obedience for the latter class to be baptized. For who hath required it of them? He has commanded them who love him to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and he has said to all such, “Seek, and ye shall find; ask, and it shall be given unto you; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.” But none of these laws are given to those who do not love him, or who are not born of God. How can they seek for the kingdom who cannot see it? And none can see it except they be born again. And if they are born again they will love God, love Jesus, and love to obey him, because his law is in their hearts, and he makes them a willing people in the day of his power. For it is God that worketh in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure. So that in all his commands and their obedience, Jesus our King reigns. And he reigns in righteousness, for “The law of the LORD is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the LORD is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the LORD is pure, enlightening the eyes. The fear of the LORD is clean, enduring for ever; the judgments of the LORD are true and righteous altogether.” Psa. 19:7-9. There can be nothing wrong in his government, nothing in it therefore can admit of improvement, or amendment. Down to the latest generation, the laws, ordinances, doctrine and institutions will remain precisely as they were first issued by our King. For those who are born of his Spirit, and therefore love him, to transgress the law of his kingdom, or fail to obey his precepts, will not change the purity or perfection of his laws, but it will surely subject the disobedient child to chastisement. They who know his will and do it not shall be beaten with many stripes; for they shall surely find that “the way of the transgressor is hard.”

The righteous reign of a king or potentate consists not only in the perfection of his laws, and power to enforce them, but also in his legitimate right to reign, and his wisdom and ability to secure the safety, peace, happiness and well being of all his subjects.

Earthly monarchs have sometimes usurped the power which they hold, and come to their thrones through the blood of thousands whom they have slain in depriving someone more worthy than themselves of their crown. But although the subjects of our Redeemer's kingdom were aliens and foreigners, and under the righteous dominion of the law, the Captain of their salvation rendered due obedience to the law for them, and redeemed them from under the law, and himself became the end of the law for righteousness to every one of them. He honored the law and paid every jot and tittle of its demands, and by laying down his own life; which, he through the eternal Spirit offered, he obtained eternal redemption for them. In his death he canceled all legal demands that stood against them, and in his resurrection from the dead brought their immortality to light, and so identified with himself in his resurrection from the dead, that they are made partakers of his resurrection life, so that they are no more under the law, but under grace; and by the law of the spirit of life in himself he has made them free from the law of sin and death. He arises with them from under the law, and ascends to his Father, and to their Father, to his God, and to their God, and receives the kingdom to which he was appointed. God has raised him from the dead and exalted him in his Mediatorial glory, far above all principalities and powers, and above every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come, and has given him to be the head over all things to his church, which is his body, and the fullness of him that filleth all in all. Therefore, to the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; and the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness; therefore God, even thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows. God himself has set his King upon his holy hill of Zion, and every saint is taught to say, "For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever and ever. Amen." And in their loudest anthems and most exalted devotion sing the new and everlasting song, which none but the redeemed can sing, saying, “Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints.” His power to defend his subjects has been tested. He comes from Edom with dyed garments, speaking in righteousness, traveling in the greatness of his strength, mighty to save. And he is able to save unto the uttermost them that come unto God by him, seeing that he ever lives to make intercession for them. Safe in him, and their life is hid with Christ in God, so that the eternal God is their refuge, and underneath them are his everlasting arms. He rideth upon the heavens in their help, and in his excellency on the sky.

The provision for their constant supply are ample, the inexhaustible fullness of grace and truth, wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption, with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, is amply supplied. His name to all his saints is a strong tower into which the righteous run and are safe.

Now seated on his Mediatorial throne in Zion, having all power in heaven and in earth, and all the wisdom of eternal Deity, he reigns in righteousness. No defection can be found in his administration of the government. He doeth all things well, and all his subjects delight to speak of the glory of his kingdom and to talk of his power; for in his presence is fullness of joy, and at his right hand are pleasures forevermore,

“All hail the power of Jesus’ name,
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all.”

“And princes shall rule in judgment.” Although all the redeemed people of our God are made kings and priests unto him, and shall reign with their exalted Savior, there is a sense in which the apostles of the Lamb are to be regarded as princes peculiarly qualified to rule.

Princes, in earthly governments are those who belong to royal families, and especially such as are invested with princely authority, and are to be respected as legitimate representatives of the government which they administer. In the kingdom of our Redeemer the apostles are, in the regeneration of the church of God, seated on twelve thrones, and endued with power from above to judge the twelve tribes of Israel. We have shown in our former article that our Lord Jesus Christ, as the “Blessed and only Potentate,” occupies the only throne of absolute sovereign power. He is Head over all things to his church, and sole legislator for his kingdom. No other prince or power has any right to alter, abridge, amend, annul, or add to the laws and institutions which he has enacted and enjoined. His will is the supreme law, and whatsoever he has not commanded is positively forbidden; so that to do religiously what he has not commanded, is as reprehensible as to leave undone what he has commanded. The twelve thrones therefore on which the twelve apostles preside, are not thrones of legislation, but they are thrones of judgment. Yet the seats of the apostles are called thrones, because they are places of power, and essential to the organic establishment of the kingdom; and when and wherever this King reigns in righteousness, then and there these princes rule in judgment. These thrones, or places of power, can never be vacated, nor occupied by any but the chosen and ordained apostles; they have no successors. “And Jesus said unto them, {the apostles} Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me.” Not as it is sometimes heedlessly read, Ye which have followed me in the regeneration; for the regeneration of which he spake had not yet transpired; for it was the regeneration of the church from a legal to a gospel state. This was not at the time these words were spoken accomplished, for the law held dominion over the head and body of the church, until every jot and tittle of its requirements were fulfilled; but when the Savior arose from the dead, together with his dead body the church arose to a new relationship, and became dead to the law, by the body of Christ, that she should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead. Rom. 7:4. "Ye which have followed me." Observe the comma after the word me. These disciples had followed him in his temptations, and they were asking him what they should have in his prospective kingdom, and in reply to the inquiry of Peter, he said, "In the regeneration, {What regeneration?} when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory." This was at that time prospective; for it behooved him first to suffer and rise from the dead, and then to enter into his glory; and for this joy which was set before him, he endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. "And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. 19:28. Now having endured the cross, and arisen from the dead, and set down at the right hand of the throne of God, which is the throne of his glory, with all power in heaven and earth in his hands, he bade them tarry at Jerusalem until they should be endued with power from above. And when the Day of Pentecost had fully come, they received that power from above; and they hold it yet; then the gospel kingdom was fully organized, and from that time the Lord has added to the church such as shall be saved. The Holy Ghost came upon them like a mighty rushing wind from heaven. "And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." Acts 2:1-4. Now the redeemed, regenerated church is fully organized, Christ her King has ascended his throne of glory, to reign in righteousness, and his princes are duly inaugurated and seated on thrones of judgment. The spirit of infallible inspiration, as the keys of the kingdom of heaven, is given to them; their judgment in all things pertaining to the kingdom is final, and from it there is no appeal; whatsoever they bind on earth is bound in heaven, and whatsoever they loose on earth is loosed in heaven; for all their decisions being immediately by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, are invariably according to the spirit of the laws of Christ, and are the will of God.

The King shall reign, but the princes or apostles shall rule in judgment. The difference between a reigning king, and a ruling judge, or magistrate, is that the former makes the laws, and the latter rules according to the laws of the king. The apostles never attempted to add to, or diminish from the laws of Christ; as their commission was only to teach baptized believers to observe all things whatsoever Christ the King had commanded them. No more, no less; and that there should be no failure through their infirmities, they are baptized with the Holy Ghost, and have the promise that he shall bring all things to their remembrance whatsoever Christ had commanded them.

Whenever then we find a gospel church, we find a company of baptized believers, steadfastly continuing in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship. And whenever Christ is recognized as the King in supreme authority, the apostles are also recognized as princes on thrones of judgment. True the apostles are not here with us in their fleshly bodies, neither is the King present with us in the flesh; for the kingdom is a spiritual kingdom, wherein we know no man after the flesh. But Christ is no less with his church, than if he were here in a body of flesh; neither are his apostles absent from the church because they are seen no more by mortal eyes. As rulers in judgment they are still with us, and their thrones of judgment can no more be vacated, or occupied by others, than can the throne of Christ.

The subjects of Christ's kingdom still need the judgments, decisions, interpretations and administrations of the inspired apostles. As rulers they have expounded to us, and do still expound to us the laws of Christ, and just as they expound and enjoin them, we must and do accept and abide by them, or we are not disciples of Christ. Jesus said to them, "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." Matt. 10:40.

As subjects of the kingdom of Christ, we have not to consult the opinions of men, nor to inquire what have been the decisions of ecclesiastical councils, nor what has been the practice of the professed church in ages past, but in every particular point of doctrine or practice, of faith or order, on which we need instruction, we are to consult the decisions of the apostles which they have left on record. Whatsoever they have not bound, they have loosed; that is, we are charged not to be entangled with any yoke of bondage, or any religious rule or law which they have not taught us to observe. If in anything we need special instruction, we shall find the twelve judges upon their thrones, and always ready to be consulted, and always ready to decide for us on every obligation required of us.

REMARKS ON ISAIAH 53:12.

"Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death; and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors."

At the request of brother Caleb Thurston, of Ohio, we present such views as we have, for the consideration of those who may feel interested. We approach the subject with fear and much trembling, for we greatly distrust our ability to elucidate the subject to the edification of our readers. Although the general theme of the inspired prophet in this chapter is remarkably clear even to the feeblest of the saints, there are some figurative expressions in the text on which some of our most enlightened brethren have differed. The apostles have referred to this chapter, as in I Peter 2:24, and elsewhere; besides the preaching of the Evangelist Philip to the eunuch, which clearly demonstrates to us that the prophet spake these things of our Lord Jesus Christ. He is brought to view by this prophet in his Mediatorial character and work, as the "righteous servant" of God; for although "being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." Phil. 2:6-8. In his Mediatorial work it behooved him to suffer, and to rise from the dead, that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name. The cause, the nature, necessity and object of his sufferings are unmistakably set forth in this chapter, and in the last three verses his complete success in the accomplishment of all that he had undertaken is emphatically declared. "When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the LORD shall prosper in his hand. He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities." What immediately follows the words above copied, are those on which we are requested to write, and they express the unequivocal pledge of the eternal God, that he shall realize all that joy which was set before him, for which he endured the cross, and despised the shame. Heb.12:2. The word therefore in this connection signifies, in consideration of the perfect work; the efficient offering and effectual sacrifice which he has made, he shall be duly rewarded. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has solemnly pledged his word, saying, "Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong," &c.

This form of expression often occurs in the Old Testament, in speaking of great warriors, and brilliant victories achieved by mighty conquerors. The triumphant party were accustomed to divide the spoils of victory. Those who were successful would receive such portion of what had been gained by the conflict, as would indicate the brilliancy of the conquest. When it was said that such warriors had a portion with the great, and that they divided the spoils with the strong, such declarations signified the greatness, or importance of their victory. No earthly warrior ever fought so important a battle as did our Savior. No spoils of conquest won on sanguinary fields of human strife can be compared with that in which the conquering Prince of glory, with his own right hand and holy arm got to him the victory, when he vanquished sin, death and hell, and destroyed him that had the power of death; when he led captivity captive, who he abolished death, and brought immortality to light, when his own arm brought salvation unto him, when emerging from the conflict, he came from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, glorious in his apparel, and traveling in the greatness of his strength, with names and titles of imperishable honor written upon his vesture and upon his thigh, King of kings, and Lord of lords. All principalities and powers, all thrones and dominions, are put completely in subjection to his Mediatorial exaltation, and he is invested with all power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life unto as many as the Father has given unto him.

Whether the words, "I will divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong," were intended to express only the magnitude of his victory, and certain pledge of the Father, that he shall certainly realize all the honor and glory of his achievement, in his exaltation to his Mediatorial throne and kingdom, and be invested with all the power of heaven and earth, and be glorified with God's own self, with the glory that he had with the Father before the world was, according to John 17:4,5, and all the brightness of his Father's glory, receive his coronation as the King Eternal, Immortal, invisible, the only wise God and Savior, or not, we are certain that these honors were and are secured to him, and are embraced in the joy that was set before him, for which he endured the cross, and despised the shame, and is now set down at the right hand of the throne of God. Heb.12:2. In the Mediatorial work of our great Redeemer, as set forth in the chapter of which our text is the conclusion, we are presented with a striking view of the conflict or warfare which he accomplished, as the sin-bearing, sin-atoning Redeemer of his people, who was delivered for their offences, and raised from the dead for their justification. In this terrible conflict he bore our griefs, and carried our sorrows, was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed. The Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all; that is, all who like sheep had gone astray, all for whom he was bruised, all for whom his soul was poured out, and all who with his stripes are healed. He has himself told us for whom he suffered. He says, “I lay down my life for my sheep.” And to his Father he says of the sheep for whom he laid down his life, “Thine they were, and thou gavest them me.” And to the Jews he said, “All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.” But he also said to them, “No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day.” John 6:37,44. And again, at verse 39, of the same chapter, he says, “And this is the Father’s will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day.”

All those, and indeed all other inspired scriptures corroborate the declaration, “He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied.” Can any thing less than what he asked the Father for satisfy him? “Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me; for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.” John 17:24. This prayer is also according to the will of the Father, as we have shown that it is the Father’s will that Christ shall lose nothing of all that he has given him; but that he shall raise it up at the last day. Therefore, saith the eternal God, will I divide him a portion with the great. “For the Lord’s portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.” Deut. 32:9. This portion is divided unto him as the trophies or spoils rescued or taken in battle from the enemy. As he said in one of his parables, “When the Son of man shall come in his glory.” That is, when he should arise from the dead and come into his kingdom, or set up his kingdom and take his seat upon his Mediatorial throne, “then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." Our risen and exalted Savior verified this declaration when he came in all the power of his Father on the day of pentecost; for then he was revealed as having power over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as the Father had given, or divided unto him. He had told his disciples before his crucifixion, that he would go and receive a kingdom and return. That kingdom he has received, and now presides over it, enthroned in majesty, and is in receit of his portion, as the north gives up, and the south resigns, and his subjects are gathered from the four winds of heaven, into his kingdom, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to go no more out forever. God has thus divided to him his portion with the great; and he shall divide the spoil with the strong. His portion includes all that the Father hath given him, all that he has redeemed, all that he has loved and given himself for. And having triumphed over death, hell and sin, and conquered the world, the flesh and the devil, and having full power over all beings and all worlds; he from the conquered and subjugated world calls out his portion from the mass, and divides to the strong hand of law and justice all who are not included in his own portion. Of his portion he says, "This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise." And of the residue he says, "Reprobate silver shall men call them, for I have rejected them." This portion perfectly satisfies him. He prays not for the world, but for them only whom the Father hath given him. This recompense he receives because of his Mediatorial work; because he hath poured out his soul unto death; and was numbered with the transgressors, and bare the sins of many, and made intercession for the transgressors. In their salvation he poured out his soul. His soul was exceedingly sorrowful even unto death. It pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief, and to make his soul an offering for sin. Though in his own immaculate person he was holy, harmless, and separate from sinners, in that he had done no violence, nor was there any guile found in his mouth, yet in the wondrous economy of grace, the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of all his people, and so he was numbered with the transgressors, and all their sins were found on him, and he bare the sins of many, he bore them in his own body on the tree, and put them all away by the sacrifice of himself; and by his one offering perfected forever them that are sanctified, or set apart to him as his portion. But through his death he has destroyed death, abolished death, and brought immortality to light; and rising from the dead has ascended up on high, and forever lives to make intercession for the transgressors.

The principle of relationship involved in the Mediatorial work of our Redeemer is clearly set forth in this connection. “All we like sheep have gone astray.” Christ is the good Shepherd whose own the sheep are; and all the trespasses of the sheep are chargeable to the Shepherd or owner of the flock. Although the sheep may be held in custody for the depredations they have committed, yet no suit in law can be brought against the sheep; the owner or shepherd is held responsible, and if he would re-possess them, he is required to prove property, pay expenses and then he may lawfully take them home. It is not expected that the sheep shall prove ownership, or that they can repair damages. The amount of damage is laid upon the Shepherd. Christ sustains this relation to his sheep. He is the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls. The divine law in justice looks to Christ the Shepherd, and demands satisfaction from him. Hence the sword awakes against the man that is the fellow of the eternal God, and smites the Shepherd, and without a murmuring word, the good Shepherd lays down his life for the sheep; and to him the porter openeth, and he calleth his own sheep by name and leadeth them out; and when he putteth forth his own sheep he goeth before them, and they follow him. “By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many.” “I know my sheep, and am known of mine.”

“My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hands. My Father which gave them me is greater than all, and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father’s hand. I and my Father are one.” John, chapter 10.

“I’ll give him, saith the Lord,
A portion with the strong;
He shall possess a large reward,
And hold his honors long.”

REMARKS ON JOHN III. 18.

“HE that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.”

OUR views upon the above declaration of scripture are solicited by brother J. M. Whipple, of Massachusetts.

Throughout the sacred scriptures the Lord has drawn a line between believers and unbelievers, and by the same has divided the sons of Adam into two distinct classes. To the one or to the other of these we, each of us, of necessity must belong. The believers are in the New Testament designated from the others as those who when manifested by the gospel do believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.

In the illustration of the above text let us consider briefly, first, the believer; second, the thing believed; third, their manifest exemption from condemnation; fourth the unbeliever - how demonstrated as such, and to what they are condemned.

1. Who are believers? The current notion among men is that every one who professes faith in Christ, irrespective of what may be his sentiments, provided he is sincere in ‘believing something, is in an evangelical sense a believer; hence men may believe with the Arminians, that the sinner is saved by works and justified by the deeds of the law; or with the apostle, that salvation is of the Lord, and not by works, &c.; and yet their characters are to be established by their sincerity rather than their faith; but our bible speaks of those who shall believe a lie, that they all may be damned, &c. The characters who believe in Christ, in the sense intended in the text, are such as have been taught of God. How shall they believe on him of whom they have not heard? And what preacher except the Lord himself can make the dead hear his voice, and live, he says by Isaiah, "I will cause my glorious voice to be heard." By the Psalmist, "Blessed are the people who know the joyful sound." And by the apostle, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the (logos) WORD OF GOD." And Christ himself says, "The hour is coming, and now Is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." But who are they that are thus brought to believe in Christ? The answer is at hand: "As many as were ordained unto eternal life."

2. What do they believe? The text says they believe on his name, i. e., on Christ's name. But is it enough that we believe that such a being visited our world eighteen hundred years ago, was born of Mary, wrought with Joseph, baptized by John, accused by false witnesses, delivered to be crucified by Pilate, that he died on the cross, rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven, &c. Is this all? Does this constitute saving faith on his name? Certainly not; for if this were all, devils were believers of all this, and thousands of unregenerated men believe this, but we apprehend that for me to believe on his name, I must have an evidence that he is my Savior, that he was delivered to die for my offences, that he arose for my justification, and that by his stripes I am healed; an evidence to this amount no man can possibly enjoy in an unregenerate state, for it is the Spirit that beareth witness with our spirits that we are born of God; and this is the only infallible evidence we can have, that God for Christ's sake has pardoned our sins, or that we are healed by his wounds. This we say is by the Spirit applied, and the carnal mind receiveth not the things of the Spirit. And again, "No man can call Jesus Lord but by the Holy Ghost." Hence the unregenerate cannot be reckoned among believers, whatever they may believe or assent to; for although they should swear that the Lord liveth, yet verily, the Lord says they swear falsely. They must, to constitute them believers, receive the spirit of truth. “Even the spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not,” &c.

3. Believers are manifestly freed from condemnation. “There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, for Christ is the end of the law for righteousness unto every one that believeth.” “He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned.” Hence the very fact of their believing on Christ as their Savior, in strict agreement with the whole tenor of the gospel, is a manifestation of their adoption by grace vine into the family of Christ, and demonstrates the fact that they were predestinated to the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will.

Upon this very principle, it was required by the primitive Baptists that all who were admitted to the waters of baptism should be received on a profession of faith in Christ, and this faith is always made manifest by works, but not by law-work, or the works of the flesh, or pursuing the cunning devices of men, or obeying the commandments of men; all this would prove nothing on this point, for even the Pharisees performed abundance of such work. But the work which proceeds from the faith of God’s elect are works of obedience to Christ, showing that the soul relies or believes on him as the King, Prophet, Priest and Lawgiver, Example, &c., and a faith which does not exhibit all this is dead faith, being alone.

Not he who worketh, or he who useth means, supports popular institutions, sits on an anxious bench; or he who speaks with the tongues of men, or angels, who gives his goods to the poor, or his body to he burned; but he that believeth on Christ, relies on him, trusts his whole interest for life and death, for time and eternity, on his blessed name; this soul shall never be brought into condemnation, for he has passed from death unto life. These shall never be ashamed or confounded, world without end.

4. The unbeliever. This character includes all who are not included in the number of those who believe on Christ. We must be either believers or unbelievers; there is no neutral ground; we are either the children of God or the children of the wicked one; heirs of Christ or heirs of misery; we either gather with the flock of Christ, or we scatter.

This dreadful character belongs to many who stand in the estimation of the world eminently pious; and whose faith is deemed by men far superior to what we conceive to be the faith of Jesus. But -

"The painted hypocrites are know!!
Through the disguise they wear."

This character, as our brother W. will discover, did embrace, at the time the words of this text were uttered by the lips of Jesus, the most popular and respectable religious denomination on the earth - the Pharisees. "Ye believe me not because ye are not my sheep," &c. "If ye were of God ye would believe on me." The unbeliever is made manifest by an exhibition of the glorious gospel of the Son of God. For the gospel is light, and no less so because the blind have no eyes to comprehend it; and whatsoever maketh manifest is light. The gospel makes manifest. "It shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all people." Jesus says, "If I had not come, &c., ye would not have had sin; but now ye have no cloak for your sin." The very fact that Jesus had come as the light of the world, and that they who were in darkness had no eyes to comprehend that light, was fail testimony that they were blind. An exhibition of his eternal truth took from them the cloak or covering of falsehood under which they had hid themselves, and they stood detected and condemned. They did not occupy the ground of probationers, in a state of trial, but were condemned already; and the demonstration of their condemnation was their unbelief. If they were of God, if they were ordained to eternal life, they would believe; but they did not believe, hence they were not of God, nor ordained to life, consequently they were weighed in the balance and found wanting; condemned and waiting their awful execution.

But unto what are they condemned? To die in their sin; for if, says Jesus, “Ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins.” “He that believeth not shall be damned.”

To conclude. Reader, on which side of this line dost thou stand? Art thou a believer in Jesus? do you trust alone in him for salvation and eternal glory? or art thou an unbeliever, trusting in an arm of flesh - human works or personal virtues? “Be not deceived, God is not mocked.”

REMARKS ON JOHN V. 40, AND REV. XXII. 17-19.

G. W. Pool, of Mississippi, has requested our views on John v. 40, and Rev. xxii. 17, and brother Israel J. Miller, of Indiana, has asked for our views on Rev. xxii. 17-19.

Such views as we have, or may be enabled to give on these passages of Scripture, we will give in one reply. On all of these passages our views have frequently been called for and given on former occasions, but as many of our present readers have not access to our files, and as we hold no secret views on the subject of divine revelation, we will cheerfully comply with the desires of our brethren as frequently as they may have occasion to call on us, to the extent of such ability as God may be pleased to afford us, and at that point we desire always to stop, without thinking our own thoughts, or speaking our own words.

The text in John, which is often brought by those who oppose the doctrine of special, discriminating and sovereign grace, to perplex the minds of those who love the truth, reads thus: "And ye will not come to me that ye might have life." Without considering the connection of the subject, or the occasion on which, or the people unto whom these words were addressed, the advocates of free will and human power rudely detach them from the place where they belong in the Scriptures, and endeavor to make them appear to sustain the idea that the salvation of souls rests upon the will and work of men. And although we are expressly told that the new birth is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God, who sheweth mercy; that it is not of works lest any should boast, still they show a settled determination to make the Bible appear to be a book of contradiction, and to turn even the truth of God into a lie, by making it seem to say what it does not say, and to teach doctrines opposite and antagonistic to each other. But all those who fear the Lord will revere and tremble at the word.

In this text our Lord was addressing the work-mongrel, self-righteous Jews, whose religious proclivity, and self-confidence, were in the most perfect unison with the doctrine, and delusion which is held and cherished by all the Arminian tribes of the earth, who oppose the truth of God at this present day. Jesus had, as we are told in this chapter, healed the impotent man, and bade him take his bed and walk, and these ancient free-willers sought to put him to death for breaking the Sabbath. He had announced himself to be the Son of God, and they were still more intent to slay him for blasphemy, in making himself equal with God. He had also declared his sovereign power to give life to whomsoever he would, without even asking their consent or co-operation in the work, just as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will; and that the dead did at that time, and should continue throughout all time, to hear the voice of the Son of God, and live. The dead shall hear, and they that hear shall live. And furthermore, this same Son, with the same power and judgment which he then possessed, shall ultimately raise the dead and judge the world at the last day. And that the resurrection of all the human family from their graves should be by him affected by the same sovereign and irresistible power and majesty of his voice, as in their being called by grace from death to life, when they are born again. But these declarations of his power and Godhead did not pacify them, nor did the unanswerable arguments incline them to yield their cherished doctrines of free-will and human power, nor divert them from looking away from the law, and their own willing and doing power for justification, to him as the only Savior, and the only way in which they can come unto the Father. Still, although confounded by his arguments, which they could neither resist nor gainsay, they cherished the prevailing delusion that the law, or the Old Testament Scriptures, possessed eternal life for them, on condition of their obedience to its requisitions. In them (the Scriptures of the Old Testament, the law of works, &c.,) they thought, as all their kindred of all ages think, they have eternal life, and therefore they see no need of Christ to save them. These Jews were as unconscious then, as the Arminians are now, of the truth of the declarations, By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God, and as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse. Hence they clung to the works of the law, to their own willing and doing, for justification and eternal life, and would not, had not the slightest inclination to turn away from themselves, from the law, and look or come to Christ for salvation. They had the same aversion to salvation through Jesus Christ, by sovereign, reigning and almighty grace, as have those who are of the same brood in our day.

Hence the words of our Lord to them, “Search the Scriptures.” The New Testament was not at that time published; the law and the prophets were intended, and in them the carnal Jews thought they had eternal life; but they were mistaken, and so are all who hope for acceptance before God now on the ground of their own wills or works, mistaken. “They are they that testify of me.” The law and the prophets testified of Christ as the Shiloh, the Messiah, the Lord God that should come with a strong hand, and his arm should rule for him, and that he would gather his sheep with his arm, &c. But these carnal Jews were not his sheep, as he had said unto them; and therefore they were the more deluded in thinking that in the law and the prophets they had eternal life. Again, the Old Testament testified of Christ that “A seed shall serve him; it shall be counted to the Lord for a generation.” That they should all be taught of God, and that every one that heard and learned of the Father should come to Christ; that they should be willing in the day of his power. But these legal work-mongers did not possess these characteristics, these marks; they had not the will nor the power. Instead of a will to be saved by him, their will was to put him to death as a Sabbath-breaker, an impostor, and blasphemer. Jesus not only declared their utter destitution of a will to come to him for life, but he declared to them the reason why they were thus destitute of the will: First, because they had not been taught of God; for said he to them, "Ye have neither heard his voice at any time nor seen his shape," therefore they were not taught of him. All his saints have heard his voice, for says he, My sheep heard my voice, and I know them, and they follow (or come unto) me, and I give them eternal life. (John x. 27, 28.) And they see his shape, for they see Jesus, who is the image of the invisible God, the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person. All who have seen him have seen the Father also, for they are one. He is in the Father, and the Father is in him. These carnal Jews were not manifestly the subjects of saving grace, therefore they could see no attractions in him, for they had nothing in them to be attracted by him. They saw neither form nor comeliness that they should desire him or a knowledge of his ways.

"And ye have not his word abiding in you." In the absence of his word, they were dead in sin; for his word is Spirit, and it is life, but they had it not, and were therefore dead, and destitute of the power to will to come to him. The word was made flesh, or incarnate, and in him was life, but they had not the Word. The Word was with God, and the Word was God, and it is God that worketh in all in whom he dwells, both to will and to do of his good pleasure, in working out their salvation with fear and trembling. But as the Word was not in them, they did not and could not will to come to him for life. The Word of God is the Son of God, and life was given to all his members in him, so that he that hath the Son of God, or the Word of God, hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. And he that hath not life, certainly cannot possess the legitimate effects or functions of life. As evidence that they had not heard the voice, seen the shape, nor received the witness which the Father has given of the Son, they had not believed on him, nor in the testimony which he bore to the truth. All who are born of the Spirit, possess the Spirit, which is life, and the fruit of that Spirit is faith, and faith is indispensable to qualify any to believe in Christ, as all revelation of the Son of God is made to the faith, and not to the sense of man; consequently their rejection and unbelief was conclusive evidence that they were yet in their sins, and destitute of either desire or ability to come to him for life.

Another reason which Christ gave, was the impossibility that they should come to him for life unless they were drawn to him by the same power of the Father, which sent the Savior into the world. “No man can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day.” - vi. 44. All who are thus drawn, are taught of God, and Jesus says that all who are taught of God come to him, and that of all who thus come to him, none shall be cast out. This embraces all his children, for “All thy children shall be taught of God.” And it embraces all that the Father has given to the Son, for “All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that cometh I will in no wise cast out.” It embraces all the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, and all who are called by his name, and whom he has created for his glory, “for he shall say unto the north, Give up, and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth.” But bring how many of them? ‘‘Even every one that is called by my name, for I have created him for my glory; I have formed him: yea, I have made him.” - Isa. liii. 6, 7. All these, therefore, not only must, but by the immutable promise, and decree of Almighty God, shall come to Jesus, and be saved in him with an everlasting salvation. As he has said, "In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified and shall glory."—Isa. lv. 25. But, "They are not all Israel which are of Israel. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children; but in Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted for the seed." - Rom. ix. 6-7. These shall all come to Christ for salvation, and none but these can come: for no man can come unto the Father but by Christ. None can come to God unless they believe that he is; and that belief is the action of faith, and that faith is the gift of God; not of works, but of him that calleth; it is the fruit of the Spirit, and of the operation of God; it is the faith of the Son of God, and Jesus Christ is the Author and finisher of it. None but those who are under its power, have the will, the inclination, or desire, to come to him for life.

"And the Spirit and the bride say, Come." What Spirit? Whose bride saith Come, and to whom do they say Come? These questions are involved in the correct elucidation of the text. The Spirit of the gospel, the Spirit of God, the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him. The Spirit which is life and immortality. The Spirit which moved on the face of the great deep when all was without form and void. The Spirit that breathed upon the slain, in Ezekiel's vision, and quickened the dry bones. God, by his Holy Spirit, in the holy calling of all the heirs of salvation, says "Come." Does not invite them to come, but says, Come, with the same power and effect as when God said, "Let there be light." He speaks the word and it stands fast: he commands and it is done. An invitation leaves the person or people invited to accept or decline, as they may choose; but in the calling of God by the Spirit, he saith not unto the seed of Israel, Seek ye my face, in vain:

“He speaks, and that almighty voice,
Fulfills his great decrees.”

The dead shall hear his voice, and they that hear shall live. At his voice the south gives up, the north resigns; from the rising of the sun to the extreme west, all who are called by his name, come with singing to Zion, and with everlasting joy upon their head. “And the bride says Come;” and as the bride is the Lamb’s wife, and she is one with him, “They twain shall be one;” she has the Spirit of Christ. “As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God.” But, “If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” Therefore, to what the Spirit of Christ says, the bride, the church of God, responds, therefore the Spirit says, come, and the Spirit in the bride says come, and this is said to every one that is called by Christ’s name, as we have seen. Come where? To the River of Life, to the Holy City, New Jerusalem, to the Tree of Life, to the Fountains of living waters. Not to the mountain that might be touched, but to heavenly Jerusalem described in this and the preceding chapter; to the spirits of just men made perfect; to the blood of sprinkling which speaketh better things than the blood of Abel; to Jesus, the Mediator; to God, the Judge of all. This calling of the Spirit and bride is not to the law, to Moses, to human aid, not to some wooden-bench, said to be anxious, not to a system of works, for they were all there before they were called experimentally by the quickening operation of the Holy Spirit. But, come from death to life; from darkness to light; from bondage to liberty; from sin to holiness; from Moses to Christ. “And let him that heareth say, Come.” For they that hear shall live; they live by the spirit of life and immortality which distinguishes the Spirit and the bride. All who hear are brought manifestly into the unity of the faith, and God teaches them a pure language, and in perfect harmony with the language of the Spirit and the bride, he that heareth will reiterate the language of the Spirit. “And let him that is athirst come.” The river of life flows from the throne of God and the Lamb to Bupply the thirsty in the New Jerusalem, with its streams which make glad the city of God. The dead do not thirst, none but the living can desire or appreciate the living waters of the New Jerusalem, to the fountains of which the Lamb that is in midst of the throne shall lead his flock, and beside the which he maketh them to lie down in green pastures. And all as who have an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches, are welcome to hear, are of those who are addressed, so the gospel, with all its promises, provisions and privileges, is addressed to those who have a desire for them; for none desire or thirst for them until quickened and made alive by the life giving Spirit of our God. To hunger and thirst after righteousness is a blessed state for a sinner to be in. Poor as they may feel, they are called to Come to the waters, and buy wine and milk, without money and without price. “And whoever will, let him take the water of life freely.” As none but the living can thirst; so neither can any in an unquickened state have a will, a desire for the salvation which is of God. We have seen in our investigation of the first text, that God only can work in us to will and to do, or to make us a willing people, in the day of the Redeemer’s power, therefore whoever will, is a subject of quickening power and saving grace, and let him take the water of life. How, conditionally? O, no; there are no conditions resting on the creature. If he has a hearing ear, God has furnished it. If he is thirsty, God has made him so. No man has power to make himself thirsty, and especially no dead man has that power, as all unquickened sinners are like the carnal Jews, without a will to drink of the waters which flow from Christ the Rock of our salvation, it is sufficiently discriminating to say, and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely, it flows freely, and it is without money and without price, and therefore the poor, the helpless, the wretched, and those who have nothing to purchase it with, are welcome to take it freely, and they must have it freely, unconditionally, and without fee or reward, or not at all.

"For I testify unto every one that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, if any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book." This is a fearful testimony which Jesus has sent his angel to testify in the churches. Should we add a single condition, to be performed by the creature to entitle him to the water of life, we add to what is written, and whatever we may teach or practice without a clear "Thus saith the Lord," is an adding to the words of the prophecy of this book, and all who do it shall receive at God's hand the plagues which are written. Of the nature of these plagues we cannot speak particularly in this already extended article. But it is spoken to those in the churches who should be rebuked and chastised when they presumptuously add to what God has said, or teach for doctrine the commandments of men.

"And if a man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book." The Book of Life in this case, as we understand, means the record of the living in Jerusalem, not the record of eternity, in which all the members of Christ are written, and from which they can never be blotted out, but the living in Jerusalem, or those in fellowship, and who have the privilege of his house. Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the Tree of Life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. None even of the children of God are entitled to the fellowship of the church of God, and the privileges of his house, who walk not in obedience to the authority of Christ, as laid down in the New Testament. If they walk not according to this rule, they become the subjects of discipline, and if they persist in their unruly course, they are cut off from fellowship, and their part is taken out of the church, and as long as they continue thus they are to the church of God as heathen men and publicans. They being out of the bounds of the church, find for their companions, dogs, sorcerers, whoremongers, and whatsoever loveth and maketh a lie. This is not what is called falling from grace, for if they are subjects of the grace of God, they shall be brought back with weeping, but they fall from works, for want of grace to preserve them in the order and fellowship of the church of God. Many who have had a name to live, and who have been recognized as orderly members of the church, by disorder have forfeited their part in having a name to live, and as being entitled to the privileges of the church in her gospel order. Therefore take heed, and let him that standeth beware lest he fall; not from grace, but from his steadfastness in the truth.

REMARKS ON JOHN V. 40, AND REV. XXII. 17-19.

G. W. Pool, of Mississippi, has requested our views on John v. 40, and Rev. xxii. 17, and brother Israel J. Miller, of Indiana, has asked for our views on Rev. xxii. 17-19.

Such views as we have, or may be enabled to give on these passages of Scripture, we will give in one reply. On all of these passages our views have frequently been called for and given on former occasions, but as many of our present readers have not access to our files, and as we hold no secret views on the subject of divine revelation, we will cheerfully comply with the desires of our brethren as frequently as they may have occasion to call on us, to the extent of such ability as God may be pleased to afford us, and at that point we desire always to stop, without thinking our own thoughts, or speaking our own words.

The text in John, which is often brought by those who oppose the doctrine of special, discriminating and sovereign grace, to perplex the minds of those who love the truth, reads thus: "And ye will not come to me that ye might have life." Without considering the connection of the subject, or the occasion on which, or the people unto whom these words were addressed, the advocates of free will and human power rudely detach them from the place where they belong in the Scriptures, and endeavor to make them appear to sustain the idea that the salvation of souls rests upon the will and work of men. And although we are expressly told that the new birth is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God, who sheweth mercy; that it is not of works lest any should boast, still they show a settled determination to make the Bible appear to be a book of contradiction, and to turn even the truth of God into a lie, by

In this text our Lord was addressing the work-mongrel, self-righteous Jews, whose religious proclivity, and self-confidence, were in the most perfect unison with the doctrine, and delusion which is held and cherished by all the Arminian tribes of the earth, who oppose the truth of God at this present day. Jesus had, as we are told in this chapter, healed the impotent man, and bade him take his bed and walk, and these ancient free-willers sought to put him to death for breaking the Sabbath. He had announced himself to be the Son of God, and they were still more intent to slay him for blasphemy, in making himself equal with God. He had also declared his sovereign power to give life to whomsoever he would, without even asking their consent or co-operation in the work, just as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will; and that the dead did at that time, and should continue throughout all time, to hear the voice of the Son of God, and live. The dead shall hear, and they that hear shall live. And furthermore, this same Son, with the same power and judgment which he then possessed, shall ultimately raise the dead and judge the world at the last day. And that the resurrection of all the human family from their graves should be by him affected by the same sovereign and irresistible power and majesty of his voice, as in their being called by grace from death to life, when they are born again. But these declarations of his power and Godhead did not pacify them, nor did the unanswerable arguments incline them to yield their cherished doctrines of free-will and human power, nor divert them from looking away from the law, and their own willing and doing power for justification, to him as the only Savior, and the only way in which they can come unto the Father. Still, although confounded by his arguments, which they could neither resist nor gainsay, they cherished the prevailing delusion that the law, or the Old Testament Scriptures, possessed eternal life for them, on condition of their obedience to its requisitions. In them (the Scriptures of the Old Testament, the law of works, &c.,) they thought, as all their kindred of all ages think, they have eternal life, and therefore they see no need of Christ to save them. These Jews were as unconscious then, as the Arminians are now, of the truth of the declarations, By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God, and as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse. Hence they clung to the works of the law, to their own willing and doing, for justification and eternal life, and would not, had not the slightest inclination to turn away from themselves, from the law, and look or come to Christ for salvation. They had the same aversion to salvation through Jesus Christ, by sovereign, reigning and almighty grace, as have those who are of the same brood in our day.

Hence the words of our Lord to them, “Search the Scriptures.” The New Testament was not at that time published; the law and the prophets were intended, and in them the carnal Jews thought they had eternal life; but they were mistaken, and so are all who hope for acceptance before God now on the ground of their own wills or works, mistaken. “They are they that testify of me.” The law and the prophets testified of Christ as the Shiloh, the Messiah, the Lord God that should come with a strong hand, and his arm should rule for him, and that he would gather his sheep with his arm, &c. But these carnal Jews were not his sheep, as he had said unto them; and therefore they were the more deluded in thinking that in the law and the prophets they had eternal life. Again, the Old Testament testified of Christ that “A seed shall serve him; it shall be counted to the Lord for a generation.” That they should all be taught of God, and that every one that heard and learned of the Father should come to Christ; that they should be willing in the day of his power. But these legal work-mongers did not possess these characteristics, these marks; they had not the will nor the power. Instead of a will to be saved by him, their will was to put him to death as a Sabbath-breaker, an impostor, and blasphemer. Jesus not only declared their utter destitution of a will to come to him for life, but he declared to them the reason why they were thus destitute of the will: First, because they had not been taught of God; for said he to them, "Ye have neither heard his voice at any time nor seen his shape," therefore they were not taught of him. All his saints have heard his voice, for says he, My sheep heard my voice, and I know them, and they follow (or come unto) me, and I give them eternal life. (John x. 27, 28.) And they see his shape, for they see Jesus, who is the image of the invisible God, the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person. All who have seen him have seen the Father also, for they are one. He is in the Father, and the Father is in him. These carnal Jews were not manifestly the subjects of saving grace, therefore they could see no attractions in him, for they had nothing in them to be attracted by him. They saw neither form nor comeliness that they should desire him or a knowledge of his ways.

"And ye have not his word abiding in you." In the absence of his word, they were dead in sin; for his word is Spirit, and it is life, but they had it not, and were therefore dead, and destitute of the power to will to come to him. The word was made flesh, or incarnate, and in him was life, but they had not the Word. The Word was with God, and the Word was God, and it is God that worketh in all in whom he dwells, both to will and to do of his good pleasure, in working out their salvation with fear and trembling. But as the Word was not in them, they did not and could not will to come to him for life. The Word of God is the Son of God, and life was given to all his members in him, so that he that hath the Son of God, or the Word of God, hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. And he that hath not life, certainly cannot possess the legitimate effects or functions of life. As evidence that they had not heard the voice, seen the shape, nor received the witness which the Father has given of the Son, they had not believed on him, nor in the testimony which he bore to the truth. All who are born of the Spirit, possess the Spirit, which is life, and the fruit of that Spirit is faith, and faith is indispensable to qualify any to believe in Christ, as all revelation of the Son of God is made to the faith, and not to the sense of man; consequently their rejection and unbelief was conclusive evidence that they were yet in their sins, and destitute of either desire or ability to come to him for life.

Another reason which Christ gave, was the impossibility that they should come to him for life unless they were drawn to him by the same power of the Father, which sent the Savior into the world. “No man can come to me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day.” - vi. 44. All who are thus drawn, are taught of God, and Jesus says that all who are taught of God come to him, and that of all who thus come to him, none shall be cast out. This embraces all his children, for “All thy children shall be taught of God.” And it embraces all that the Father has given to the Son, for “All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that cometh I will in no wise cast out.” It embraces all the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, and all who are called by his name, and whom he has created for his glory, “for he shall say unto the north, Give up, and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth.” But bring how many of them? ‘‘Even every one that is called by my name, for I have created him for my glory; I have formed him: yea, I have made him.” - Isa. liii. 6, 7. All these, therefore, not only must, but by the immutable promise, and decree of Almighty God, shall come to Jesus, and be saved in him with an everlasting salvation. As he has said, "In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified and shall glory."—Isa. lv. 25. But, "They are not all Israel which are of Israel. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children; but in Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted for the seed." - Rom. ix. 6-7. These shall all come to Christ for salvation, and none but these can come: for no man can come unto the Father but by Christ. None can come to God unless they believe that he is; and that belief is the action of faith, and that faith is the gift of God; not of works, but of him that calleth; it is the fruit of the Spirit, and of the operation of God; it is the faith of the Son of God, and Jesus Christ is the Author and finisher of it. None but those who are under its power, have the will, the inclination, or desire, to come to him for life.

"And the Spirit and the bride say, Come." What Spirit? Whose bride saith Come, and to whom do they say Come? These questions are involved in the correct elucidation of the text. The Spirit of the gospel, the Spirit of God, the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him. The Spirit which is life and immortality. The Spirit which moved on the face of the great deep when all was without form and void. The Spirit that breathed upon the slain, in Ezekiel's vision, and quickened the dry bones. God, by his Holy Spirit, in the holy calling of all the heirs of salvation, says "Come." Does not invite them to come, but says, Come, with the same power and effect as when God said, "Let there be light." He speaks the word and it stands fast: he commands and it is done. An invitation leaves the person or people invited to accept or decline, as they may choose; but in the calling of God by the Spirit, he saith not unto the seed of Israel, Seek ye my face, in vain:

“He speaks, and that almighty voice,

The dead shall hear his voice, and they that hear shall live. At his voice the south gives up, the north resigns; from the rising of the sun to the extreme west, all who are called by his name, come with singing to Zion, and with everlasting joy upon their head. “And the bride says Come;” and as the bride is the Lamb’s wife, and she is one with him, “They twain shall be one;” she has the Spirit of Christ. “As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God.” But, “If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” Therefore, to what the Spirit of Christ says, the bride, the church of God, responds, therefore the Spirit says, come, and the Spirit in the bride says come, and this is said to every one that is called by Christ’s name, as we have seen. Come where? To the River of Life, to the Holy City, New Jerusalem, to the Tree of Life, to the Fountains of living waters. Not to the mountain that might be touched, but to heavenly Jerusalem described in this and the preceding chapter; to the spirits of just men made perfect; to the blood of sprinkling which speaketh better things than the blood of Abel; to Jesus, the Mediator; to God, the Judge of all. We have seen in our investigation of the first text, that God only can work in us to will and to do, or to make us a willing people, in the day of the Redeemer’s power, therefore whoever will, is a subject of quickening power and saving grace, and let him take the water of life. How, conditionally? O, no; there are no conditions resting on the creature. If he has a hearing ear, God has furnished it. If he is thirsty, God has made him so. "For I testify unto every one that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, if any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book." This is a fearful testimony which Jesus has sent his angel to testify in the churches. Should we add a single condition, to be performed by the creature to entitle him to the water of life, we add to what is written, and whatever we may teach or practice without a clear "Thus saith the Lord," is an adding to the words of the prophecy of this book, and all who do it shall receive at God's hand the plagues which are written. "And if a man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book." The Book of Life in this case, as we understand, means the record of the living in Jerusalem, not the record of eternity, in which all the members of Christ are written, and from which they can never be blotted out, but the living in Jerusalem, or those in fellowship, and who have the privilege of his house. # REMARKS ON JUDE 11,

"Wo unto them, for they have gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and perished in the gain sayings of Core."

Cain was a religious man; his religion was of a kind of which he could claim to be the author, and was consequently new schoolism, or a new kind in his day. In its external form it was something like that revealed to Abel from heaven; for he offered sacrifices to the Lord, and doubtless the best he had, as it was the fruit of the ground; and he also appeared to indulge a sincere belief that his offering would be as acceptable as that of his brother Abel. Abel offered of the firstlings of his flock, and the fat thereof; and the Lord had respect unto Abel and his offering; but unto Cain, and unto his offering, he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth, and in the issue killed his brother. This was the first religious quarrel in which blood was shed, that had ever occurred in the world. The difference between the religion of Cain and that of his brother Abel, will more fully appear by considering the way of Cain. The way of Cain was a way of his own, contrived by himself, and unauthorized by the God of heaven, and consequently unacceptable to the Lord; neither Cain nor his religion were respected; for the way of Cain did not recognize the doctrine of Divine Sovereignty; and he was evidently unwilling that the Lord should distinguish, single out, elect, or respect Abel and not himself, or of the same lump make one to honor and another to dishonor. The government of the Lord he was unreconciled to; yet he could be, and was, a religious man. His way, however, was not God's way, nor his thoughts God's thoughts; hence all his ardent piety and zeal availed him nothing. His offering, we have said, was unquestionably the best that he could command; and human reason would decide that it was as good as any part of Abel's flock; but those who have been taught by the Spirit of God will discover that while Cain's religion was a system, m modern language called Arminianism, Abel's was all of grace, in its figurative import. The sacrifice of Cain was the fruit of his industry, he being an EFFORT man, and the product of that ground then groaning under the curse of God for man's sake; "And who can bring a clean thing out "of an unclean? Not one." While Abel's lamb was not the fruit of his work, but, like Jacob's. savory mean, was made ready to his hand, and pointed figuratively to the blessed Lamb which Abraham told his son. Isaac, God would provide himself with for an offering; and which was more fully manifested when the ancient Baptist, on the shore of Jordan, saw the Holy Ghost in visible form. like a dove, descend and rest upon him as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. Hence while Cain's religion was a system of Arminianism, Abel's was a system of grace; the former showing what Cain had done,. the latter what God would do. The first, mere human invention, the second, a divine appointment; the way of Cain to be defended by force of arms; the religion of Abel, by that God to whom Abel's blood cried from the ground. Now let an inquiry be made. Who are they in our time that have gone, or are going, in the way of Cain?

But, secondly. "Run greedily after the error of Balaam." Balaam was a prophet; but not approved of God; although he as well as the beast upon which he rode, were constrained to declare some truth. Balaam was a missionary, and had a mind to go among the heathen and prophesy for Balak, king of Moab, to which work he had a call; and, like many of his kind in our day who love his error, he asked permission of the Lord, and was suffered. Whatever might have been the outfit of this famous foreign missionary, the formation of a special board was superseded by the royal bounty of Balak; as it appears that Balaam had only to arise and saddle his ass, and away he went to prophesy in a foreign land, moved not by the love of God, nor regard to men; but he loved the wages of unrighteousness, and he taught Balak to cause Israel to sin.

Let us again inquire seriously. Are there any in this our day, who love the error of Balaam? If there are, wo to them! thy shall perish in the gainsayings of Core, or Korah. The account of Korah and his company, their gainsayings, rebellion, and awful end, are given in the sixteenth chapter of the book of Numbers. Korah, in an unhallowed union of effort with Dathan and Abiram, and their men, made an unauthorized attempt to assume the priesthood; and like many of our young men of the Theological School, denied the reality of any special call to the work of the ministry; and while in the very act of disputing the point with the Lord's ministers, the earth opened her month and swallowed them up alive.

The awfully solemn considerations involved in the foregoing subject, cannot fail to produce emotions of the deepest interest in the hearts of all who fear the Lord and tremble at his word, to see the thousands who are at this day so very tenacious of the way of Cain; or a way, like his, unauthorized by the Lord, and in which they may offer to the Lord unholy offerings; such, for instance, as their sinful hearts, their filthy lucre, their unconverted infants or their dead works; and the multitude of greedy dogs, who love the wages of unrighteousness as well as their ancient missionary brother Balaam did, and who are hurrying on after his error, believing gain to be Godliness, and at the same time knowing as we do, that as God is true, they shall assuredly perish in the gainsayings of Core.

REMARKS ON LETTER OF MT. CARMEL CHURCH.

By request of the Mt. Carmel Church, Ala., we copy their letter from the Primitive Baptist. It may not be amiss to offer a remark or two upon its import. We have no disposition to condemn or censure any brother for refusing to use unscriptural phraseology in speaking of God, or in setting forth what God has revealed to us in the record given us of his Son. A strict conformity to scriptural terms would prevent much unprofitable speculation and controversy among brethren who are substantially of the same faith. If the brother, by refusing to use the words, human nature, &c., intended to deny that Christ took on him the seed of Abraham, that he was made in all points like his brethren, that his children being partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; or that he was made of a woman and made under the law; he, in such case, assumed a position contradictory of the plain testimony of the scriptures, a position in the occupation of which he should not be sustained by the church.

The idea of Christ's having died a God, if assumed, should be sustained by better testimony than what is presented in the couplet from Watts:

"God the mighty Maker died,
For man the creature's sins."

We know of no scriptural authority to sustain the position of brother Rowe upon this point. As we have understood the divine record, it was as the Messiah he was cut off; as the Son of God he was not spared, but was freely delivered up to die the just for the unjust. That he was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death. Immortality, as such, could not die. The Godhead, as such, could be under condemnation by no just or holy law, nor indeed under any law; hence the necessity of Christ's incarnation in coming under the law. As God, that very law emanated from him. He said to his disciples, "Truly the Son of man goeth, as it is written of him," &c, The Son of man was lifted up, &c.; but the Godhead of Christ. is in no sense the Son of man, and could not possibly be the offspring of man in any sense whatever. We have long considered the couplet quoted from Watts highly objectionable. It was in the form of a servant that he learned obedience, and that he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. He was put to death in the flesh, not in the Godhead. The construction which brother Rowe's words, according to the version of them in the letter from his church, are liable to, would either imply an absolute plurality of Gods, so that one might be dead and others living, or the absurd idea expressed by a certain poet, that when God shall come to judge the world, angels shall guard his throne.

It should never be forgotten by us that godliness is a mystery; and all that we can know of it must be by revelation of the Holy Spirit; and that all that the Holy Spirit ever has or ever will reveal of Christ to us, must necessarily be in perfect harmony with the scriptures of truth.

The church at Mt. Carmel, and all persons interested, will excuse us for these remarks, as we could not consistently comply with their request without offering our views thus far on the subject.

REMARKS ON MATTHEW 18:10.

“Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones, for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven.

Although we have on a former occasion expressed such views as we had on this text, yet at the request of brother Elias Newkirk, we will offer a few remarks further on the subject.

An ambitious spirit unbecoming the followers of the meek and lowly Lamb of God had been detected in the disciples, in agitating the question of their comparative greatness, and as they could not settle the matter to their mutual satisfaction, they appealed to our Lord for a decision; whereupon Jesus called a little child unto him and set him in the midst of them, and said, “Verily I say unto you, expect ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.” In this connection our Lord gave them such instructions and rules for their social government as should always be applicable to his church and people throughout all time. We shall not attempt in this article to comment on all the rules of order enjoined upon the members of the church of Christ in this chapter, but dwell particularly on what we understand to be embraced in the text proposed for consideration. In doing that we will call attention to the solemn admonition given to all the disciples, to take heed that they despise not one of these little ones. The command to take heed implies that through inattention, thoughtlessness, or without direct design, the error against which they are warned may be committed even by Christians. Care and close and constant attention is required that the little ones be not overlooked, or their place and importance in the house or kingdom of God be not underrated. Aspirants for distinguishing positions will be apt to bring themselves into notice; but those who are more diffident and childlike may, unless great heed be taken, be overlooked, neglected or forgotten, or they may come to be regarded as of less importance in the church of God.

Two causes may tend to this result. First, the humble and childlike humility of the little ones make them unassuming and retiring, for they feel themselves to be less than the least of all the saints, and willing to be servants or door-keepers, and to let others whom they esteem better than themselves occupy more conspicuous or exalted places. Secondly, the fleshly pride and vanity which is too frequently betrayed, unless closely watched and promptly checked, will predominate, as in the example presented in the first verse of this chapter, and in its ascendency tempt us either to think more highly of ourselves than we ought, or be attracted by the splendid appearance of some others, so that the humble, quiet, childlike little ones fail to be appreciated. Where the little ones are wantonly thrust aside, and that which is lame is turned out of the way by the arrogance or wantonness of any one, God will avenge the oppressed; but woe to him by whom the offence cometh. But while Christians are here in the flesh, the utmost vigilance is required to watch over our prejudices and partialities, lest, even undesignedly, we despise one of these little ones. It is not enough that we may say we have not wounded the feelings, disturbed the peace, or disregarded the expressed wishes of such. It may well be presumed that many a wound has been keenly felt in the heart of an humble child of God which has festered, unseen by any eye but that which watches over these little ones, causing grief untold, and perhaps unutterable, leading the wounded child to reason thus: O that I were worthy of the esteem of those whom I so dearly love, but while they show strong appreciation of the society, the gifts, or the conversation of others who are so far my superiors, they treat me as I deserve as though they have little or no confidence in me. We are commanded to be kindly affectioned one towards another, and to be especially careful in regard to those who are weak and tender; what care should we take lest we despise one of these little ones.

But, who are these little ones? All who enter into the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. This truth is not only declared by our Lord in the third verse of this chapter, but it is fully implied in his declaration to Nicodemus. "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God;" and "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God (John 3:3,5)." All who are born again, of incorruptible seed by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever become "new born babes." (See I Peter 1:23 and 2:2.) In that birth not only are they manifested as children, but as very little children. Whatever may be their age in the flesh, or whatever may be their capacity, strength, physical or mental, if they are born again, that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, and among the fruits of that spirit will be found childlike humility. Like little children, very small, they are dependent, reliant, and desire the sincere milk of the word that they may grow thereby. No other growth is compatible with their heavenly birth.

All who enter the kingdom of our God must enter as little children, and the more they learn, experience or know of God and of spiritual things, the smaller they will feel themselves to be, and the smaller they are in their own esteem, the higher they will stand in the estimation of their brethren. When Christians become vain in their imaginations, heady and high-minded, God will provide a way to humble them. They become sensitive, and if their importance is not acknowledged, they are mortified and offended. A gospel course, in such cases, will be very apt to offend them. But woe unto him who shall offend one of these little ones which believe in Jesus. "It were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea."

As a consideration calculated to impress the solemn admonition more deeply on the minds of the disciples, Jesus added the following emphatic declaration: "For I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." The words their angels are the same in signification as their spirits. For spirits, when spoken of in distinction from the bodies, are called angels, as in the case of Peter when he had been delivered from prison, he came to the house of Mary and knocked for admittance. When the damsel affirmed that Peter was at the gate, they thinking it impossible that he could be there in his body, concluded that it was his angel, or spirit, or ghost. In the same manner the word was used by the Saddusees in denying the resurrection of the dead, etc.

God's presence is heaven to all who are born of him, and although our bodies are dead because of sin, the spirit within us, which is born of the Spirit of God, is life, because of righteousness, and although flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, yet we worship God in the spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. "In heaven," in the spiritual presence of God, the spirit, or angel, of the child of God is in communion with God, in his presence, enjoying his presence, and behold his face, for he reveals himself unto them as he does not to the world. No man hath seen the Father at any time, but the Father reveals his face to the faith of his elect, and every one that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father also; but not with their mortal eyes or natural perceptions. Only to their faith, spirit or angels, is he revealed. Always when in heaven, or in a heavenly frame, they behold his face, and derive all their consolation from his presence, in which they have fullness of joy, and at his right hand they have pleasure forevermore.

Seeing then that these little ones which believe in Jesus are in spirit held in communion with the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, how presumptuously wicked for us to despise or offend them. God will avenge them, as his own elect who cry unto him day and night, and they shall certainly triumph over all their enemies.

REMARKS ON MATTHEW XXIII. 37.

“O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not.” - Matt. xxiii. 37.

THERE has been much controversy among professors of religion, on the text which we place at the head of these remarks. At the request of several correspondents, we will also show our opinion.

It is contended by the arminians, that what our Lord has said in this case, to Jerusalem, is applicable to all the unregenerated part of mankind; that our Lord Jesus Christ is now, and has often been willing to save sinners, yea, all sinners, but they will not consent; that he was willing to save Jerusalem, and had frequently been willing, but he had been prevented by their stubbornness - they would not. In harmony with such an exposition of the text, it is urged that salvation depends not on the sovereign will of God, but solely on the will and decision of the creature; that it is the will of God to save all mankind; but the will of God saves no one; that his will is inefficient, and it is not done in heaven nor among the sons of men. The creature is held forth as a sovereign indeed; and it is left for man to decide to what extent the will of God may be executed in the economy of salvation.

However extravagant such blasphemy must sound in the ears of regenerate persons, It is a prominent doctrine of the arminians; and the text before us is tortured to yield an unnatural consent to the damnable heresy. All the essays we can write on this text, or upon any other portion of divine revelation, will never undeceive those unto whom strong delusions are sent, that they may believe a lie. None but God can open the blind eyes, or unstop the deaf ears of such as are capable of believing that the will of man is more omnipotent, more sovereign and irresistible than the will of God.

But in the minds of even some of the saints, doubts have found place, as to the meaning of this text; for the edification of such we write.

The words of this text were uttered by our Lord Jesus Christ, while in the days of his flesh he sojourned upon the earth; and they were spoken in reference to the calamity that was about to be experienced by the Jews, in the execution of divine wrath upon the city of Jerusalem, which was soon to take place. In the preceding connection of this passage, we find our Lord upbraiding the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the scribes pharisees, lawyers, &c., whom he denounced as hypocrites, blind guides, &c. He charged that very pious and devout people, who were so exceedingly zealous for God, that they were shocked with the irreligion of Christ and his disciples, with the murder, not only of all the messengers that he had sent among them, from the day of Abel, but of the murder also of all them that he was then about to send among them, as the immediate precursors of their overthrow. He assures them that all the accumulated guilt of those who had murdered his servants should be required of that generation; and then in the same connection says, "0 Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee;" thus distinguishing the Jerusalem unto whom his language was addressed, from that Jerusalem which is above, is free, and which is the mother of all the sons and daughters of Zion; the very Jerusalem. against which all the threatening predictions of the Old Testament were leveled; the city stained with blood, laden with iniquity, and verging upon her temporal ruin. “How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings.” Our Lord does not say, How often would I have gathered you, but, “thy children.” There is in this text an evident distinction marked between this city devoted to destruction, and those within the city, which our Lord would succor and defend. But it may be asked, How, and to what end does a hen gather: her chickens under her wings? When the watchful eye of the hen descrys the distant hawk, or any other impending danger which the unthinking chickens are heedless of, by a well known signal she gives the alarm, and they, by instinct taught, run to her for protection; so also when the shades of evening gather, and the chilling damps of night would chill the unfledged brood, she carefully gathers them under her protecting wings; not to make chickens of them, but for their security and comfort. So, in like manner, when he who sees the end from the beginning, forseeing these dreadful judgments which were gathering thick, and hastening fast to overtake the city of these murderous Jews, would have collected, called out from among them, those who stood in the same relation to him as the chickens do to the hen; and in collecting them, he would have shielded them from those calamities which they must suffer by remaining in Jerusalem until the destruction of the city should take place. It is supposed by many, from the manner of our Lord’s expression, “and ye would not,” that although he often had been willing to shelter and protect the children of Jerusalem, that he had been prevented from it, by their want of inclination; such a construction of his words would conflict with matters of fact; for he had not only been often willing, but equally as often he had accomplished his will, had equally as often gathered and and hovered over them for their protection and comfort; the indisposition of the carnal to the contrary, notwithstanding. This was most strikingly exemplified in the actual extinction of that city. As the hen gives the signal of danger to her chickens, so our Lord gave repeated warnings to his disciples, of what troubles were at hand; the signs also which should indicate the near approach of the great and terrible day of the Lord, were minutely detailed; and they were charged to flee from the city, and hasten to the mountain, when they should receive the peculiar signal, of which he had duly instructed them. Hence we see that the "will not" of the ungodly Jews could not hinder the accomplishment of the absolute will of God.

In prospect of the deliverance of his saints, and the utter overthrow of Jerusalem, he adds: "Behold your house is left unto you (not unto your children, whom he would have often succored, but unto you, who kill the prophets, &c.) desolate." The children or inhabitants withdrawn, moved out, and the empty walls of the carnal building only remaining. As they had been hitherto preserved like a vine having a blessing in it, and as a tree, of which one said, "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it;" but now that that blessing is withdrawn, God's spiritual people called out, nothing but the carnal or fleshly relationship to Abraham remaining, the house of Israel is left desolate; and they shall see Christ no more in delivering them from evil, until they shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. It is confidently expected that the day will yet dawn upon the scattered Israelites, when they shall be released from that blindness which in part has happened unto them, until the fullness of the Gentiles are brought in. There seems to be a very strong intimation given in the closing verse of this chapter, that the day shall yet come when the Jews as a people shall bless the name of Christ the Messiah.

REMARKS ON MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

WE cordially welcome the communication of brother Van Duzer, on the subject of ministerial support. “For there are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre’s sake, whose mouths must be stopped.” So writes the apostle Paul, and how applicable are his words to the anti-christian preachers whose name is Legions, while Jesus has informed us that his servants are few. The legions are unruly, inasmuch as they are governed by no law or rule given by our Lord Jesus Christ. The few are “Called, and chosen, and faithful.” - Rev. xii. 14. The many are vain, but the few know that their labor is not vain in the Lord. The many are talkers, being men of human ability, talent and influence, able to communicate and promulgate vain things; but the few are frequently like Moses, slow of speech, of stammering lips, unpolished and uncomely in the eyes of the world, who, instead of being talkers or readers, without divine rule, are made able ministers of the New Testament - sons of thunder to the unruly, and sons of consolation to the saints. The former are mostly of the circumcision, being generally legalists or Arminian work-mongers; but the latter are of that circumcision which is made without hands, whose praise is not of men, but of God. The former teach things which they ought not, but the latter speak as the Spirit gives them utterance, and they speak the truth in soberness. Those teach for filthy lucre’s sake, but these because the word of the Lord is like fire shut up in their bones; and there is to them a wo, if they preach not the gospel of Christ. Of those it is written, “Their mouths must be stopped;” but of these it is written, “Touch not mine anointed and do my prophets no harm; for he that toucheth them, toucheth the apple of mine eye.”

But how are their mouths to be stopped? We are not left altogether in the dark as to the mode. As they teach for filthy lucre, just remove the cause, and the effect will cease. Nothing is more apparent than that the prevailing system of contracting with preachers to preach by the day, or year, for a stipulated amount of lucre, presents a charm which allures thousands from the bar, and from other pursuits, into the ministry, whom God has not called to preach his gospel. It is this greediness of lucre which leads to making merchandise of the gospel - to the establishment of Theological Seminaries, Mission Societies, and that fills our pulpits with dandies and fops, who being unable to feed the flock of God, employ their position in ridiculing the aged fathers in the ministry, who have labored successfully in the gospel ministry, and that, too, in many cases, without receiving as much remuneration as the Indian’s salary of forty shillings a year. A specimen of the manner in which they allude to our aged ministers is given by one of the American Baptist Missionary Society’s hirelings, in writing to the Editor of the Repository, in which he calls them wind-broken and distanced. To satisfy their greedy appetites with lucre they have married their churches to their respective congregations, especially in the Eastern States, where a subscription is circulated with the understanding that all who subscribe are thereby constituted members of the congregation, subject, of course, to the general taxation; but as an equivalent are entitled to the privilege of voting in the calling and settling of pastors, and in the regulation of what passes with them for sacred music. All these evils naturally grow out of the systems of the day.

We are fully aware that Christ has, through his apostles, enjoined the duty and privilege on his people, of communicating of their worldly substance, as God has blessed them, to the support of those whom he has called into the ministry. The ministers of Christ are stewards of the word, as the saints who are benefitted by their labors are stewards of their carnal things. It is the work of the minister to preach the word faithfully, and it is the work and duty of his brethren to see that he is made comfortable in regard to temporal things. We see nothing improper in the ancient practice of our Baptist churches, when having chosen a pastor, without consulting the world, herself judging of his gifts and qualifications, and having settled him, to make the necessary arrangements for his support. If the church thinks proper to open a subscription book in which every one who feels willing may annex to his name the amount he intends to give, by doing which the burden becomes more equal among the members; and such non-professing friends as feel so disposed may throw in their aid and thus reduce the burden of the church, we see no wrong in it. But the system of selling memberships in congregations or societies, or the privilege of voting, or of conducting any part of devotion, or any right to interfere in any other business of the church for money, is in my estimation as sacrilegious and unscriptural as the popish practice of selling indulgences to sin, or passport through purgatory.

A minister of Jesus should never be above laboring with his hands, and we are persuaded that Christ’s ministers are not; still when it is in the power of a church to relieve their minister from the cares of the world, that he may devote his time principally or wholly to the work, it is right they should do so. We know that the liberality of the churches in the support of the ministers of the gospel of Christ has not been extravagantly large. The excess and extravagance of their appropriations have been to those who teach for filthy lucre’s sake; of this latter class we have known some, who while receiving their thousands by contract for preaching, are at the same time setting on foot every conceivable devise for swelling their income, by preaching what they call Missionary sermons, Education, Tract, Temperance or other kinds of sermons; any kind except gospel sermons; not of a ready mind, but for filthy lucre’s sake, thus enabling them to roll in luxury and extravagance, while in many cases there are members of their own churches living on public expense at the common poor houses. These things, brethren, ought not to be.

REMARKS ON RELIGIOUS REVIVALS

It is always cheering to the saints of God to witness the outpouring of his Spirit in quickening and bringing into his gospel fold the subjects of his saving grace, and the more clearly we can trace the work of God in revivals of religion, the more abundantly we rejoice. But wherever we detect the finger-prints of men in their production, our joy is dampened, and our confidence in them shaken. We have been a member in the Baptist church more than fifty years, and in that time have witnessed many revivals. Some that have afforded us inexpressible joy and gratitude to God, and others which have filled us with the most fearful apprehensions. That men, by their activity and zeal, can get up revivals of religion, or religious revivals, by stirring appeals to the passions and to the natural judgment of unregenerated sinners, which will attract and gather them in excited crowds, and produce intense excitement, and ultimately draw large numbers into the church, we cannot doubt, and for a time the cause may seem to flourish, but when the net has been drawn to the shore, a large proportion of the fish are found to be of no value to the church of God. Every plant, says the divine Master, which my Father has not planted, shall be rooted up. From this declaration we infer that every one that comes into the church without his saving grace, shall be expelled without his favor.

Well do we remember the old fashioned revivals, in which God’s holy arm was made bare for the salvation of sinners, when such things as protracted meetings, anxious benches, coming forward publicly for prayers, and the like, had not been introduced in the Baptist churches. Then the Baptists were one people and one communion the world over. When we heard of a revival among the Baptists we knew what the term signified; and those gathered into the churches were not offended at the doctrine of God's sovereignty in the election, predestination, irresistible calling, and complete salvation of his children; nor with the faithful exposure of all manner of heresy, will-worship, delusion and idolatry abounding in the world. Then the Baptists, as a distinct people, were not reckoned with the popular denominations of the earth. Then they desired no revival that was or could be gotten up; they delighted only in those revivals which come down from above, in which they had the evidence that they were seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. But after the importation from England of a theory which was labeled "Fuller's Gospel", very soon the poison of Fuller's heresy began to spread, and many Baptist churches, which about that time began to enjoy some respite from the oppression of the New England Puritans, began to show symptoms of infection. The truth is, the Baptists never could endure prosperity to any great extent, without, like Israel of old, running into idolatry.

Following an under current of Fullerism, which had promised to raise the Baptists from the degradation of a dunghill (to use Fuller's classic language) to a respectable position among the popular religious denominations, came in stealthily at first, but more openly afterwards, a lusting after the leeks and onions, and especially the fleshpots of Egypt.
This *manna*from above, on which the saints had been so long and so miraculously fed, began to be regarded as light food. The Anakims, their neighbors, who lived on the productions of the earth, grew up to be giants, and looked down with contempt upon the poor, little dwarfish Baptists; and under these circumstances many of the Baptists betrayed a desire to become like the nations round about them. Thus hardening their hearts, as in the day of provocation, became vain in their imaginations. This spirit of discontent and rebellion soon produced wide-spread murmuring among them; that the place where they dwelt was too strait, and some were heard to say, "Go to, let us make brick, and we will build a tower," etc. The more enterprising and zealous complained that their brethren were too inert, inactive, and withal, too tight-laced, folding their hands and waiting for God to build up his cause. But their active and sprightly companions sprang forward to steady the ark of God, which seemed to them to jostle on the new cart. A new era had begun, the law of Christ, as the only standard for faith and order in the house of God, was ignored by the enterprising, for they said, "If we wait for God to do the work, it will never be done. The day of miracles is past, and we must 'Up and make us gods to go before us.'"

The ministry which God had hitherto given and sustained among the Baptists, came to be regarded as inefficient, they were too illiterate, too slow, too tight-laced; or, in other words, too confident that what God had begun he would himself perform until the day of Jesus Christ, and so inert had they become that they declared that even if the olive should not blossom, and there should be no herd in the stall, they would still trust in the Lord, and even though he should slay them, they still would trust in him. The wise and prudent ones, therefore, determined to get these sleepy drones out of the way, and soon Baptist colleges began to arise, Theological Schools were instituted, Baptist State Educational Societies were chartered by the Legislature, Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes, for teaching "Every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord," were multiplied. Missionary Societies were organized, and plans matured for collecting Missionary funds. High sounding titles of a flattering kind were given to men. Presidents, directors, life membership, etc., became merchantable commodities, and were bought and sold in the market. The antiquated notion that it required grace to save sinners, where money was plenty, and that “Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God,” was thought to belong to a former age, was not adapted to this day of improvements. Baptist meeting houses now began to wear steeples and towers, or domes of imposing dimensions; bells were found necessary to drive the bad spirits away and call the multitudes together; a learned but graceless ministry filled the pulpits, and the Baptists began to look respectable in the adulterous eyes of the world. Now to fill up these costly and splendid edifices with paying converts something more attractive to the world than the preaching of Christ and him crucified, was deemed necessary. Protracted meetings, anxious benches, exciting appeals to the carnal passions of men, women and children were regarded as the most effective agencies, and hence they were brought into requisition. Much experimenting was required to demonstrate the comparative efficiency of the new inventions. Union prayer meetings, monthly concerts of prayer, with numerous other contrivances of men, were tried, with a view to either scare people into religion, or to scare religion into the people. At the time of the introduction of these new things among professed Baptists, the party in favor of them was in the minority, but with all this machinery under their control they were soon multiplied into an overwhelming majority, and as there was no legitimate affinity between the old primitive order and these machine-made Baptists, a formal separation became inevitable, and ultimately took place. In the division the old order was called by a number of names, among which were, Old School or Primitive Baptists; the new order are known as New School or Missionary Baptists. These two kinds of Baptists have become so distinct that neither claim any relationship to the other. Indeed, the Primitive Baptists have no greater opposers or more bitter enemies to contend with on earth than are found in the ranks of the New School.

Perhaps brother Strickland and others are ready to ask us, What has this recital of past history to do with the revivals of which that brother writes? We reply, Simply this, to hold up the history of the past as a beacon upon the walls, that our dear brethren in the ecstasy of their feelings caused by the revival, may remember the rocks on which the Baptists of former times have been wrecked, divided and split.

By no means would we utter a word to dampen the spirits of precious brethren who are enjoying the gracious smiles of their covenant God. We have greatly mistaken the characters of brethren Strickland and Hume, if they would designedly depart from the ancient landmarks of Zion, or forsake the footsteps of the flock of our Redeemer. But, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall," is an apostolic admonition. May we all heed it. There are a few expressions in brother Strickland's account of the revival that we feel constrained to notice, not in a fault-finding spirit, but in all love and tenderness. At our time of life, being now more than three score years of age, and about half that time have conducted the publication of this paper, we are aware that the time of our departure is not very far distant. We feel desirous, before the grave shall close over our mortal body, to faithfully, but affectionately, warn all our dear brethren in Christ to shun the appearance of evil in all things. Adhere strictly to the precepts and examples of our Lord and Master in all your religious deportment, and we trust that neither of our ministering brethren, nor any of the precious converts of their late revivals, will be hurt with us, or mistake our design in reviewing the expressions to which we have alluded.

First. Brethren, your meetings have been protracted. Now, where the Spirit of the Lord is manifested, drawing the hearts of the saints together, and in the display of his quickening power and grace, in causing the dead to hear the voice of the Son of God, and they feel disposed to protract such meetings for the worship of God and the edification of the saints, as did the apostles in the early days of christianity, we have not the slightest objection to offer. At such seasons we have sometimes felt to say,

"My willing soul would stay
In such a frame as this;
Would sit and sing herself away
To everlasting bliss."

But to appoint a protracted meeting as a means of grace, or for the purpose of getting up a revival, or producing an excitement, is, in our view, like attempting to do by our enchantments that which we know can only be done by the mighty power of God himself. A meeting was once protracted at Jerusalem, after the ascension of our Redeemer, because Jesus had commanded the apostles to tarry at Jerusalem for a specific reason. And they, with other disciples, were in one place, and of one accord, until the day of Pentecost was fully come. A glorious revival took place while they were together, not as a result of their being together, but as the result of the Mediatorial triumph of the Son of God. They did not claim that they had gotten up this revival, but they assure us that it did not come up, but it came down. While they, in obedience to Jesus, were all of one accord in one place, "Suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting." (Acts 2:2) Thus we have the testimony that this reviving sound came from above, and God poured out on them of his Spirit. So all spiritual blessings are given the saints in Christ, according as he hath chosen them in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world. (Eph. 1:3,4) And every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning. On this occasion a vast multitude were quickened, and made to gladly receive the word; and they were baptized, and added to the church. The apostles did not claim this as resulting from anything they had done to produce it, but told us frankly that this was something God had long had in store; it was that which had been spoken of by Joel more than seven hundred years before, and some seven hundred years before any of them were born. The protraction of the meeting in Indiana, we should judge, was like that at Jerusalem, were it not for a remark of brother Strickland in another part of the letter, which seems to reflect severely on ministers who have not enjoyed similar revivals, as dull, cold and inefficient, under whose labors no church can prosper. Now we must in all candor, and in kindness, contend that revivals that are at all profitable to the church of God, are not the result of the vivacity, warmth or efficiency of the minister. All the ministers of Christ are in themselves dull, cold and inefficient, until animated with a live coal from off the altar of the Lord. Paul, with all his inspiration, disclaimed all efficiency in himself, and exclaimed, "And who is sufficient for these things?" Or what is efficient? Jesus has said to his disciples, "Without me ye can do nothing." Where then is the efficiency for these things?

Again, brother Strickland remarks, "Neither can any minister of Christ be profitable and fully efficient as a minister of the cross of Christ unless the church does her duty."

Does our dear brother mean that the will or works of men or angels can give efficiency to the preached gospel? That the success of the gospel really rests upon duties faithfully performed by the church? How then did Paul affirm that the excellency of the gospel is not of us, but of God? Why are we told that Paul may plant, Apollos may water, but God alone can give the increase? We have no reason to doubt that the church, and all the saints, ministers included, are sometimes, if not at all times, remiss in the discharge of their duties, but we would greatly prefer to hear our brother say, When God pours out his Spirit upon the thirsty hill of Zion, the plants of his right hand planting will be revived, the church will awake to a sense of neglected duties, the dull ministers will lift up the voice with renewed energy, sinners will be pricked in the heart, and the redeemed of the Lord will be gathered into the fold, and all will be the result of those seasons of refreshing which come from the presence of the Lord.

We also believe that God has intimately connected the prosperity of his church and kingdom with the faithfulness of her members and her gifts, but we do not believe that connection is such as to make the prosperity of the kingdom to depend on the faithfulness of either the members or the gifts. For, “Their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord.” But when God’s set time to favor Zion comes, God sends her prosperity, and in a way that she shall see, and feel, and confess, that it is “Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord.” And when God gives prosperity to his church, then, and only then, her vine will flourish, and her pomegranates will give a goodly smell. When he commands the north winds to blow, and the south winds to come, then the spices will flow out. This will enliven the dull minister if he be a servant of God, and this will wake up the sleepy spouse of the Redeemer, and thus the connection of faithfulness in the church, and her prosperity is effected, so that the praise is not of men, but of God.

That there are ministers and members of churches who are worldly, and allow much of the precious time allotted for social religious intercourse to be spent in worldly conversation, talking of politics, or of the war, is very probable; but it is an exciting time, and we are yet in the flesh, compassed with infirmities, so that it is hardly to be expected that we can divest ourselves from all anxiety on the subject. But it is to be hoped that the saints will, as far as possible, divest themselves from these cares when we meet to worship God, and with the poet say,

"Far from my thoughts, vain world, be gone,
Let my religious hours alone;
Fain would my faith my Savior see,
But wait a visit, Lord, from thee."

When Paul says we are laborers together with God, we are not to understand that we are fellow-laborers with God, or co-laborers, for we, that is, Paul and Apollos, were laborers together. They were not laboring to help God build the church, for his church is not made with hands, it is God's building, an house, which stands eternal in the heavens. We are God's husbandry, or plantation, or garden, where he implants the seeds of grace, which spring up and bring forth fruit to God. Paul and Apollos were laboring together in planting or preaching the word: "So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase."

One remark further of brother Strickland we must notice, wherein he speaks of a class of preachers who have too much to say against error, especially the abominable, God-dishonoring and heaven-daring doctrines of Arminians, who give their (the Arminians) errors more attention than they give to the errors of their own brethren. (Brother Strickland will not probably classify us with that sort, as we sometimes pay some attention, as he will perceive, to errors of our brethren.) These, he complains, "Dwell long and loud on the doctrine of predestination and election, to the exclusion of practical and experimental religion."

Now we are somewhat puzzled to know how to understand this complaint. What more exalted theme has ever moved the tongues or thrilled the hearts of men or angels, than that of the doctrine of predestination and election, we cannot conceive. Is not the predestinating government of God worthy of our loudest, longest notes? Why should they not dwell long and loud upon the doctrine affirmed by the Holy Ghost, proclaimed by God himself, reiterated by patriarchs and prophets, heralded by inspired apostles, and lying as the basis of all our hopes for heaven and immortality? How the preaching of this doctrine can exclude practical or experimental religion, we cannot understand, since no practice or experience can be worth having in its absence. If God has not chosen us in Christ, and predestinated us to the adoption of children, and if God hath not before ordained us to walk in good works, all our practice and all our experience will leave us far short of heaven and eternal happiness. "In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." If there be no election and predestination, then there can be no inheritance of glory for us or for anybody else. Then let the brethren shun not to proclaim election and predestination, and expose the abomination of Antichrist, and exhort the saints to stand fast in the doctrine of God our Savior, and to walk in all his ordinances, and see that in the excitement of revivals none be admitted to fellowship who do not love the doctrine of salvation by grace alone.

We trust that our brother will not be offended with us for the candor with which we have remarked on his letter, but carefully examine the points to which we have called his attention, and may the Lord give us all the light and wisdom we need, and crown us in his kingdom. Amen.

REMARKS ON THE LETTER OF BROTHER E. RITTENHOUSE.

Our personal acquaintance for many years with this beloved brother affords us assurance that he writes from the purest motives and expresses the honest convictions of his mind; and his views are entitled to our careful consideration. If any thing has been said or written on the subject of regeneration and the new birth that would lead any to even suspect that we dispute, or lightly esteem, the commonly received views of the saints of all ages on the subject of an experimental work of the Quickening Spirit of God in what is called the new birth, or being born again of an incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever; brother Rittenhouse has our sincere thanks for seasonable caution. To our mind there is no doctrine more clearly taught in the Bible, or exemplified in the experience of the children of God than that of the personal and experimental regeneration, and spiritual birth of all the children of God. With us, as with him, this doctrine is vital and fundamental, and second in importance to no other matter of revelation. As to the precise sense in which the word regeneration was used by our Savior, or by the apostle, in the only two passages where it occurs in the Bible, we will not contend for our own views in opposition to those entertained by others. But whatever may have been the sense in which they were used, we have and do believe that all the immortality which God has given to his church, to be personally and experimentally developed in the ages to come, both in their being born again and in the final resurrection of their bodies, was given to them in and through Christ as their spiritual Head, and was communicated to the church, as the body of Christ, through him when God raised him from the dead, and then and there a nation was born in a day. And when the members of his body are personally and experimentally quickened and born again and made to believe, it is by the power of the resurrection of Christ; or as Paul has said, “Which believe according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead (Ephesians 1:19).” Hence the Spirit of which we are born again, and which Spirit dwells in the saints is the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, and by which our mortal bodies shall in like manner be quickened and raised from the dead at the last day. (See Romans 8:11.)

Although the discussion of the subject has failed to edify our brother, many dear brethren have assured us that they have been edified and refreshed, and, if not deceived, our own mind has been enlightened also. As to the cause, nature, necessity, and personal experimental development of regeneration, no essential change has taken place with us, that we are aware of; but we confess we have discovered new beauties in the contemplation of the views of our brethren who have had greater light than ourself, and have in the discussion presented their views in a clearer manner than we could.

With no design of disparagement of the views of brother Rittenhouse on I Peter 1:3, we cannot perceive any application of the idea of generation, begetting, or birth, to the relief experienced by the saints from depression, from a knowledge of the fact that their crucified Lord was risen from the dead, as it implanted, generated, or begat no new relationship either to God or to the inheritance of glory; whereas Peter affirms not only that they were begotten again by the resurrection of Christ from the dead, to a lively hope, but also to an inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for the heirs. And in the same chapter he says that those who are so begotten are also “born again,” to that very incorruptible inheritance to which they were begotten by the resurrection, by, or, “of incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever.” Whenever the sensible presence of our Lord is hidden from our faith by any intervening cloud, we are in heaviness, and manifold temptations; and when the cloud is removed, our joys revive; but no new relationship is developed. When in our flesh Jesus bowed himself in death, he fully represented us in death as slain by the law. Had he failed to arise, no living or lively hope of immortality could ever have beamed on those for whom he died; but when he was begotten, and born from the dead, the vitality of that birth and resurrection life which quickened and brought up his crucified body from death, and from under the law, and curse which he sustained for us, was given to us in his resurrection. In what other way has he abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light? In what other way are we risen with him? In what other way has God quickened us together with Christ, and raised us up together, and made us sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus?

REMARKS ON TITUS I. 13.

“Wherefore, rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith.”

WE are not unfrequently reminded by some of our esteemed correspondents, that our course with those with whom we differ has the appearance of too much harshness and severity, and is thought to be the reason why some who profess to oppose the doctrine for which we uniformly contend, have complained of the spirit of our paper. We will not presume to say that these friendly admonitions are altogether gratuitous or uncalled for; but we would wish rather to inquire at the holy oracle for instruction on this point. From the days. of Cain the cause of God and truth has been opposed by wicked men under the garb of religion. Abel found an early opponent to the religion revealed from heaven, in the person of his brother Cain, who, by the bye, was a religionist of a new school. Abraham was opposed by the kings of the earth, from the slaughter of whom he was returning when Melchisedec blessed him; Isaac had to bear the cruel mocking of the son of the bond woman; Jacob’s life was sought after by Esau; Joseph had to encounter the sons of Leah; Moses and Aaron the magicians of Egypt; the prophets of the Lord were sorely vexed by the sons of Belial, the prophets of Ahab and of Jezebel; David was distressed by the strange children from whom he begged to be delivered, and all the spiritual children of Abraham by the carnal Israelites throughout their generations.

When Jesus our Lord was held in the arms of the virgin Mary, Herod, under the pretention of worship, sought to take his life. During his visit on earth he was constantly opposed by the most popular, powerful, zealous and influential sect of professed religionists on the earth. The apostles of the Lamb were harrassed continually by false brethren, Judaizing teachers, false apostles, vagabond Jews, and those who thought gain was godliness, as well as the similitude of beasts at Ephesus; and the whole church of God in her primitive standing were cruelly opposed and persecuted by the hosts of anti-christ.

Now let us seriously inquire how the ancient saints of the Lord - the patriarchs and prophets under the old, and Christ, his apostles and the primitive saints under the new dispensation - were instructed to meet and withstand this most formidable host? Were they to meet them as friends? Were they to treat them as brethren? Certainly not. Under the old dispensation they were permitted in some cases to call fire from heaven and consume their adversaries; in other instances they were sent forth to fall upon and slaughter their foes. But under the gospel dispensation the kingdom set up by the God of heaven was not to be supported by the force of arms or by violence; “not by might nor by strength, but by the spirit, saith the Lord.” Hence, in the example given by our Lord Jesus Christ, no legal or corporal punishments were by him inflicted on his adversaries; he returned good for evil, and when they smote him on one check he turned to them the other also. No appeal was made to the civil department to sustain his kingdom from the violence of wicked men and devils, while he pursued his course and went about doing good, healing the sick, raising the dead and casting out devils; and thus he taught, his apostles, and all his disciples to love their enemies, and pray for those who should despitefully use and persecute them. Agreeably to their divine instructions, they endured all things and suffered all things; yea, even rejoiced and thanked God when they were accounted worthy to suffer shame for his name’s sake. Yet, notwithstanding the gentleness of that lovely spirit, which, in the person of our incarnate God, and in all who were born of him, breathed “peace on earth and good will towards men ;“ this same spirit was sent forth “to reprove the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment;“ by this spirit the apostles were instructed to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; to fight the good fight; not however to contend with flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places; this spirit led the saints to resist unto blood, striving against sin; not to shed the blood, of their opponents, but to lay down their own lives, if necessary, rather than yield one item of the truth or order of the gospel of Christ; and by the same gentle spirit, too, the charge which we have quoted at the head of this article was indited. In perfect harmony with this blessed spirit, the Son of God rebuked the scribes, pharisees and hypocrites, sadducees, lawyers and doctors, in language the most pointed and severe; declaring to them that they were of their father, the devil, and the works of their father they would do; calling them serpents and vipers, and demanded of them how they could escape the damnation of hell. Paul was under the direction and influence of this holy spirit when addressing himself to a popular preacher of the new school, he said: “O, full of all subtlety and all guile, thou child of the devil how long wilt thou not cease to pervert the right way of the Lord?” And Peter also, when addressing one, who, like the patrons of theological schools and the like institutions, supposed that the gifts of the Holy Ghost might be purchased with money, said, “Thy money perish with thee;” and when addressing certain others, who wished to make a gain of godliness, he said, “Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God.” By this spirit David’s hands were taught to war, and his fingers to fight; and by this spirit it came to pass at noon that the prophet of the Lord mocked the prophets of Baal while at their protracted camp-meeting, and while they were so deeply engaged in their ardently pious devotion and vain endeavors to bring down fire from heaven in the sight of men, to consume their sacrifice, as to leap upon their altars, cut themselves with lancets and call aloud upon their idol.

We know not where to stop when tracing the severity with which the apostles and prophets, under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, handled the enemies of truth and righteousness. It is very certain, however, that all the servants of God of whom we have an account in the scriptures, held themselves bound by the most solemn considerations to rebuke their religious antagonists sharply, and especially such of them as were unsound in the faith; and we conclude that as long as it is written that the Lord will put enmity between the serpent and the woman, and their respective seeds, however this enmity may be disguised by professions of charity, soothsaying, deceit and hypocracy, there will continue to be war between the people of the saints and the children of the bond woman. In regard to our editorial course we have only to say that we, in the commencement of our labors, announced oar design to wage war with the mother Armianism, and her entire brood of institutions. Our flag is nailed to the mast-head, and when we discontinue our course we expect to cease from our labors. We wish to be governed by the word and Spirit of God; we have no idea of pleasing the world or carnal professors, nor are we surprised ever and anon to find some of our brethren, whom we highly esteemed for the truth’s sake, recommending something like compromise.

Remarks on Zechariah 3:3

"Now Joshua was clothed with filthy garments, and stood before the angel."

Contemporary with Nehemiah and Zerubbabel, at the time of the building of the second temple in Jerusalem, Joshua presided as the High Priest of Israel, and as such a type of the great High Priest of our profession who is brought to view in the gospel, as presiding over the building of the spiritual and antitypical temple, which of lively stones is built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God, by Jesus Christ. Christ as the builder of his church was prophesied of by this same prophet (in 6:12,13) saying, "Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying Behold the man whose name is THE BRANCH, and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord: even he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest upon his throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between them both."

The priesthood of Aaron and his sons claimed no regal power, no right to reign or rule, but was confined to the service of the altar, and continually engaged in offering sacrifices for the sins of the people; but in the figure of the man whose name is The Branch, is presented a regal or royal priesthood, not after the order of Aaron, but after the order of Melchisedec, and in it is presented the King and the priest in one man, whose name is The Branch, and the Counsel of Peace, between them both, that is between the King and the priest.

As all the approved kings of Israel counseled with the priests, and through them received counsel from the Lord; they in their communion and consultation, appointed to him, who should sum up all that was set forth by prophets, priests and kings, in the person of him who is our Prophet, Priest and King; the King of Righteousness and Priest unto the Most High God, and all the counsel of peace involving and embracing e eternal salvation of his church and kingdom is embraced in the official characters which are embodied in, and sustained by, our Lord Jesus Christ. Men sometimes volunteer their counsels, professedly for peace; and which they seem to flatter themselves will be an improvement on God's counsel; but the counsels of men invariably conflict with the counsel of the Lord which alone shall stand.

In offering a few remarks on the text which we have placed at the head of this article, we propose to notice Joshua in his typical relation to Christ, and of Christ in his vital relation to his church.

The person, priesthood and official service of Joshua differed in nothing essential from that of other priests of the same order; but in his name, and connection with the building of the temple, as also in his presentation in the subject under consideration, are found some expressive peculiarities in which he prefigures our Lord Jesus Christ.

His name Joshua, is in signification the same as Jesus, which signifies a Savior, and as such was given to our Lord, to assure us that he should save his people from their sins. And Joshua's connection with the building of the temple, gives additional significance to him as a type of our great High Priest.

But the position occupied by him in our text and its surroundings, demands our special attention. The prophet says, "And he showed me Joshua the high priest, standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him." Here, if we comprehend the figure, our Lord Jesus Christ is brought to view in his Mediatorial work in his priestly habiliments, as bearing all the tribes of his redeemed Israel, and stands for them, before the angel of the divine presence, in his holy law. The angel, or spirit of the holy law of God, is the angel of the Lord. God's presence is called his angel; and God appears in his law demanding satisfaction for the sins, which Christ, in his priesthood came to expiate, and make atonement for. No priest or offering under the old dispensation could meet the demands of the law and justice of God, but our spiritual Joshua was able to stand before the angel; and although there resisted in his mediatorial work, by Satan, sin, death, hell, and the grave, he occupies the place as one arraigned before the angel, to bear the judgment, and meet the awakened sword which God had commanded to smite the Shepherd. In his description of this dreadful conflict, Jude says, "Michael the arch angel, when contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses, said, The Lord rebuke thee." From this declaration of Jude, we learn what was the ground of contention. By the body of Moses, which God buried in the wilderness, and whose sepulcher could never afterwards be found, we understand is signified, the power and dominion of the law, as administered by Moses over God's people, Israel, whose demands were met and canceled by our Redeemer, and which in its dominion became dead to them, and they to it, by the body of Christ. In this conflict an effectual appeal was made to God, to rebuke the disputing adversary. "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan, even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem;" the very God of election, whose sovereign choice of Jerusalem is in the eternal and immutable election of grace, rebuke thee. "Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?"

Observe the figure. After a seventy years captivity of the children of Israel in Babylon, in which the city had been nearly demolished, the old temple destroyed, its consecrated furniture desecrated and carried away, and few of the citizens permitted to return, what more appropriate figure could represent this preserved remnant according to the election of grace, than is here used, a brand plucked out of the fire? Nearly consumed, but a brand remains, which must inevitably have been consumed, but for the election of grace. Now in the great redemption and deliverance of this chosen remnant, our High Priest appears before the angel of the Lord, clothed with filthy garments. His work is to purge and cleanse Jerusalem from all her uncleanness, and to do this, as her High Priest he must represent her as she truly is, by an assumption of all her sins and pollutions. And the Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all. Bearing all the sins of his people, he stands before the angel of the divine presence. The flaming eye of the law and justice of the pure and holy God is upon him, and yet he stands clothed in filthy garments, before whose searching gaze no unclean or unholy thing can be tolerated, or allowed to live.

No greater affront could be offered to the law than for the priests to appear before the Lord except in consecrated priestly garments perfectly pure and clean. But, wonder ye heavens, and be astonished O earth, the High Priest of our profession before the presence of the angel of the Lord in filthy garments; behold he comes from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah; and he will stain all his raiment. He is made sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. He is numbered with the transgressors, and bears the sins of many. He is holy, harmless, separate from sinners, and higher than the heavens, - he who is the righteousness of God, is clothed in filthy garments and stands before the angel. How could this be? The Word which was with God, even the Word which was God, is made flesh. He has taken on him the seed of Abraham, is made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that are under the law; and in the assumption of the seed of Abraham, all the transgressions of that seed are laid on him, and bearing them in his own body on the tree, he stood before the angel; with full ability to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, and to finish transgressions and make an end of sin, and to bring in everlasting righteousness. Having as our High Priest, made an offering for sin, he has by one offering perfected forever them that are sanctified. There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. Through the efficient Priesthood of our spiritual Joshua, a fountain is opened for the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness. For he has himself borne our griefs, carried our sorrows, and endured the chastisement of our peace, and with his stripes we are healed. Truly such an High Priest became us. No other priest could, with our sins upon him, have stood before the angel. He only was able to bear the storm of wrath which was due to our transgressions; as none but Jesus was able to lay down his life, and then to take it up again. Not all the blood that flowed from Hebrew altars, nor all the sacrificial offerings made by Aaron and his sons, could have purged our hearts from an evil conscience, or qualified us to serve the true God acceptably. But he was delivered up for our offences, and raised again for our justification; and so we are freely justified, through the redemption that is in him.

The brand is rescued from the burning. The fire of righteous indignation and wrath is quenched by the one offering which Jesus Christ, through the eternal spirit made, of himself unto God; and by the which he has obtained eternal redemption for us. Can we contemplate the subject without feeling emotions of love and gratitude to him who hath loved us and given himself for us? He endured the cross, he despised the shame, he suffered without the camp, for us: and shall we, can we feel reluctant to go unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach? He has redeemed us unto God with his precious blood, plucked us as brands out of the fire, called us by his grace, quickened us by his. spirit, and assured us that we shall reign with him in glory. Then what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness? No service by him enjoined, can be too hard; no sacrifice of ease, or wealth, of time or substance, can be too great. If indeed we love him, let us keep his commandments.

REMOVAL TO NEW VERNON N. Y

"For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come." (Heb. xiii. 14.)

HEREBY our brethren and friends throughout the extent of our circulation will be informed that in the beginning of next month (April) we expect, if the Lord will, to return to our old residence, and to the bosom of the dear church of Christ at New Vernon, Orange County, N. Y. We could occupy a large space upon the subject of our contemplated removal; but a few remarks must suffice for the present. We have never indulged a doubt that the Lord in wisdom and righteousness directed our course when we took up a temporary abode with a small, tried, persecuted, afflicted and proscribed company of precious brethren in this place: nor did we apprehend that the Righteous Disposer of all events designed that our stay in this place should be so transient; but so it is, and notwithstanding the Lord's ways may seem dark and mysterious to our weak judgment, we know he orders all aright.

Since our removal to this place the church at New Vernon have not been able to fix their mind on any one to succeed us in the pastoral office. They have had some supplies, but have remained destitute of a pastor; and during the whole time of our sojourn in this land, they have not ceased to urge us to return to them. Their earnest solicitude has from time to time been referred to the judgment of the brethren of the Alexandria church, who have uniformly objected to release us from serving them: Thus have we been tied between two. ways. To hear and not heed the long continued cry of the church where we have spent more than ten years in the enjoyment of the society and fellowship of a little band of as.

loving, plain and honest-hearted disciples of Christ as we have ever met with, was more than we could do; while the thought on the other hand, of leaving the church in this place, against their wishes, in the midst of their enemies, and that without an apparent prospect of their being able soon to settle among them some one in whom they could be united as a pastor, was painful. We have often said that if either of the two churches could be supplied, we would cheerfully fly to the other.

While on a journey to the north last June, there appeared to us what we thought a favorable opportunity for obtaining a supply for this place: this led us to give New Vernon Church more encouragement than we should have thought it prudent otherwise to have given. And after our return and consultation with brethren here, who seemed to hold views harmonious with our own, we ventured, as far as in us lay, to accept the call of the New Vernon Church. We now feel that a necessity is laid on us to return to our former location; for a little season, at least until the Lord in His holy providence shall further signify in what manner it is His pleasure to dispose of us. What adds greatly to our affliction in leaving our dear brethren and sisters in this place, is, that the prospect with which we had felt flattered has failed; and now this church have no one engaged to succeed in the pastoral charge. We know from whence Zion has a right to look for every necessary gift, and we hope and pray God may shortly send them one after His own heart, whose labors among them shall be blessed more abundantly than ours have been. And we earnestly invite (on our own responsibility) the ministers of Christ, to visit them as frequently as possible until they shall be more permanently supplied.

The church at Upper Broad Run, have obtained the labors of our esteemed Brother Trott; the Shiloh Church at Washington is at present destitute.

RENOUNCING IDOLS.

"'Predestinarian Baptist Convention, for the PURPOSE of a new association begun and held at Salem Meeting house, Boone County, Ky., on the 27th, 28th and 29th of November, 1840.'

"A FRIEND has furnished us with a document with the above title; and we regret that we cannot say anything in commendation of the proceedings of this body, or of the Spirit by which it is actuated. It is composed of eight fractions of churches, which have rent themselves from the North Bend Association, on account of the missionary spirit prevailing in that Association. They claim to represent 295 members; but as the bible assures us that no man ever yet resisted God and prospered, we are sure that all who oppose the spread of the gospel will be defeated; and these with the rest. We cannot forbear an expression of our unfeigned sorrow, in view of the direful effects of that fell spirit of discord and anti-christianity, which is manifested on the part of those misguided brethren who set themselves in array against the spread of the word of life; and in all sincerity we say, 'Lord forgive them, they know not what they.'" Banner & Pioneer.

THE editors of the Banner & Pioneer seem to regret that they cannot speak well of these predestinarian Baptists, of Boone County, Ky.; but we entreat them to spare their grief; for if they had studied to frame a eulogy for these brethren they could not have better succeeded than by the insertion of the article above copied. It is as natural for the popular Arminian Baptists to hate Sarah's children as it is for war to exist between the seed of the serpent and the seed of the woman. Old Ahab could speak in terms of strong commendation to Jehosaphat, of all his prophets; but, in speaking of the Lord's prophet, "There is" (said he) "one man Micaiah, by whom we may inquire of the Lord, but I hate him, for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil." 1 Kings xxii. 6, 8. Ahab's commendation and partiality to his four hundred prophets, were strong presumptive evidences to Jehosaphat that they were false prophets, while his hatred to Micaiah was good evidence that he was a prophet of the Lord. In the same light we hold the testimony of the Banner.

In venting its spleen against this little band of Predestinarian Baptists, the Banner places anti-christ precisely where Paul said he should be revealed, viz: So that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God: for Mr. W. charges their opposition to the New School party as opposition to God; and says, These must be defeated with all that oppose the spread of the gospel and resist God! In what particular do they resist God, or are they opposed to the spread of the gospel? Is it in that they believe in the universal government of God over all events, as expressed in the doctrine of predestination? Does this constitute their resistance of God? If so, then to believe the opposite sentiment (Arminianism) with the New School, would be consonant with the Divine will. Or is their opposition to the abominable deception and vile trickery practiced under the modern missionary cover at this day, justly called opposition to the spread of the gospel? So these men would have us believe; but such is not the truth. The very reason why the Predestinarian Baptists have withdrawn their fellowship from the modern New School order, is that the latter have departed widely from both the doctrine and practice of the gospel of Christ; and for that reason they are commanded of God to withdraw from them: their withdrawal therefore instead of resistance of God, is in obedience to his divine precepts.

The Predestinarian Baptists are the only people on the earth that love the gospel of Christ, and these are the only people under heaven that will publish the gospel from a sincere love of it. Take away the salary of your modern missionaries, and see how many will remain in your field! But we challenge the New School to point out an instance, where any Predestinarian Baptist preacher, who trusted in the Lord was ever driven from the field where the Lord had stationed him, for want of funds. But the spirit that will disclaim, and retire from their God-dishonoring craft, and that leads the servants of the Most ugh to repose all confidence in him, is by the Banner denounced as a fell spirit! (meaning a devil!) of anti-christianity, and those brethren who are led by the influence of the spirit of truth, are denominated misguided brethren; because they are not guided by the secret conclave of dignitaries, who work the wires of the New School machinery, are not guided by the Board of Foreign or Domestic Missions - therefore these profane wretches dare to take the name of the Lord in vain, assaying to inform the Lord that his preachers and people "Know not what they do!"

REPENTANCE,

BROTHER CALLAHAN, at the close of his communication on page 109, requests our views on this subject. We have neither time or space at present to do it justice; a few brief remarks must for this time suffice.

The general meaning of the term, as used in the scriptures, is to express a turning from one thing to another, and frequently implies a conviction of error in a former course, together with sorrow and remorse on the part of the penitent; but it does not always mean or imply a godly sorrow for sin, nor does it always stand connected with such sorrow. The term is used in the cases of Esau, Judas and others, not to express godly sorrow, but selfish remorse, and in such cases is connected with the sorrow of the world, which worketh death. It is sometimes used in reference to God, when of course it can neither mean conviction of wrong, sorrow or remorse, but, as we understand, merely a change of ministration, as that brought about by the deluge, the destruction of Nineveh, &c. This term is sometimes used in a general, temporal or national point of view; as Nineveh repented by general external performances, such as dressing man and beast in sackcloth, fasting, &c.; their repentance was national and temporal, and only shielded them from national and temporal calamities. The term is sometimes used in reference to christians. “If thy brother offend thee, and turn again, saying, I repent, forgive him,” &c. This description of repentance is common to the children of God throughout their pilgrimage, after having passed from death unto life. The instances are numerous where the term is used without involving the idea of regret, remorse or sorrow, as, “The Lord sware, and will not repent, (change) thou art a priest,” &c. - Heb. vii. 21. The repentance preached by John (not to an unregenerate people) to a people prepared by God, (See Luke i. 17,) was also of the same sort, requiring all that portion of Judah and Jerusalem, and the regions round about Jordan, whom God hath prepared by his grace, to come out from Judaism, from the legal covenant, from Jewish rites and ceremonies, and by baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus, with a profession of faith in his name, to embrace christianity and own their allegiance to Christ. This preaching of repentance was continued by Christ himself after John was put in prison. "Jesus came from Galilee preaching, &c., saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of heaven is at hand; repent ye and believe the gospel." If the repentance preached by John' and by the Master had been what the Fullerites and Arminians of our day would represent it to be, why had John failed to warn the scribes and pharisees, the generation of vipers, to flee from the wrath to come? He had preached no repentance to them; they were not a people prepared by God for that kind of preaching; this he gave them to understand. Those whom God had sent him to make ready by the preaching and baptism of repentance, were living fruitful trees which brought forth fruit meet for repentance, (or the change from the old to the new covenant order;) and not like themselves pleading the old covenant, and claiming Abraham to their father. And again, on the same supposition, why did our Lord add, as the reason why this repentance was necessary, that the kingdom of heaven (gospel church) was at hand, (about to be set up,) if the repentance then required was a requisition of the gospel, to be obligatory on all men to whom the gospel should be preached, and designed (as the Fullerites and Arminians would represent) to increase the damnation of those who were already justly condemned by the law, and who could not escape the perdition of ungodly men?

We have only time to glance at the subject. Widely differing from every description of repentance treated on in the above remarks, as also from that mentioned by Paul to the men at Athens, in which all men as the creatures of God are commanded to turn from dumb idols, &c., is that repentance which is unto life, and which needeth not to be repented of. The latter is a change produced by a display of quickening power and grace on the hearts of God's people when they pass from death unto life, and is preceded by "a godly sorrow for sin which worketh repentance (or a change) unto life, which needeth not to be repented of." This repentance is sometimes distinguished from the other by the saints as evangelical repentance; it cannot be produced by sulphuric fumes of Arminian slang, anxious benches, or any of the machinery of human device; for it is the gift of God, and Jesus Christ our Lord is exalted a Prince and Savior to give it to Israel, and with it, invariably, the remission of sins. This is not a cause or means of grace, or of salvation, but an effect; none but quickened sinners ever felt its power or realized its salutary effects. It is the work of an exalted Prince and Savior to give it, not of a dead sinner to manufacture it; it is a fruit of the Spirit wrought in the heart by him who worketh in his people, both to will and to do of his good pleasure. It is not demanded of unregenerate sinners by the gospel, for the gospel is not a supplement to the law, nor a system of extra demands on a set of bankrupts; nor are sinners condemned and damned for failing to exercise faith and repentance; for the gospel is good news, glad tidings, great joy, &c., to all to whom it is sent; nay, it is Christ, and he came not to condemn the world. Those who are finally lost, are condemned and damned for violating the law of God, which requires perfect and perpetual obedience of all who are under it, and that, too, on pain of everlasting damnation; but gospel damnation is what time scriptures never taught, nor authorized us to teach or believe.

The gospel teaches what true repentance is, shows the necessity of it, its source, its operation on the hearts, lives and conversation of the people of God; and furthermore shows to the heirs of salvation that no manner of repentance but that which comes alone from God can insure the remission of sins, or the inheritance of life.

These hasty remarks on repentance are respectfully submitted to the consideration of brother Callahan, the Lexington Association of New York, and to our brethren and readers in general; and may the Lord bless them to the edification of his people, and the declarative glory of his great name.

REPENTANCE

In replying to the inquiries of brother Samuel Rixey, of Culpepper C.H., Va., we will in the onset observe that although we are not very familiar with all the theories of theologians on the subject of repentance, and therefore but poorly qualified to follow them in all their applications, explanations, divisions, and nice distinctions as to the meaning of the word, when applied literally, we nevertheless feel willing to give to our brother, and to our readers generally, such views as we can gather from a close attentive reading of the scriptures. That the word is used in our version of the Bible with a variety of application is certain, from the fact that it is not only applied to good men, and bad men, but also to God himself. And that it does not apply to God in the same sense that it does to man is clear from the declaration that God is not a man that he should repent. That is, God does not repent, yet in the same chapter (I Samuel 15:29,35) we are told "the Lord repented that he made Saul king over Israel." And this he did, simply by deposing him from the throne, and supplying the throne with a better man. Repentance when applied to God does not intend a sorrow for what he had done, a conviction of having done wrong, or even a change in his mind or purpose; but, as we understand, it signifies a change of his outward administration in his dispensations, and all in perfect harmony with his eternal and immutable purpose. Nor does the term when applied to men always mean sorrow, or regret, for what we sometimes denominate evangelic or gospel repentance, which is unto life, is not, but results from a godly sorrow for sins.

In the text referred to by brother Rixey (Mark 1:15), the word is used in the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom by Christ himself, and not in the ministration of the law by Moses; it was not therefore legal repentance, but a repentance preparatory to a cordial reception of the gospel of the kingdom which Christ was preaching. If the term legal be used as an adjective, to signify a repentance demanded or required by the law, we should first inquire whether the law ever did, or could, demand or accept of any kind of repentance. It is not in the nature of any absolute law to require repentance. The law of God does not require that we shall be sorry for having sinned, but it forbids that we should sin. It requires perfect and perpetual obedience, and condemns to death for the first transgression.

"And could our tears forever flow,
And could our grief no respite know,"

It would avail us nothing by way of explanation. "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy." No repentance or mercy can flow to transgressors, from the law.

From the confused theory of Arminians of a legal repentance grows also the doctrine of obligatory repentance. That repentance which is unto life and is connected with godly sorrow is the gift of God; it proceeds from a godly principle implanted in the heart, and which cannot possibly flow from an ungodly source. Any sorrow or repentance that could come from an ungodly sinner's heart, or from any sinner's heart before a godly principle is therein implanted, would be like the fountain from whence it emanates; ungodly. We search the law and gospel both in vain to find this obligatory repentance which is in so great demand among all the legal work-mongrel tribes of the Arminians. We do not wonder that our dear brother's mind has been puzzled and perplexed to bring the obligation of repentance upon unregenerate sinners. We might as well speak of their obligation to remit their own sins as to procure their own repentance, seeing Christ alone is exalted to be a Prince and Savior, for to give, both the one and the other unto Israel. It would be equally as proper and scriptural to speak of their obligation to be saved, to go to heaven, and to make themselves sons and heirs of God. But, does man's inability to repent, or to believe, or even to keep from sinning, relieve him from his obligation to do so? Certainly not, if it can be found that such obligations are upon him. Now the sinner is one that has sinned. Sin is the transgression of the law; but where has the law under which the unregenerate sinner is held, either required him to repent or believe the gospel? The law truly forbids him to transgress, and holds him answerable for every transgression. Sin, not a want of repentance or faith, is what the sinner is condemned for. Without the faith of the Son of God, no sinner ever did or could believe the gospel; for believing the gospel is the assurance of faith, and that is the gift of God. Is there any obligation devolving on a graceless sinner making it his duty that God shall give him either faith or repentance? How absurd! But suppose the sinner could control the convictions of his own carnal mind so far as to make himself believe that he is a Christian, that he was chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, that Christ died for him, that he is freely justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, would that carnal assurance make it so? Would he not believe an untruth, even if he believed literally just what the Christian believes? Because that which is true in the case of one that is born of the Spirit is not true of him who only possesses a carnal assurance. The heaven-born child believes that God is his Father, and has the witness in himself. The Spirit bearing witness with his spirit that he is born of God. But if the unregenerate sinner without that witness believes himself to be an heir of immortality, he is deceived, and believes a lie. But to believe the gospel is to believe all this. It is precisely so with all that passes for true gospel repentance, if it be not the work of God, and the gift of God, it is all delusive and vain.

But, we shall be asked, did not John the Baptist and our Lord preach to the people saying, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand"? All this is admitted. But if we carefully observe when, to whom, and by whom this repentance was preached, it will enable us the more clearly to understand what manner of repentance was called for.

"The law and the prophets were until John." Since that time, and until these words were spoken by our Lord (see Luke 16:16), the kingdom of God is preached and every man presseth into it. At this particular time John was sent from God to prepare the way of the Lord; to preach that the kingdom of heaven, so long predicted, was at hand; that the Messiah had come; that Jewish rites and ceremonies were now about to be abolished; that their fleshly descent from Abraham was no longer to avail them; for God was able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham. John's mission was only to the Jews, to preach repentance to them, and to baptize them with the baptism of repentance. This repentance and baptism both signified a turning away from the works, rites, ceremonies and ordinances of the law, as a ground of acceptance with God; and a coming out from Jerusalem, and a reception of Christ as that Messiah which was to come, and which they professed to be looking for. Their repentance did not signify that they were at that time born of the Spirit, or that they had not been subjects of that spiritual birth for many years. But it did signify that they came out from Judaism, sensible that the works of the law could not purge their consciences from dead works, to serve the living God; and hence they came to John's baptism of repentance, confessing their sins, and professing their faith in and reliance upon that Christ whom John pointed out to them as the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world. Remember John was sent to make ready a people prepared for the Lord. His work was stated by the angel of the Lord in Luke 1:13-17. It is also recorded in prophetic declarations of Zacharias in Luke 1:68-79. "And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Highest; for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord, to prepare his ways; to give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins, through the tender mercy of our God: whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace."

Now observe, John's commission was to go before the face of the Lord, to announce his coming, and to "give knowledge of salvation" to God's people, by remission of their (God's people's) sins, and to make ready a people, already prepared by grace, for the Lord, by calling them out from the house of bondage, and by baptizing them with the baptism of repentance, or reformation, saying unto them that they should believe on him that was to come, that is on Christ; and that they should receive him as the true Messiah, and look to him alone for salvation. The repentance which John preached, and to which he baptized the people prepared for the Lord, is further defined in its peculiar nature and effects by the rejection of the Pharisees from John's baptism of repentance. "O, generation of vipers! Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come. Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance, and think not to say unto yourselves, We have Abraham to our father, for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham (Matthew 3:7-9)." Had these Pharisees and Sadducees possessed the repentance which John preached, they would have signified it by a turning away from their cherished traditional hopes of being saved by their fleshly relation to Abraham, and by a reliance alone on him whose kingdom was about to be organized. The repentance preached was an abandonment of all confidence in the flesh, and a ready and hearty acknowledgment of Christ. "And now also the ax is laid unto the root of the trees." They were about to be cut off from Abraham as their root, and scattered among the Gentiles. The wrath to come, of which John spake was that wrath which had long been accumulating and now hung impending over Jerusalem and the Jews as a nation. Every tree in this wilderness of Judea, which God had not by his grace made good and fruitful, was to be cut down. Their confidence in Abraham as their root, and the covenant of circumcision was now to fail them, and only such Jews as God had prepared, and John was commissioned to make ready, should be admitted into the kingdom which was at hand.

The preaching of Christ referred to by brother Rixey was addressed to the same people, and was a continuance of the preaching of John. "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye, and believe the gospel (Mark 1:14,15)." This time appointed was Daniel's weeks, or the "fullness of time," when God was to send forth his Son; the time allotted to the legal dispensation, the time for the worldly sanctuary and carnal ordinances was fulfilled. The good news, tidings of great joy to those who could show fruits meet for repentance; the gospel of the kingdom, which the God of heaven was to set up, was now preached, and those who had oil in their vessels were to go into the marriage, and the door was to be shut. This proclamation was made that all such as were prepared for the announcement should abandon their former position under the works and ritual of the law of a carnal commandment, and adhere to the gospel. This proclamation was not a proposition that if they would repent and believe the gospel they should be saved for doing so, for that would suppose that a bad tree could bring forth good fruit, without first being made good, which Christ says is impossible (see Matthew 7:18). We are told that when Jesus thus came to his own (his own people, the Jews) his own received him not. "But unto as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name, which were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God (John 1:11-13)." The twelve disciples also which were sent out were in their commission forbidden to go with this message to the Gentiles, for God had not yet granted repentance to the Gentiles. (See Acts 11:18.) Nor were they allowed to bear these gospel tidings to the Samaritans, "But, go ye rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matthew 10:5,6)." The time had not yet come for the gathering in of the other sheep which were afar off among the Gentiles. For this preaching of repentance and remission of sins in Christ's name must begin at Jerusalem (Luke 24:47). At the preaching of John, of Christ, of the twelve, and of the seventy, as many as were ordained unto eternal life believed, and came forward, confessing their sins, and professing faith in Christ, renouncing their former hopes of salvation by the deeds of the law, or works of the flesh; and signified the same by being baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and not unto Moses.

We have perhaps said enough to signify our views as to the nature of the repentance preached to the lost sheep of the house of Israel by John, by Christ, and by the disciples, before the crucifixion and resurrection of the Son of God, to satisfy brother Rixey that we do not understand the repentance preached by Christ in our text to be either that, strictly speaking, which results from fear of wrath, nor that which proceeds from godly sorrow for sins, but rather a turning away from their former legal works and adherence to abrogated rites and ceremonies, to receive that promised Messiah, of whom Moses and the prophets had written, and whom they were expecting should come. And although the words were addressed to the Jews generally, they were only applied to a people prepared for the Lord. All such on hearing the proclamation came from Judea, Jerusalem, and from regions about Jordan, to Jordan, and were baptized of John in the river Jordan, confessing their sins, thus fleeing from the wrath which was then about to come upon Jerusalem, and other cities of Judea, and thus by baptism signifying their death to Moses, and resurrection with Christ to newness of life.

REPLENISH THE TREASURY.

"THIS is all important. The Lord's treasury requires filling up. We pray the brethren in Pennsylvania not to forget when making up their contributions for missions, that the treasury of the Pennsylvania Baptist Convention is laboring under a consumption. That we have between thirty and forty missionaries dependent upon us for aid, and now looking anxiously for their quarter's appropriations, without our having one dollar in the fluids!

"Brethren, remember the missionaries in your own state of Pennsylvania." – Baptist Record.

IT is very common with modern stock-jobbers in religious speculation, to call their receptacles of filthy lucre "The Lord's treasury," and thus applied they speak much of its exhaustion and replenishment. A treasury in the true sense of the word, is the place where treasure is deposited, and the Lord's treasury is the place where God has deposited his treasures. In a scriptural view of the subject, Christ is the only treasury of God; for, in him are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; and it has pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell. And we behold his glory as the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. All power in heaven and earth is treasured up in him. Indeed, all that is valuable in securing the glory of God, and the redemption, sanctification, preservation and ultimate glory of the elect of God, and all who are embraced in that election; all is treasured up in Christ, and he is the only treasury of the Lord, that his children have any knowledge of. How unlike the treasury to which the New School Baptists profanely apply the title. The Lord's treasury never was exhausted; it is inexhaustible. It never was replenished, nor has it ever needed to be, by men or angels. It requires no agents, mendicants, or Judases to whine, beg or plead for aid; in him is found a full supply of all that is, or ever can be required for the execution of his purposes; quickening his redeemed, qualifying, sending out, and supporting his ministers; and all his chosen people shall, and do, from his fullness receive, and grace for grace. Those who are taught by his Spirit to trust in him, become as Mount Zion, which cannot be moved; they have no apprehension of a failure, they know in whom they have believed, and that he is able to keep that which they have committed unto him against that day. His ministers are not subjected to such contingencies as those deprecated in the extract copied above; they require no humanly devised mission board to become his endorser for their support, or to direct them to the field of their labor: for, Lo! he is with them always, even to the end of the world; and they have never found him an exhausted treasury, or a barren wilderness to them.

"All their capacious souls can need,
In him doth richly meet,
Nor to their eyes is gold so dear
Nor silver half so sweet."

"The treasury of the Pennsylvania convention is laboring under a consumption." And no wonder, there are so many officers, agents and hirelings dependent, that as fast as the people will replenish, the "greedy dogs" will devour, and hence the cry of the horse-leech's two daughters is always applicable.

These New School Baptists pretend to be worshiper's of God; but the article copied shows that they pray to the people, who have money. The thirty or forty missionaries depend upon the convention, and the convention in turn depend upon the monied contributors to whom they address their prayer. If among the thirty or forty who look to the convention for their quarter’s pay, there should be one of the servants of our Lord, he will learn how vain a thing it is to trust in man, and not only a vain thing but a cursed thing; for “ cursed is man that trusteth in man, or maketh flesh his arm.”

REPLY ON JOHN 14:1.

How peculiarly appropriate were the words of encouragement and admonition addressed to the disciples in the most solemn and trying time ever experienced in all the history of the church. The hour was approaching when their dear Lord, in whom they trusted for life and immortality, and who was nearer and dearer to them than any earthly friend or relative, was to be arrested by an armed band, into whose hands he was to be betrayed by one who had been numbered with the apostles, and be led away to Pilate's bar, and finally to be delivered up to die the ignominious death of the cross, amidst the insulting jeers and abusive execrations of an enraged and infatuated multitude.

Although the disciples had been told that for this cause came the Son of God into the world, yet they seemed to be quite unprepared to witness the terrible scene which was now about to be realized. If the Savior's own soul was straitened till this baptism of suffering was accomplished, is it strange that the trial should be most crushing to his disciples? But they were not only to feel the dreadful shock of witnessing the sufferings of the holy, harmless Lamb of God, but in such a manner as would be calculated to severely try their faith in him as the true Messiah. This is implied in the admonition, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." They verily thought it was he that should redeem Israel; but when the powers of darkness had seemed to prevail, their confidence in him was shaken, and they were sad and desponding, until assured of his resurrection. Dark and gloomy as all things must have seemed to them when they had witnessed his painful death, and the consignment of his body to the tomb, and remembered that it was the third day since these things had transpired, yet not more firmly stood the eternal throne of the Father, than stood the perfect and complete success of the Mediatorial work of the dear Redeemer, and therefore notwithstanding all the darksome appearance of things, they are encouraged to believe as firmly in him as they believed in the Father.

The trial for which our Savior was now preparing his disciples was to be more peculiarly calculated to shake their confidence in him as the true Messiah that was to come and redeem Israel, than it was to diminish their faith in God, as the Creator and upholder of all things. Their firm belief in God is admitted. “Ye believe in God.” Not only were they believers in God, being rationally convinced by the evidence presented to their natural minds by the external demonstrations seen in his wonderful works in which are displayed his eternal power and Godhead; but, as the subjects of his saving grace they were taught by the Spirit, and did know him as the true and living God; and the same faith to which his being and perfections were manifested, is that which must also recognize in Christ, the “only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.”

His words seem to imply that he was just as assuredly the true Messiah, of whom Moses and the prophets had written, as the God in whom they believed was and is the supreme and eternal God. Therefore they were admonished to “let not their heart be troubled.”

We infer, that whatever confidence we may have in the existence of the eternal God, we can have no true comfort until we can find that God in whom we believe, revealed to us in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ. Watts has justly said, “Till God revealed in flesh I see,

No comfort can I find;

The holy, just and sacred three,
Are terror to my mind."

A knowledge of the true God as he is revealed to us in his holy law, in the absence of faith in his dear Son, as our Day's Man, or Mediator, would fill us with terror and dismay; for how could we hope to stand before him with acceptance, if we did not believe also in Christ Jesus as the "one Mediator between God and men," and as the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved? To secure the heart from trouble, we must believe in Christ as our Mediator, even as we believe in God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Father of our spirits in Christ.

The despondence of the disciples when Jesus was taken by wicked men and crucified, and laid in the grave, was such as the disciples of Christ even to this day feel, when their faith loses the sight, or the sensible presence of their dear Redeemer; for in his absence how can we approach unto God and not be consumed? He is the way, and the truth, and the life; and no man cometh unto the Father but by him. As Christ and his Father are one, even so Christ and his church are one. As Christ is in the Father, and the Father is in him, even so Christ is in his church, and the church is in him. How then could we be saved from trouble in believing in the Father, if we believed not also in Christ?

This subject may afford comfort to our afflicted friend in North Carolina. He certainly believes in God who in his inscrutable providence has recently called from him his dearest earthly friend. What now can calm his troubled heart, or relieve the anguish of his spirit, and cause him to rejoice in his tribulation, and "midst changing scenes and dying friends," short of faith in Jesus Christ his Lord? If we believe in him, that faith will assure us that although we as sinners as exposed to the judgments of a holy God, yet believing also in Jesus as our Advocate with the Father, we find him our very present help in every time of trouble.

REPLY TO “A LITTLE ONE.”

When we speak of the existence of the people of God in Christ before the world began, we speak of their spiritual life. They had no other existence until the world began. Their earthly existence had its origin in Adam, who was made of the dust of the ground. Our earthly bodies and carnal nature were created in him, and from the date of his creation existed seminally in him; as the oak existed in the acorn. As the tree could not exist anterior to the acorn from which it is developed, so our earthly existence did not exist until Adam was created. Our spiritual existence, if we are the children of God, is an existence of life, and that life is eternal; and that eternal life is in Christ, and that life is Christ. Christ, as the life of all his members, is eternal life. John says, "And this is the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life (I John 5:11,12)." In this one "eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us (I John 1:2)," was the eternal life of all the children of God; for, "They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for the seed (Romans 9:8)." The identification of the children of God is in their identification with Christ, as their Eternal Life. Hence the election of grace is an election, not in the earthly Adam, but in Christ, "According as he (God) hath chosen us in him (Christ,) before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will (Ephesians 1:4,5)." Now predestination does not relate to that which is absolutely eternal. The Eternal Life, which is Christ, does not exist by predestination, for nothing can pre-exist that which is eternal. Christ is eternal, and he is eternal life; and the predestination to the adoption of children relates to the people of God in their relation to the earthly Adam, who were predestinated, in the order of time, to the adoption of children; and by virtue of that predestination, in the time appointed, they receive the spirit of adoption, whereby they cry, Abba Father.

In the elucidation of this election IN Christ before the foundation of the world, and predestination of us as children of men, to the adoption of children BY Christ, after the foundation of the world, the apostle speaks of a mystery. A most profound mystery, linking eternity with time, heaven with earth, God with man. "According to the riches of his grace, wherein he hath abounded to usward in all wisdom and prudence; having made known unto us the mystery of his will; according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself." Here let us pause and enquire, What is this mystery of his will? It is no less than this: "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth, even in him (Ephesians 1:7-10)." Here are things in heaven, and things in earth. How wide apart! Yet both belonging to Christ, and, although so widely distant, predestinated to be gathered together in one, even in him. That Eternal Life which was with the Father, was never out of Christ, never out of heaven. The subjects of his predestination unto the adoption of children, embracing untold millions of the human family, are in the ample provisions of his grace, wherein he hath abounded to usward in all wisdom and prudence, provided with redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace. In which redemption they are redeemed from the earth, from death, from guilt, wrath and condemnation. Redeemed unto God, to an identity with the risen and glorified Savior, and their mortality to be swallowed up of life; so that ultimately all things embraced in this mystery of the will of God, which are in heaven (including our spiritual eternal life, which is hid with Christ in God, and all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ), and all his purchased or redeemed possession on the earth (including all that the Father has given him, of the sons of men, and embracing all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call), shall be gathered together in one, even in Jesus Christ our Lord.

When Christ, who is the eternal life of his church and body, was made of a woman, and under the law, in his advent and incarnation, God was manifest in the flesh; and in the mysterious connection, exemplified the great design of his Mediatorial relations and work. In his wonderful conception, by the overshadowing Spirit, that holy thing should be called the Son of God. Made, by the same conception and birth, under the law. Heaven and earth, eternity and time, the divine and the human natures, were identified in his person, as the one Mediator between God and man; equally related to, and identified with both. On the one point, embodying all the fullness of the infinite and eternal Godhead; and on the other, he took on him the seed of Abraham, with all our infirmities, liabilities and responsibilities. In these two distinct, yet consolidated, natures he fully represented and embodied all things which are in him in heaven, and all things on earth that belong to his mystical body. Thus was made manifest the child born, the Son given, and his name is Wonderful. In this unparalleled mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh, justified by the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, and received up into glory. In legal oneness with his people under the law, he is recognized by the fiery law, and the inflexible justice of God, as Shepherd for his sheep, as Husband of his bride, and as Head of his body the church, he sank in death under the weight of the transgressions of his people, which were all laid upon him. In his circumcision, he put away the body of the sins of the flesh, burying the seed of Abraham by baptism into his death, reproducing, regenerating, and rescuing from the power of sin, death, and the dominion of the law, all his members; they rise with him to newness of life. Death is abolished, sin removed, righteousness brought in, and all his redeemed members freely justified through the redemption that is in him.

Having now removed all legal impediments out of the way, he shall now gather his sheep with his arm, and carry them in his bosom. He has ascended up on high, the heavens have received him; and in testimony to us that his Mediatorial work is accepted, the Holy Ghost is sent down, and the dispensation of the fullness of times shall witness the ingathering into his kingdom all his members. The kingdom is in Christ; therefore, all who are gathered into his kingdom are gathered into him. All must come in the unity of the faith and knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. In that identity they are all one; where "there is neither Jew nor Greek, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free; but Christ is all, and in all (Colossians 3:11)."

In the gathering into the kingdom, by the new birth, we are made partakers of that eternal life which Christ is unto his people. And although our fleshly nature is excluded from this spiritual kingdom, and flesh and blood cannot come into, or inherit it, we still rely upon the infallible promise that our vile bodies shall be changed, and fashioned like his glorious body; and in that promised change, mortality shall be swallowed up of life. It is sown a natural body, it shall be raised a spiritual body; and the saying that is written shall be fulfilled, and these mortals shall put on immortality, and these corruptibles shall put on incorruption; and all for whom this glorious resurrection is secured, by the resurrection of our blessed Redeemer, shall be fully gathered together in one, even in him.

Whether we have succeeded in making this subject clear to A Little One, or not, if we have understood his views, as stated in his letter, they express substantially what we contend for. That eternal life, which he speaks of as being given to the saints when they are born again, is what constitutes us the children of God; and in that life we were chosen in Christ before the world began. And when we receive that life experimentally, by it our whole persons are sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, and sealed unto the redemption (or deliverance) of the purchased possession; when "the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God;" and then shall we be satisfied, when we awake with his likeness.

In reply to the enquirer, as to the signification of John 3:5, we do not understand that the being born of the water alludes to the ordinance of baptism, only figuratively. There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and these three agree in one.

In being born again, the Spirit quickens the sinner that was dead in sins; the water of life, clear as crystal, from the throne of God and the Lamb, flows freely to the newborn child of God, and the blood of Christ is applied in all its power to cleanse us from all sin. Christian baptism is emblematic of this, as it sets forth our death, burial, and resurrection to a newness of life.

REPLY TO “A POOR SINNER.”

1. SHE thinks when an editor has excellent communications on hand, he would do better to publish them than to occupy his columns with church quarrels, &c.

2. She wishes to be informed why it is that the ministers of all denominations within the circle of her acquaintance exhort sinners to comply with the terms of salvation.

3. Whether it is her duty to attend meeting every first-day where the main scope of the preaching is erroneous, or to tarry at home and be considered a heathen?

We respectfully reply to our correspondent, that however pleasant and agreeable it may be to us to read the excellent communications of our scattered brethren on those ever profitable and interesting points of doctrine and experience, and to learn the prosperity of the cause of God and truth in the various departments of Zion, it is also our painful lot to record some of the many tricks of the adversary, by which he is known to sow the seeds of discord among brethren, for the two-fold reason: first, that others may not be ignorant of his devices, but be on their guard, and the better prepared to meet him at the treshhold; and also, to build up the dear persecuted and afflicted bands who are sorely hunted by the common enemy, and to let them know that we have fellow. ship in their sufferings for the truth’s sake.

To the second enquiry we shall not attempt to give a better answer than what the apostle Paul has given in Rom. x. 3, viz: “They being ignorant of God’s righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God.” There. fore being strangers to God, and of course to the things of the Spirit of God, they cannot, with all their scholastic divinity, “know the things of the Spirit.” These are all the reasons we are prepared to give. We are happy to say that within the circle of our acquaintance there are a number of professed ministers of the gospel who cease not to affirm that the terms or conditions of salvation were settled in the ancients of eternity, and that they all rested on him who was and is mighty and able to save unto the uttermost all who come unto God by him, and that he has fully and completely met these conditions, and fulfilled them all, so that “He has by one offering perfected forever them that are sanctified.”

To her third interrogation we say it is not the duty of any one to countenance the promulgation of error by their presence, but on the first day of the week, and on all other days, it is the duty of all who love our Lord Jesus Christ to come out, and be separate from the world and from anti-christ, although by doing so they may be subjected to the ridicule of such as would call them heathen for a correct and bible course.

REPLY TO A RULING ELDER.

WHEN the celebrated A. Toplady said, in reference to a controversy with John Wesley, that "To shoot at crows, was powder thrown away," we thought it rather an ill-natured remark; for we are of the opinion that a becoming courtesy is due to all our religious opponents.

As the challenge of this dignified rabbi of methodism is universal, our readers, as well as ourself, are interested in the issue. The confidence that he expresses in his ability to meet and put to silence all such as differ from his notion of things, at once develops his zeal and his modesty. Unused as we are to combat with giants, it may seem presumptuous in us to, with only our "shepherd's bag, our sling and a few smooth stones from the brook," to look him in the face; but since we heard of the "Dialogue between the Methodist preacher and a Barber's Block," we have thought there may be some possibility of surviving an encounter with this uncircumcised Philistine.

Our opponent infers from the 7th page of our current volume, that we hold all who are not Predestinarian Baptists, as haters of the truth, and wonders if we think that God's elect, in our day, is limited to the Predestinarian Baptists, &c. His inference, to say the least of it, is far fetched, and is neither said nor implied in any article on the page referred to; but as the ruling gentleman expresses a desire to know our thoughts in relation to the extent of the election of grace, we will inform him that we believe that God has absolutely chosen or elected in Christ Jesus, a portion of mankind, embracing an innumerable people, to be, in the fullness of time, called by grace, out of every nation, language, kindred and tongue under heaven, effectually and savingly, to a knowledge and supreme love of the truth, as it is in Jesus; of which truth Predestination is one very prominent branch, and so important, so radical and fundamental, that in its absence every other principle of the doctrine of God our Savior would be rendered precarious and uncertain. Its extent in our day is precisely what has been its extent from the ancients of eternity. In its hight and depth, its length and breadth, it is bounded in every particular by the good pleasure of the sovereign, eternal and immutable will of God. If we believed that the Predestinarian Baptist church, at this day, embraced all the elect, or in other words, that all the chosen of God were already gathered into the fold of Christ, we should henceforth look for no more ingathering of the redeemed; but so far from Such a. belief are we, that we confidently believe there are many of God’s elect yet to be brought to know and love the truth, who are yet in nature's darkness, alienated from God, and strangers to the spirit of his grace. And, for the special edification of our very reverend querist, we will add that, for aught we know to the contrary, there may be some among the poor benighted and deluded Methodists, over whom he has the dignity to preside, who are included in the purpose of grace; and who will ultimately, by virtue of the election of grace, (which doctrine now they hate) be brought to know, love and rejoice in the predestination of God. But while we cheerfully admit the possibility of some of the elect of God, in their depravity being sunken down even to the corruption and abomination of methodism; we as confidently deny the possibility of a single soul among them being saved in their methodism. They may be saved from it, but as the testimony of the Bible is true, they cannot be saved in it.

Now, if what is asserted in the “Signs of the Times” is true, we are called on to answer the following interrogatives of the ruling Elder of methodism, viz:

First. “By what law or rule will those be judged at the last day, for whom Christ did not die?”

To this question we reply, those for whom there is no redemption are judged already by the law of God, and by that law they are condemned already and the wrath of God abideth on them. This judgment is passed upon them, and their sentence is already pronounced by the sovereign Judge of the quick and the dead, and this decision is absolute, and from it there is no appeal. This sentence of the Judge, based upon the holy law which they have transgressed, consigns them in all their guilt and methodism to the withering curse of God, and their judgment now, of a long time hungereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not. The judgment of the last day, to which we suppose our querist alludes, is but the day when the fullness of that almighty wrath to which they are already adjudged, shall be meted out to them. Anticipating our answer, our combatant objects, and asserts that the law of works was given to man before the fall; that by it all mankind are already condemned to die, and concludes from that death there can be no resurrection, only by the death of Christ. This objection thus stated to our views, arises from the blindness of the mind of its author, who being ignorant of the spirituality of the law of God, understands it only in reference to a natural death, or dissolution of our mortal bodies; but should he ever experience the quickening work of the Holy Ghost, and learn the spirituality of the law, he will be heard to exclaim with Paul, “When the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.” Then would his old legal notion of his personal holiness be shaken to its base, his filthy, ragged suit of human righteousness explode; his methodism ignite and be reduced to ashes, and all his fancied claim on God for acceptance would give up the ghost.

Mr. Ackers supposes that the atonement of Christ was as necessary to open the way of. damnation by a resurrection of the body, as to carry out the provisions of grace in the salvation of the elect of God; for he contends that they could not be raised from the dead, unless the law by which they were condemned was satisfied by the death of Christ. But, suppose for the sake of illustration, the law was satisfied in behalf of all mankind by the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, so that the messy doors of death could no longer hold his prisoners; and the ungodly were raised from that death, what would become of them? If Christ died for them all, he died to redeem them from all iniquity, and to purify unto himself a peculiar people; this supposition therefore involves a universal salvation of all mankind; and if so what becomes of methodism? What becomes of gospel condemnations If the demands of the flaming law of God are satisfied, Christ and the gospel came not to condemn men, and the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin: it must then of necessity follow that all mankind, or at least as many of them as are finally raised from the dead, are saved, and in that case what becomes of Mr. A.’s judgment of the last day, which he admitted in the former part of his letter?

But why waste our time in debating this point. If the resurrection of the ungodly, to a resurrection of damnation, implied a release from that death in which the ungodly are involved as transgressors of the divine law, then there would be some kind of plausibility in the quibbling of our antagonist; but such is not the case. The sovereign Judge has himself declared that they shall never see life; and yet he has affirmed that the hour is coming when all they that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth, and that portion of them of whom we are now writing, shall rise to a resurrection of damnation.

Second. The second question of our opposing champion, is but little more than a transposed repetition of the first; but as he has appended to it some startling declarations, by way of limiting the omnipotent God, and letting us know what he vainly supposes divine omnipotence itself cannot do, we will briefly notice his presumption, and leave him to urge his unequal war against that God whom he so audaciously blasphemes.

Who has authorized this pampered worm of the dust, this creature of yesterday, this ruling Elder of methodism, to connect the power of Christ to raise the dead, and to turn the wicked into hell, with his vicarious death and sufferings, so as to make his power and right to trample his enemies in his fury, and dash them to pieces like a potter's vessel, to depend upon the mediatorial sacrifice made for his people? Yet he has so asserted. Presumptuous man! Though he were the pope of Rome, instead of a ruling Elder, his assertions are arrogant and blasphemous. Know then, infatuated man, that the resurrection and eternal perdition of the ungodly, is but the execution of the law by which you have already admitted they were condemned, and from the penalty of which they cannot be released, until every jot and title of the law is fulfilled. That Christ has received all judgment; that he doth now preside over the destiny of all beings, and that too in his mediatorial character, we believe; but that which we understand involved in his mediatorial work, was to bear the sins of many, save his people from their sins, redeem them from the curse and dominion of the law by the sacrifice of himself bringing in for them everlasting righteousness, and to bring home to ultimate glory all that the Father gave him; and in reference to the ungodly, God has given to him the neck of his enemies, that he may rule them with a rod of iron, and break them to pieces, &c. He stood engaged to honor the law, by which the sons of Adam stood condemned: this pledge he has redeemed by the complete deliverance of his people or elect from their guilt; and on the part of his enemies he is still holden responsible to honor, the law by carrying its decisions into execution! According to the eternal counsel he has redeemed his people, and is now gathering them from the ends of the earth, and causing them to experience the joy of his salvation. He is also, as the Mediator, now presiding as Head over all things to his church, and in that character, and in that union and connection with his church as the members of his mystical body, will he thunder upon his adversaries. He will continue in his official character to preside, and hold all the power in heaven and on earth in his hand, over all flesh, until he has given eternal life (experimentally) to as many as the Father has given him; and until all his enemies are made his foot-stool, until every soul for whom he died shall receive the consummation of glory, and all enemies shall sink down to their eternal perdition.

Third. The third question of our opponent carries a false-hood on the face of it; for the scriptures, so far from every where teaching that the resurrection of the unjust is through Christ, as the Mediator, has given no intimation of that kind anywhere. The unjust shall be raised by him, but not through him; for he is appointed Judge of the quick and the dead, as well as Mediator of the New Testament. Another palpable error is expressed in the statement of the question, viz: That the resurrection of the unjust is a reversion of the sentence of the law of God, and implies a satisfaction rendered to that law. Not even in the resurrection of the saints, and their deliverance from the curse and dominion of the law, is the sentence of the law reversed, or in any jot or tittle annulled; Christ came not to destroy the law, nor the prophets; but he declared that heaven and earth should pass away, but not one jot or tittle of the law should fail, until all was fulfilled. He came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it.

By virtue of union and relationship existing previously between Christ, the Head, and his church, the body, he appeared in the flesh, was made under the law, to do and suffer all that the law could, or did require or inflict, as the Head and identity (in law and justice) against whom the sins of his church were charged; and he did endure the sentence of the law, without the least abatement, so far as it related to him as the Head, or his members as his body.

Fourth. This fourth question is a transmigration of its predecessors, into a new shape; and as with the authority of a ruling Elder, he demands,on what principle, made known in revelation, will the sentence of the law unto death be reversed in the resurrection of the unjust, if Christ never tasted death for them; and with an air of triumph becoming one of his superior dignity, after dashing to pieces the man of straw he has so ingeniously put together, he demands, Who, of all the predestinarians that ever lived, or that now live, can answer the question? What a puzzle! Predestinarians of all ages, give place! Here comes the master spirit, a real Goliath, to defy the whole army of the Living God! Nor does his ambition suffer him to stop at challenging the armies of the Lord; but the Commander also. For God is the Predestinator of all things; and having confidence in his own decrees, is what this assailant of his power and truth denominates a Predestinarian. Let the potsherds of the earth strive with the potsherds of the earth; but who art thou, 0 ruling Elder, that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say unto him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?

Aside from the foolish, ridiculous way of triumph, assumed by his reverence, this question has already been answered in the foregoing remarks. As in the prophecy of scripture, A child shall put his hand on the hole of the asp, so have we, in this instance been permitted to do; for as there is no reversion of the law, nor of its sentence of death, so no principle is either required or given in the scriptures to that effect.

Fifth. Does not the resurrection of the just, &c., depend for its truth, upon the fact that Christ died for them, and purchased their deliverance from that curse, of the law? We answer, No. Christ has bought his people with a price; but of any other purchase that Christ has ever made, the bible saith not. He has purchased his people - they are called the flock of God which he purchased with his own blood; but all the blessings of the New Testament, including the resurrection of the just, are unbought, unencumbered, incorruptible, undefiled, and can never fade away. they are all the gift of God, freely bestowed, not of debt, but by grace.

Sixth. The sixth is another version of the same old question, and demands, How the unjust, for whom there is no Mediator’s death, satisfying the law, shall nevertheless arise from under that sentence?

As he has stated his one question in half a dozen different shapes, perhaps he may expect as many answers; but we shall dismiss this part of the subject when we have once more told him, that the resurrection of the ungodly to damnation, is no reversion of the law, nor release from its sentence.

The balance of Mr. A.’s letter is devoted to the benevolent work of informing us of what he considers the Predestinarians ignorant; and for one, professing to believe the doctrine of Predestination, we most cheerfully confess that in this part of his letter he has judged us rightly; for we do not know how the whole human family are redeemed from the law of works, and yet a large portion of them left finally to perish on account of their works. We never expect to be let into this secret short of some arminian school; for the bible holds forth no such nonsense. The old Wesleyan cavils, In regard to the atonement, we have been somewhat familiar with from our youth up; but to understand or discover any affinity his sentiment bears to the scriptures, is infinitely beyond us; excepting that the scriptures have taught us that such evil men and seducers shall come, and that they should wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived.

In turn, as it is but fair, we will state a few questions to Mr. A. and his brotherhood.

1. By what divine warrant do you denominate the restrictions placed upon Adam prior to his transgression, the law of works, in distinction from the Sinai law?

2. You say that salvation by the death of Christ, from the curse of the law, both as to the works it requires for justification and from death, as its penalty, is a universal salvation. Can you tell us for what manner of works those shall be damned, who are saved from the law of works, and from the penalty of the law, and yet have failed to be interested in that salvation which is connected with eternal glory?

3. How much, if any, are those benefited by the salvation from the works, curse and penalty of the law, by the death of Christ, who finally perish?

4. If Christ died alike for all men, and some men, as you state, shall finally perish, did Christ, or did he not die in vain for those who perish?

5. Does that salvation which you admit is connected with eternal glory, result from the death of Christ, and that redemption which he has accomplished by his death? or,

6. May not a large portion of the human family be interested in the death of Christ and his salvation, and yet be damned at last? and if so,

7. Is there any connection between the atonement of Christ and the salvation which is with eternal glory?

8. Do you with your deluded thousands believe that the salvation which is with eternal glory, is of grace, or of works? If of grace, what grace? seeing the death of Christ is in the case of so many of no effect: And may not those for whom Christ died be the recipients of his grace, and after all be damned? If of works, pray tell us how men can be either saved or damned by works, when all men, as you tell us, are redeemed from the law of works; since the scriptures declare that where there is no law, there is no transgression, and that sin is the transgression of the law. And, don’t forget it - tell us:

9. What is the ground of your hope for acceptance with God, seeing that you find no eternal glory connected with that salvation which is through the atonement of Christ, and that deliverance from the curse and penalty of that law?

10. Finally. Do you not believe that after Christ has made a full atonement, and by it satisfied the demands of the law, removed the curse, and borne the penalty, to the full and complete satisfaction of the law, that God, the Spirit, strives woos, entreats, beseeches, and exerts his utmost power to save many, who, notwithstanding all this exertion of Omnipotence, continue obstinate, and at last perish in their sins? And do you not believe that very many sinners of that sort, on whom the blood of Christ, his groans on Calvary, his intercession in heaven, and all the striving of the Spirit has failed to convert, have been converted, and many others may yet be converted by their own works, by the exertions of arminian preachers, camp-meetings, anxious-benches, *straw-pens, Sabbath Schools, Mission Societies, &c., with their kindred institutions?

Last. If the Lord has provided for, and labored to effect the salvation of any who, by their obstinate resistance of his power and grace, are not finally saved, what assurance have you arminians that these obstinate sinners will consent to be damned at last; and if the Lord has not power to control them now, what evidence have you that he will be more mighty, or they less obstinate then?

*We do not know that we use precisely the technical term to designate the little enclosure where the converts prostrate themselves, near the rostrum, at camp-meetings.

REPLY TO “A STRANGER.”

The earnest appeal of our correspondent for our judgment and advice in regard to her case is substantially the same as that to which we replied in the 18th number of our last volume; and her queries concerning doubts, glimmering hopes, distressing fears, and deep anxiety for instruction, are the expression of what is pent-up in the secret recesses of many hearts. How many with burdened hearts and contrite spirits are in the same strain, breathing their prayers to the Great Shepherd of Israel, in the language of the spouse in Song 1:7? “Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turnest aside by the flocks of thy companions?” And failing to receive a satisfactory answer, some of them have appealed to us, as did the restless spouse to the watchmen, saying, “Saw ye him whom my soul loveth (Song 3:3)?”

We have not time to answer all the inquiries of our correspondents by private epistles; nor do we deem it necessary to do so; as in answering one through our columns we answer many. Of course, we do not assume to be able to do more than give such light and counsel as with our limited ability we may be able to do; and it will ever be found as stated in the Song, the inquiries must go beyond the watchmen for light and comfort. But when appealed to, as in the present case, in the childlike spirit of our correspondent, who regarding us as a father in Israel, presuming that our long experience has qualified us in some measure for feeding the lambs of the flock; although conscious of our lack of paternal wisdom, we do not feel willing to withhold from them such light as we trust the Lord has given us for them. But we would at the same time remind them of the divine direction, “If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him (James 1:5).” It may however be given through those gifts which God has bestowed on his church for the profit of all her members. But to attend to the letter of “A Stranger”:

It is written as a strictly private or confidential letter; but as it is anonymously signed, the real name and place of the writer is only known to us; and it will, we think, not be regarded as a breach of confidence in us to publish the letter with our reply.

The exercises of the children of God should not be regarded as the private property of any one. Whatever may be the measure of the Spirit received, it is given “to profit with all.” That is, with all who are spiritual; but as the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, and cannot know them, they cannot be profited by them. But spiritual gifts and spiritual exercises may be profitable to all who are born of and taught by the Spirit of God. Our correspondent would no doubt be greatly profited if she were informed of the same exercises of which she speaks, as they are felt and experienced by thousands; and thousands, all of whom may think their own secret exercises peculiar to themselves, and all such will probably be profited by a perusal of what she has written of hers. It is consoling to the tempted and troubled ones to know that those in whom they have great confidence are tried and tempted just as they themselves are; and it is still more cheering to know that the Great High Priest of our profession was also tempted in all points as his people are, and that he knows the feelings of our infirmities, and knows how to succor the tempted.

From early childhood you have seen a beauty in Christianity, and, at times, earnestly desired an evidence of your election in Christ Jesus. This part of your experience is just like our own; for as far back in childhood as we can remember anything, our own mind was exercised in the same way; and at the first time we remember of feeling a melting, confiding emotion, which came with such relief to our mind, and enabled us to confidently rest that, vile as we saw and felt ourself to be, there would come a day before leaving this mortal state that God would for Jesus' sake pardon our sins and make us a Christian. Although unable to regard this relief as an evidence of a new birth; from that hour we saw a beauty in Christianity, and a desire to be an humble Christian; and waited anxiously, and prayed fervently for the time to come when we might feel that pungent conviction for sin, and distress of soul, which we heard others speaking of. For some three or four years we continued in this condition. Unable to realize that we had passed from death unto life, we were equally unable to bring back upon ourself the terrors of the law, or the fear of hell which we had before felt. We have met with very many who have been exercised in the same way, and who for many years have been unable to rejoice in hope, or quite despair through fear. It is not infrequently the case with the heaven-born children who by the light of life and truth, and the love of holiness which God has implanted within them, to see so much depravity in themselves, and such as they suppose Christians do not feel or have, that they are led to doubt and discredit all the evidences of a new and spiritual birth that they have ever had. And others, because they cannot tell the time when, place where, and manner how they were first convicted, and delivered, or fully to rely on such other evidences as they have, like Rachel, refuse to be comforted. It would be well for all such to examine the manner of evidence the Scriptures warrant them to rely upon. "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself (I John 5:10)." Observe, he is not himself the witness; but he hath the witness in himself. The Spirit of life, by which he loves God, loves holiness, loves the people, the laws and ordinances of the house of God, and desires to dwell in them; these bear witness with his spirit that he is born of God. This witness he hath; he has not to go back to look for it in past experience; nor to find it in comparing himself with what he supposes others are, nor yet is he to rely upon himself as a competent witness to himself. His own testimony would be as fickle and vacillating as are his frames and feelings. A witness that contradicts his own testimony would be ruled out of court. Christians are not their own witnesses, for they cannot safely rely upon their own testimony: therefore those who "measure themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise (II Corinthians 10:12)." But while we are not to depend on our own testimony, our judgment, or frames, we may implicitly rely on the witness which we have within, if we believe on the Son of God. That Spirit which beareth witness with our spirit is the witness; and it is the Spirit of truth, which the world cannot receive; and its testimony is true. Its dwelling in us is evidence that we are born of God and are not of the world; because the world cannot receive it. And wherever it dwells, its fruits are the same; they are "love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith," etc. These are not the fruits of the Christian's fleshly nature; but the fruits of the indwelling Spirit which is given him, and of which he is born again, while that which is born of the flesh, even in the Christian, is flesh; and the flesh will always war against the Spirit.

If this Spirit dwells not in us, it is not possible that we should really love God, or holiness, or hate sin; for love is of God, and he that loveth is born of God. If then we love the saints, love the truth, and love the order and ordinances of the Church of God, God himself testifies in us by his Spirit, that we are born of him. "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren." This is not speculative, it is the word and testimony of God that cannot lie.

"Rest, doubting saint, assured of this,
For God has pledged his holiness."

When a child of God arraigns his hope before the bar of carnal reason, it is impossible from such a court to obtain a true decision; for human reason is incompetent to know or appreciate the testimony in the case. All the evidence a Christian can have that is reliable must be spiritual testimony; and what can reason know of spiritual things? God's Spirit witnesses with our spirit, not with our reason or natural intellect. The revelation of spiritual things is only made to the faith which is the fruit of the Spirit, and is consequently spiritual; and whenever so revealed, it is invariably resisted by all our carnal powers; and every inch of the ground of our spiritual evidence is disputed by the law of our members which wars against the law of our mind. The carnal, or fleshly, mind is enmity against God: but the spiritual mind of the Christian is the mind of Christ. How can they possibly agree?

Let us suppose Peter and John, submitting the question of the validity of their hope, is to be decided by reason. The same objections are urged which are brought to bear against the hope of many at this day. Peter and John may say, We were thoughtless and unconcerned when Jesus came and bid us follow him. We felt an irresistible attraction, and left our fishing boat, and our father Zebedee, and followed Jesus because we could not help it. We were satisfied that Jesus had called us until we heard how Saul of Tarsus was called, and then we began to compare our experience with his, and were greatly alarmed because on careful investigation we failed to find that we had ever heard a voice from heaven as Saul did, neither were we smitten down to the ground, nor did we see a light brighter than the sun, nor were we made blind, nor were our eyes so enlightened at any time as though scales had fallen from them. Human reason would decide against Peter and John and in favor of Paul.

But Paul is led in turn to compare his evidences with those of Peter and John. Alas! For me! I am not worthy to be reckoned with them, or to be called an apostle. I am as one born out of due time, and am the least of the apostles, for I persecuted the church of God; and am even less than the least of all saints.

We do not mean to represent the apostles as reasoning thus, but merely to show that if they had conferred with flesh and blood, or yielded to carnal reasoning, they could have found as much ground for doubts and fears as any of the saints of the present day have.

Our correspondent reasons, because her parents were devout Christians, her father a faithful minister of the Lord Jesus, and her surroundings from infancy such as were calculated to inspire her with a feeling of veneration for religion, and especially as she has heard of some who were suddenly arrested, and more deeply alarmed and terrified, and more suddenly delivered than herself; might she not attribute all the religious exercises she has had to natural cases? It is thus the unbelief of all the children of God, which in the flesh will at times assail their faith and hope, and urge them to deny to themselves the comfort, and to God the glory of what he has done for them.

While we readily admit all the force and influence that can properly be claimed for tradition, and association with relatives and earthly friends whom we regard as devout and sincere Christians, we cannot believe that any such influence can produce in any unquickened child, either a hatred of sin or love of holiness. It cannot implant the fear of the Lord in any heart, nor cause one to feel and know his lost and helpless condition, or to see the justice of God in the penalties of his holy law, or really to desire to be associated with the people of God.

Our trembling friend has longed for a sudden arrest by divine power, that she might know that she had such convictions as others have had; but cannot perceive that these very convictions, such as others have had, have followed her from early childhood. And such convictions too as clearly demonstrate that she has passed from death unto life. It is not possible that any one should see, and feel, and mourn their vileness, and see a beauty in Christianity, love the people of God, love his word, his ordinances, and his cause, if they have not passed from death unto life.

Much comfort is lost to many of the children of God by an unwarranted research after the manner and circumstances of first entering into life. In all the examples given in the Scriptures, we do not find a single instance recorded of the primitive saints going back to their first experience for the present evidence that they were born of God; nor were they ever required, in order to gain the fellowship of the people of God, to the when, and where, and how, they were first arrested, how deep were their convictions, or how suddenly they were delivered. Jeremiah speaks of the time of wormwood and of gall, which his soul still remembered, which inspired hope; but the hope so inspired was that as God had delivered him from bitter trials before, he would not now forsake him in his deep distress. Paul on several occasions related the remarkable circumstances of his conversion from a persecuting Saul, breathing slaughter against the saints, to an apostle of the Lamb; but never as a reason of a present hope for life and salvation, nor as the ground on which he claimed the fellowship of the saints. These relations in every instance were made when standing before carnal rulers and judges, on trial as a prisoner. Those who came to John's baptism were required to exhibit fruits meet for repentance. Those on the day of Pentecost gladly received the gospel; gave evidence that they were born again by their joyful reception of the apostles' doctrine and fellowship. The Eunuch was required to declare his faith in the Lord Jesus; and thus in every case we shall find the evidence of being in a quickened state was required to be an evidence in them at the time. It was not said, "If thou hast believed; if thou feelest worthy;" but, "if thou believest with all thy heart." No matter how long thou hast believed. "If ye love me, keep my commandments." Observe our Lord does not say, If thou hast loved, and canst tell how long thou hast loved, or how thou was brought from hating to love; nor if thou art worthy; but "If ye love me, keep my commandments." And then leave all the rest to him. If we love him, it is proof incontestable that he has first loved us; and all whom he loves, he loves to the end.

In the absence of that deep distress which others have felt, you knew you were a sinner, yes, "a great sinner." Pray, how did you find that out? What made you so restless? Why, if you were not thirsty, did you long for that pure water of life? Has not Jesus called unto him, "Every one that thirsteth?" By the prophet, saying, "Ho! Every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." And in the last day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink," etc. And it is also written, "And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." But, say you, I don't know how I became thirsty, nor how long I have been thirsty. Nor is it necessary that you should know. He who has caused you to thirst knows all about it; he bids you drink. But again a doubt arises. I fear that I do not thirst aright. Let then your thirst be tested. If it be a spiritual thirst, nothing but the water of life will satisfy it. The springs of nature will fail, no water from your own cistern can allay it. Only the pure water of life which flows from the throne of God and the Lamb, clear as crystal, can satisfy you. If your thirst be natural, the streams of nature will suffice; but if it be spiritual, none but the living water of life and salvation will do you any good.

You have been made acquainted with the plague and pollution of your own heart. Ah, poor child! That is a lesson none but God can teach. For the heart of man is so deceitful and desperately wicked that none can know it except by revelation. God alone can know our hearts, and only he can make us know them. And this is taught by his Spirit, whose instructions are only given to those who are quickened and made spiritual. You acknowledge that the emotions of your heart are no better than the most depraved. What is this but conviction? You confess this just as any criminal would confess. True, but would any criminal confess guiltiness of which he was unconscious? It is by the law you have this knowledge of sin; the commandment came, sin revived and you died. That is, your hope for justification before God by your own purity or righteousness expired. You have no right to say nor conclude that your knowledge of your sinful state is not by the Spirit. None but the Spirit can convince us of sin, of righteousness and of judgment. You have felt that your prayers were shut out from the Lord, and you could envy those who could sensibly feel that God was angry with them. We do not understand you to desire that God should be angry with you; but you covet a kind of conviction that will be sensibly felt; something that will arouse your passions and terrify your mind. That seems to be your trouble. You have marked out in your mind a way in which you desire to be led. But God has a way of his own, and will “Lead the blind in a way which they know not, and in paths which they have not known.” Our passions, or the senses of our nature, are not capable of comprehending the ways or works of God. Having ourself been in the same condition for some three years, waiting for a conviction and contrition of spirit which we supposed must come before we had a right to indulge a hope in God, we did also covet the anguish of soul which we saw in others; but at last were taught to rely upon what God had wrought in us years before. When a living child throws away the evidence which God has given him in order to try to obtain a better or a brighter one, he has at last to fall back on what he had before, and trust himself in the hands of his God and Savior. These rebellious feelings of our nature are not to be gratified. The light of life which God has caused to shine in us, the darkness of our natural reasoning faculties comprehendeth not. If we could walk by sight we would need no faith; and hope that is seen is not hope; for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for; but if we hope for that which we see not, then do we with patience wait for it. (See Romans 8:24,25.)

That slavish fear that God will withdraw his protection, and that you will finally be lost is the legitimate consequence of your slowness to believe and trust in God. The Israelites could not enter into the promised land of rest because of unbelief, and it is just so with the spiritual, anti-typical Israelites, when nursing and cherishing our doubts and fears. If all that God has done for you in giving you eyes to see your lost condition and utter helplessness, and in enabling you at times to hope in him, is to be under rated and rejected because you have such an experience as it has pleased him to give you, and not such as your judgment would accept, how can you expect to rest? If you were not quickened and made alive by his Spirit, you would have no such trouble; for none but such as the Lord loves does he chasten. Hypocrites and false professors have no such trouble; they will tell you they have all the religion they work for; if they wanted more they would work harder. But God has in wisdom ordained that his children shall live and walk by faith, and not by sight. If we can really trust all that we have and all we are to God, that confidence will relieve us from all trouble about a future state. If we are redeemed from death and hell by the precious blood of Christ, we are not our own, we are bought with a price. Our life is secure with Christ in God, and our blessed Savior has assumed all the care and responsibility of our final and immortal happiness. It is not our business henceforth what will become of us. Our Surety has pledged his word that he will raise us up at the last day; and as he lives, so shall all his people live with him. The care and safety of our eternal inheritance God will not trust to us. He careth for us. His charge to us is to trust in the name of the Lord and stay upon our God. The sympathies of your nature, stirred up by the death of a godly father, could have nothing to do in quickening or making your spiritually alive. Such sympathies are common to all men; they arouse our tenderest passions, and make us resolve to serve the Lord; but leave us to feel as though we were not mortal. Such excitements are quite unreliable. But faith looks away from self to God, to Christ, and sometimes heeds not whether we are in or out of the body. And it is a truth that the more we enjoy the presence of God and feel an assurance of faith, the less we shall think about ourselves. Having committed the keeping of our souls to God, as to a faithful Creator, we at once should relinquish that charge to him and pursue the course of obedience to his commands which he has enjoined on all who love him.

Again, your trouble arose from fearing that you were not of the elect. What have you to do with that matter? You can only make your calling and election sure so far as the development of it is manifested in evidence, by working out that salvation which God has wrought in you with fear and trembling. Our happiness and rest lies not in questioning what God has the entire charge of; but rather in gazing, wondering and admiring the wonderful works of God, especially his works of salvation. Our greatest troubles arise from worrying about what God has settled for us in the ancients of eternity, while our sweetest comforts flow from confidently trusting all our eternal interests to his faithful care.

In that sweet moment, when returning from a visit to your father's grave, your cup was filled to its brim, and you had to acknowledge that you were a subject of grace, a child of God, a Christian. Then you tasted how sweet it is to believe; then believing, you entered into rest, and as long as you believed, your joy was full; but how soon the tempter came to dash your cup of happiness by unbelief. You had not been exercised like others. What of that? Neither are all others exercised in these respects as you were. It is not essential that all should be exercised alike in regard to circumstances, but there are thousands who will read your relation who can testify that substantially they have been exercised as you have. Seven years you have been held between hope and despair. Abuse, quarrel with, and dispute your hope as you may, you cannot annul it. It came not at your bidding; it will not depart by your command. When, by severe discipline, you shall learn to look more to your Redeemer and less to yourself, you will more sweetly appreciate its blessedness, and rejoice in it as an anchor of your soul, both sure and steadfast, entering into that within the vail.

In conclusion, suffer the word of exhortation. Acknowledge with gratitude what God has done for you. Bow your neck to the yoke of Jesus; learn of him who is meek and lowly, and you shall find rest to your soul.

"Let not doubtings make you linger,
Nor of fitness fondly dream;
All the fitness he requireth
Is to feel your need of him;
This he gives you: this he gives you;
'Tis the Spirit's rising beam."

We have made this reply very lengthy, and perhaps too much so to be interesting to all our readers, but in the hope that what we have written may be of some service to many of that large class of trembling and bewildered pilgrims, who feel like our correspondent, that they are strangers, we submit it.

REPLY TO ANOTHER STRANGER.

January 19, 1868.

Elder Gilbert Beebe - Dear Sir: - Permit this feeble expression of one who hopes she feels thankful to you for your reply to "A Stranger," and to that stranger for the brief relation of his or her troubles. How well does at least one fellow mortal know that state of feeling which have ever been at a loss to name - not hope, and yet not absolute despair - sometimes a kind of vibration between the two. How willing I felt when I finished your reply, to obey the exhortation at its close, trusting to him all my doubts of unworthiness. But alas! How many dark doubts bestrew the pathway that leads to its accomplishment, if, indeed, I shall ever have strength to reach it. How often have I, like this one, longed to appeal to you, or some other of the watchmen, for information in regard to my case, but have refrained because I believed that if God was not his own interpreter, the most lucid and gratifying reply to my questions would not afford me the relief I so desired. How precious also the letter you refer to in the LW" number, and how often reperused! So many of my own thoughts and feelings are embodied in it. Yet in them all there seems to be something a little more hopeful than in mine; none seem quite so dead, and I am confident I could not give full expression to the depraved emotions of my own heart.

But there is one thought which I had for a long time believed peculiar to myself; one which I deemed too base for utterance. I once heard it referred to by one esteemed by me, but beloved by you, yet not entirely explained away. I know it is carnal reasoning, which has no claim to gratification; but I cannot free myself from its power to annoy. It is this. If God has written upon our hearts his commands, where do we get the power to disobey? We cannot go forward in a single obedient step except we go in his strength, and can we exercise that strength at pleasure? I feel very much like a guilty criminal in writing this, I feel as if the rebuke, “Nay, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?” was applicable to me; but this is not more base than the other emotions of my heart, which is “so deceitful and desperately wicked,” it seems to me that no one else with such a heart would dream of cherishing a hope.

Sometimes, if it is not wrong to enter the lists with carnal reasoning, would you please permit an answer to this thought to be embodied in some of your remarks to your tempted and doubting readers. I do not ask or wish a lengthy reply, and do not wish any of this published. I will cheerfully bide your time, and not ascribe to you any censure, should you permit this request to remain unnoticed.

May God in mercy grant you strength to discharge the arduous duties of your position is the wish (can I say prayer - I who so seldom feel to have an audience at the throne of grace) of Another Stranger.

We have received many private letters of inquiry from this class of strangers and pilgrims who manifest a strong desire to know whether they have indeed a right to hope that they have that kind of experience which distinguish the children of God from those who are dead in trespasses and sins. In our former attempts to reply to those anxious and earnest inquirers, we have but imperfectly pointed out what we understand to be the most reliable and demonstrative evidences of being in a quickened state. But all the evidences are of a spiritual nature, and consequently are only presented to, and perceived by, the faith of those to whom they belong. If it had been the pleasure of God that his children, while here in the flesh, should walk by sight, our perceptive faculties would have been so changed by our new and spiritual birth as to qualify us so to walk. But we are told in the word that we walk by faith and not by sight. It is this ordination of our heavenly Father that even the heaven-born children are so very slow to comprehend. All the reasoning faculties of our natural or fleshly mind are prone to dispute such testimony as they cannot understand. Hence as soon as we are born again, a warfare begins between the flesh and the spirit. To that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit, the Savior is revealed as our Savior; our faith receives this revelation, is satisfied with it, and then, "Believing, we rejoice, with joy that is unspeakable, and full of glory." Faith rising above the infidelity, darkness, fears and carnality of our old depraved nature, hold all our powers and reasonings in subjection, and we are then quite apt to think we shall be troubled with these old corruptions of our carnal nature no more. Faith holds her empire in and over us, and we say, as did the Psalmist in his prosperity, "I shall never be moved; Lord, by thy favor thou hast made my mountain to stand strong." But alas! How very soon he was compelled to add, "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled (Psalm 30:6,7)." The wisdom and goodness of God in dealing in this way with his children can only be spiritually understood, even by the saints. Our turbulent and fretful passions impatiently cry out, "Lord, why hast thou caused us to err from thy ways, and hardened our hearts from thy fear?" We conclude that if we have known anything experimentally of the mercy of the Lord, he has now forgotten to be gracious, and that his mercy is clean gone forever more. Such murmurings and lamentations never came from one who is not born of God, nor did they ever emanate or proceed from the faith of the child of God.

To these two propositions allow us to call the attention of those “strangers” who are searching for the footsteps of the flock of Christ.

First. Those who never knew the Lord have no desire for a knowledge of his ways. They can no more feel the sorrows, doubts, fears and temptations of the children of God than they can know their joys. “The heart knoweth his own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy (Proverbs 14:10).” We cannot mourn nor lament the absence of that of which we have no knowledge. Hence the impatience of which we speak is unknown, unfelt and unfeared by those who have never received from God the implantation of his Spirit in their hearts.

Second. The other proposition is equally true. Although none but the redeemed and heaven-born children of God are plagued with the doubts, fears, trials and temptations which cause them to murmur, fret and rebel; yet all these rebellious feelings arise from the fleshly nature of these vessels of mercy, who have received the word, the spirit and the life of the spiritual birth. From that implanted life, that heaven-born spirit, no particle of this murmuring and rebellion can possibly proceed. “It cannot sin because it is born of God.” Hence that faith which is in them always triumphs over the world; and this is the victory which overcomes the world, even their faith. We cannot conceive of a victory where there has been no conflict. That faith which shall ultimately triumph over all the corruptions of the flesh does encounter the most violent and determined opposition of the flesh, in every child of God, while in this mortal tabernacle; but this conflict is confined to them, and was never felt in any but the children of our God. Two parties or opposing principles must exist to produce a conflict. The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other. Here then are the belligerent elements; in the one dwells no good thing; in the other dwells no evil thing. The one is life; the other is death. The one is spiritual; the other is natural; the one is born of the flesh, and is flesh; the other is born of the Spirit, and is spirit. One loves God, truth and holiness, and desires above all things to serve the law of God; the other loves sin and self, and hates God, is enmity against God, not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. In every Shulamite the company of these two armies is found. We have no right to recognize as a subject of the new birth any one in whom these opposing elements do not exist. Nor is it possible that both these elements can exist in any one who is not born of the flesh, and of the Spirit; for this good reason, the one is flesh, and the other is spirit. If we are controlled alone by the flesh, we shall die; but if we, through the spirit mortify the deeds of the flesh, we shall live. To be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace.

Let us ask "Another Stranger," Have you not witnessed the truth of this apostolic declaration? When from the spirit which God has given you, in your new birth, faith as its fruit has led you to believe in God, rely upon the blood and righteousness of Christ alone for justification and acceptance with God, when this has been your case, however short have been the seasons, has it not always led you into the enjoyment of life and peace? When faith has sensibly triumphed over all your doubts and fears, all selfish reasoning has been silenced, and instead of nursing your unbelief, you have felt unreservedly to commit the keeping and safety of your soul to God, and bid defiance to the powers of darkness to rend you from his protection. And, dear child, at such seasons of triumph did you not forget about your own self? Like Paul, when caught up to heaven, in his rapturous vision, whether in the body or out of the body he could not tell. It was enough at that time for him that God knew all about his body, as well as about his spirit. In an experience of almost three-score years, the writer of this reply has never been without the most depressing and gloomy fears, when his attention has been engrossed in anxious inquiries as to his own personal interest in the things of the Spirit of God.

"When I turn my eyes within,
All is dark, and vain, and wild;
Fill'd with unbelief and sin,
Can I deem myself a child?"

These anxieties about a personal interest are selfish, and always arise from our fleshly nature, and show a lamentable lack of confidence in God. Have we, as Christians, ever been instructed to look for the evidence of our spiritual standing with God in our fleshly nature? Paul himself could find nothing there to encourage his hope; for in him, that is, in his flesh, there dwelt no good thing, and with his flesh he served the law of sin; and his flesh was like ours, so very destitute of spiritual life that he pronounced it "the body of this death," making him a wretched man, as far as that was concerned; but faith, triumphant faith, broke forth in grateful praise. "I thank God, through Jesus Christ my Lord," there was deliverance secured. It is true that every one that is born of God has the witness in himself; but what is it? Not the flesh, for the flesh is not a truthful witness, and all who are "the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." Why then call up such a witness? One in whom you have no confidence? Why seek the living among the dead? But though the heaven-born have nothing reliable in the flesh, yet they all have an infallible witness in them; it is the spirit which beareth witness with their spirit that they are born of God. They are sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, and have the earnest of their heavenly inheritance in themselves; not in their flesh, for nothing good is there, but in the spirit that dwelleth in them.

Now if we inquire with the Psalmist, “Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Why art thou disquieted within me?” While the conflict between the old man and the new man, the flesh and the spirit is so severe, how prone we are to conclude there is but a step between us and death. Our old nature, which we once thought was cleansed and purged from depravity, and our natural faculties, which we verily thought were by being born over again, or by some other means, had become pure and spiritual, like frightful ghosts arise and show all the corruption they ever possessed.

Our vile affections in full vigor, our passions, stare upon us in malice, wrath, strife, seditions, covetousness, jealousy, selfishness, inordinate desires, and in all the works of the flesh. Amazed, we are petrified with horror. Where now is that change that we thought had so thoroughly changed our nature, and made spiritual our every faculty? Every vestige of hope arising from such delusion is cut off - it dies. And God grant it may be forever buried. We never shall know the sweetness of a hope in the living God until all confidence in the flesh is slain. We do not say that every one who has a good hope through grace may not enjoy it, as an anchor of his soul, sure and steadfast, and entering into that within the veil; but we do say that all the confidence we are permitted to retain in ourselves, that is, in our flesh, detracts from the sweetness of that hope, which is in God. “Hope thou in God,” says the inspired psalmist. He is the “Hope of Israel, and the Savior thereof in time of trouble.” Hope thou in God, not in self, or in any vain thing. “For I shall yet praise him who is the health of thy countenance, and my God.” The only hope that we can rely upon in the day of trial is Christ in you the hope of glory. “In hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised before the world began.” The more perfect enjoyment of our hope in God depends on the triumphs which our faith in God achieves over our doubts and fears. If we could always feel and realize the triumphs of the faith of the Son of God in us, as it was felt by that illustrious host of patriarchs, prophets and saints presented in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews; like them it would divest us of much of that selfishness which is so peculiar to our earthly nature, and triumphing over self, we would forget ourselves, and count not our own lives dear unto ourselves. The brightest flame of heavenly fire that ever made our hearts burn in love and gratitude to God, and filled our hearts with joy unspeakable, and full of glory, has always been felt by us when we have been thinking the very least of ourselves, when we have lost sight of our own individuality, and our faith has entered within the intervening veil which divides between earth and heaven.

Our anxious correspondent seems familiar with those "vibrations from fear to hope, and from hope to fear, which were described by the writer referred to, and also by every child of God while here in the flesh; yet because hope is opposed by fear, faith contested by unbelief, and joy succeeded by grief, she is led to count her trials and temptations as something strange, as though some strange thing had happened to her. These alternations are so universally felt by all who are born of the Spirit, that no experience could be recognized as genuine Christian experience in the total absence of them. Young converts may be so elated with the first manifestations of the pardoning love of God and the joys of his salvation, that for a time it may seem to them that their entire nature has become changed, that all their troubles are forever gone. How long they may feel this uninterrupted joy and gladness before the corruptions of the depraved nature arises, is as God may direct. There are some whose early joys are unspeakable and full of glory; but there are others whose spiritual birth is equally unquestionable, who have never felt the ecstasy of that joy as others have; nor can they tell the precise time and place when and where they were delivered from bondage and set at liberty. It has not been the pleasure of the Lord that all his children should, in every circumstance connected with their experience, be led in the same way. The manner of Paul's first exercise differed widely from many others, but still there are marks by which every child of God may be known as having passed from death unto life. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted; blessed are the meek; blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness." These are some of the evidences on which we are authorized to rely. The question is, with us, Are we poor in spirit? Do we mourn? Do we hunger and thirst after righteousness? It is not so important that we should be able to tell when and how we first came to see and feel our poverty, or how long we have mourned, or when the pride of our hearts was subdued, or when we first had a hungering and thirsting for righteousness. These are spiritual fruits, and if we have them, then are we "blessed." "If ye love me," says Jesus, "keep my commandments." His commandments are only applicable to those who love him. He is not here speaking of the commandments given to Israel in the flesh, or in thunder tones proclaimed from Sinai; but the commandments issued from his throne in Sion, and written in the hearts of his spiritual subjects. Do we love him? How long we have loved him is not the question. If we love him, then his commandment to follow him is addressed to us, and it is our privilege and our duty to obey him. When Paul received this evidence, "Straightway he conferred not with flesh and blood." "Obedience is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." In reply to the question, If God has written his law upon our hearts, whence do we get the power to disobey? From the same source whence Paul and all others of God's children do. He attributes it to the warfare. "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would (Galatians 5:17)."

"For we know that the law is spiritual; but I am carnal, sold under sin. For that which I do, I allow not; for what I would, that do I not; but that I hate that do I." "Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me; I find then a law that when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man (Romans 7:14-22)." The power or law to disobey the law which we love after the inward man is the law or power of sin which is in our members, in our flesh; this power is so great as to disable the saints to do the things which they desire. Although the spirit indeed is willing, the flesh is weak. It is our nature to sin, for sin dwelleth in our flesh, and all disobedience to God riseth by the power of sin, which is in our members, causing us to do the things which we hate, and preventing us from doing the things which we would. While therefore our fleshly powers cannot aid us to obey the spiritual law which is written in our hearts, it can bring us into captivity to the law or power of sin, which is in our members. Grace must abound to usward and the Spirit enable us to obey, but the indwelling sin of our nature requires no aid to disobey the commandments of Christ. Disobedience is but a failure to do what we are commanded to do, and although grace shall ultimately triumph over all our fleshly propensities, and God will finally give all his children the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord, yet it is his pleasure to leave us sometimes to feel the depravity of our nature, to be overcome by it, that we may the better appreciate his power and grace in our deliverance. Very true, "We cannot go forward in a single obedient step except we go in his strength." But our own strength is weakness, and therefore in it we always fail to obey. We cannot at our pleasure exercise the strength of God, or that strength by which alone we obey God; for if we could, we then could no longer say: "How to perform that which is good I find not." We say to this other stranger, In what school did you learn that you could not take a step in the pathway of holiness by any strength of your own? What has made you feel the sinfulness of those emotions of which you complain? How did you discover that your heart is deceitful and desperately wicked? Does it seem to you that one with such a heart would dream of cherishing a hope? Well, we frankly confess, that if your heart did not to you appear so very vile, we could cherish no hope that you had ever been taught of God. It is only under his mighty hand and his tuition we can ever know, and feel, and mourn the deceitfulness and wickedness of our own hearts. But every one that hath learned of the Father cometh unto Christ. And him that cometh to Christ, he will in no wise cast out.

REPLY TO BROTHER DRAKE.

BROTHER Drake's communication, commenced on the 36th page, contains some inquiries and remarks which a due respect for him as a brother, a correspondent, and a patron of labor, requires that we should reply to. He has reduced the general exception which he took in number ten, of volume thirteen, to our editorial course, to our allowing the discussion of the School Question a place in our columns, for this reason, he "cannot see where any good can arise to the church of Christ by the discussion of any system of state policy in a paper devoted to the interests of Zion."

Does brother Drake therefore arrive at the conclusion that the Zion of God has no interests in the policy which may be adopted by the legislature of the state? Is it a matter of small moment with the sons of Zion, whether we be allowed the free enjoyment of our religious rights, or be proscribed? Whether the responsibility which our Creator has imposed on parents to educate their own offspring, be left where God has placed it, or we quietly submit to the usurpation of it by legal enactments? If so, we shall certainly differ widely upon the subject. If we have no interest in the policy of state government, it then is no matter of joy and gratitude to God, that we are allowed to worship God according to our own sense of propriety, or that we are not now wandering about in sheep skins, and in goat skins, in dens and caverns of the earth, to evade the merciless persecution of the enemies of God and truth.

Brother Drake dissents from our understanding of Paul's exhortation, that prayer and intercession &c., be made for those in authority, for "if it was right in the days of the apostles, it is right in this day." It is rather remarkable that our brother should contend that an exhortation to pray for kings and monarchal rulers is as obligatory on christians of America as it was on the saints who lived under such constituted authorities. By reference to our remarks in the 10th No. of Vol. XIII., the reader will find our position to be thus stated:

"The condition of the primitive disciples under monarchal governments was by no means similar to ours; the responsibility of a monarchal government naturally rests upon the monarch; and hence Paul exhorted that prayer &c. be made by the saints for them, that their laws should not oppress the saints; this was the only alternative for the saints so situated. But with us we have not to pray God to so control the reign of some proud and haughty earthly potentate as to permit us to lead peaceable lives in honesty and godliness. But in our country, every individual Old School Baptist, who enjoys the right of citizenship, is responsible for those rights and privileges which a bountiful God has favored us with; for us, therefore, passively to suffer the blighting mildew of an anti-christian clergy or laity to entwine its serpentine folds around our government, without an effort to expose their guilty fraud and hypocrisy, is, in our judgment, to treat with criminal disregard the apostolic in junction, 'But if thou mayest be free use it rather.' – l Cor. vii. 21. It is for the people of this country to decide whether they will be free in the sense of this text, and so far as religious liberty is concerned, none have more at stake than the Old School Baptists; and it is only where our religious liberty is, or is likely to be encroached upon, that we have sounded, or intend to sound, an alarm through the columns of the SIGNS."

This is the position which we took, and from which our esteemed brother dissents, and as a reason why he dissents, he mentions the case of Hazael and of Cæsar, and speaks of the common depravity and tendency of human nature to corruption, &e. It hardly seems to require serious argument to show that a republican form of government is very different from a regal form, as to the responsibility they impose on christians living under them. The primitive christians had nothing to do in the election or appointment of kings to rule over them; but they were released from bearing the responsibility of misrule, and their only appeal was to he made to heaven, to pray for them, that they may be so directed in divine providence as not to infringe the peaceable enjoyment of the religious rights of the saints. But in a republican government the sovereign power is with the people, and the people are responsible for the use or abuse of that power, christians and citizens equally with others, and are as responsible for every corruption of government as any other class.

It is not sufficient that we endure persecution which we cannot avert, but it is imperiously our duty as christians to cast our suffrage against every system of proscription and persecution. And the minister of the gospel, or the private christian, who shrinks back from his duty, and because he cannot shield the church of God, refuses to take any part in the affairs of state, when corruptions are evidently gathering thick, and systems of persecution are maturing, becomes himself a persecutor of the saints. To illustrate: Suppose a project is on foot by certain clerical interests of our country to bring about a union of church and state, their movements are at first slow and insiduous, but gathering strength and confidence, they press on with bolder and more rapid strides; we as christians see the sword coming, but fold our hands, and say we have nothing to do with the policy of the state, and by reason of this pretended neutrality, persecution actually breaks out, and the blood of the saints is made to flow; those christians who refused to use their suffrage to prevent it are as guilty of the persecution as those who projected the design. In the providence of God, we are now allowed to vote for magistrates and legislators, and when our public representatives do not legislate righteously we have the constitutional right to address them with our remonstrances and petitions, and if we find no redress we may appeal to the ballot-box; and if after having done our duty in what God has placed in our power, we fail to defend and secure our rights, we are released from the responsibility, but not other wise. Should brother Drake see his neighbor's house on fire, having power to put out the fire, and refuse to do so, he is as guilty as though he had himself applied the match. Should he see his child which God had committed to his parental charge, exposed to the fangs of a deadly viper, and through his neglect to secure the child it is bitten, poisoned and dies, who will fail to call him the murderer? If persecution arises in our country, to whom shall it be charged? Brother Drake may say, to the legislature who pass the oppressive laws. Who are responsible for the character of our legislators? In all republican governments the people are responsible, and christians are a part of the people. Let brother Drake, and let those western ministers who stand neutral in regard to the policy of state, beware that they do not incur the guilt of persecution. We assure them it will be poor comfort to the saints when thrust into prison, or led out to the stake, to be informed that their brethren, when having the power and right, refused to lift a finger to prevent their persecution. We will suppose three or more individuals enter into partnership in mercantile business; we will call the firm "Shem, Ham & Japheth." Shem is a christian, his partners make no profession. Ham and Japheth form a scheme to defraud the public, and communicate their plan to Shem for his concurrence, but Shem replies, "Gentlemen, do as you please in this matter. I will not oppose you, for as a christian I do not feel at liberty to arrest the tide of iniquity which prevails. If you succeed, I will share with you the plunder; I will remain in the firm, and I will consent to whatever you do, for I am a christian, and I trust in God alone," &c. Will brother Drake step forth and justify the conduct of Shem? We think not. As a community or commonwealth, we form but one general firm, and although as christians we may be in the minority, like Shem in the supposed firm, yet if we act as we have supposed him to have acted, shall we be less guilty? We leave brother Drake to determine.

Brother Drake inquires, "Does brother Beebe suppose that he can shield the church from trials, tribulation, and persecution, by showing how political demagogues usurped the reigns of government in former times, and then persecuted the church?" By no means. But does it therefore follow that we may lay aside our armor, and forbear to expose the hidden things of dishonesty? We think not. We are commanded in the word to resist evil, but we are no where in the scriptures encouraged to believe that we can exterminate it from the world, or from our own nature. If brother Drake has discovered in us that amount of vain confidence in our ability to shield the church of God, he has seen what we have never felt. So far from it, we have felt conscious of our inability to shield ourself, and that if left unshielded by him who is known in Zion as a strong tower, we must be for ever lost. Yet in this very thing brother Drake thought he saw analogy between us and Peter, when he said that his Lord and Master should not be crucified. "And brother Beebe seemed to be anxious to interpose his shield between the church and persecution." We were unconscious of having any other shield than the "shield of faith," with which the apostle says we shall be able to quench the fiery darts of Satan, and so far as we know our own heart, our faith in Christ has never led us to contemplate a release of the church of God from persecution. That God has chosen his people in a furnace of affliction we firmly believe, and he has also said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation," therefore we look for the tribulation, and that as many as will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution. So firmly do we believe this, that we deem it inexpedient to court persecution, or to become, directly or indirectly the persecutors of one another. Brother Drake says to brother West, that he charges no wrong on us for opposing the Prussian School System of this state, but he does object to a discussion of that system in the SIGNS.

Where shall the line be drawn for us to be regulated by in our editorial course? One brother objects to our publishing articles in which the evidence of an approaching connection of the civil and ecclesiastical powers of our country seems inevitable, because we cannot prevent it with our shield; another wishes to exclude everything from our columns in which all do not perfectly agree in judgment. Some wish for short articles and some for long ones. Some are partial to doctrinal subjects, others would prefer less matter of a doctrinal character. It is, on the whole, not exactly the pleasantest thing in the world to be an editor. If we be required to sheath our sword, muffle our drum, ground our arms, and cease to expose anti-christ, because we have not power to sink her like the millstone to rise no more, to gratify such of our friends, we should violate the pledge we gave in our prospectus, and render our periodical an unwelcome visitor to more than nine-tenths of our subscribers.

It is painful to be compelled to differ from our brethren, but, it is not to be expected that in every thing we shall be perfectly agreed in our judgment. The School System of our state has become abominably corrupt, and is seized on by anti-christ as a convenient engine for the execution of their wicked designs against the church of God, and the equal rights of mankind, and we feel as imperiously called on to hunt out and expose the man of sin, when taking shelter here, as when in the prosecution of any other of the works of darkness.

Brother Drake we trust will take what we have written in kindness, as we have no other design than to bring the subject fairly and in its true light before our brethren. We are by no means hurt with what he has written, and we as confident1y rely alone on God to give victory to the people of the saints, and as fully discard all confidence in the flesh as he appears to. In regard to the general strife of party politics, we say as we said before to brother Drake, we will have nothing to do with the discussion of them in our paper; but the subjects which we give place to the discussion of in our columns are those in. which our Old School brethren of all political party distinctions are agreed, and in which they have but one interest.

REPLY TO BROTHER E. D. VARNES.

The two passages on which brother Varnes desires our views are these: “Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone (James 2:17);” and “What then? Notwithstanding every way, whether in pretense, or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice (Philippians 1:18).”

In the first of these passages, the apostle James is treating upon the practicable effects of faith by which its nature is to be tested. If the faith be genuine living faith, its vitality will be known by its activity, and its action will be in harmony with its nature. The apostle seems to admit that there are different kinds of faith; the faith of the Son of God, which works by love and purifies the heart, is a living faith. Being born of God, it partakes of the nature and vitality of its heavenly Author. Christ is the author and finisher of our faith if we have the faith of God’s elect. This faith being born of God, though it encounters the world, and is opposed by the world, will overcome the world, and triumph ultimately over all opposition. “And this is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith.” Natural faith, or the faith of the world, has no conflict with the world, and will not overcome the world, being in agreement with the world. But the faith of the Son of God, by which the children of God live, walk and stand, is essentially different in its origin, nature and development, from the faith of men, and from the faith of devils. Paul says of the living faith of the gospel, “And the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me and gave himself for me (Galatians 2:20).” Hence we live by faith; not by a dead or nominal faith, but by a vital principle, even by the faith of the Son of God; a faith pertaining to his Sonship, because begotten and born of God, it partakes of his Sonship, of his spirit, purity and power. It can never therefore be dead or inactive. Those who possess it may not always feel its mighty power, because so far as they are led, or live after the flesh, they shall die, or fail to feel and enjoy its life inspiring power. They not only live by faith, as we have shown, but also walk by faith, not by sight. To walk by faith is to move on confidently trusting in God, when all is dark and inscrutable to our sight or to our natural judgment. As when Abraham staggered not at the promise which seemed so unreasonable and so unnatural; yet he staggered not at the promise, because God had made it, and his faith inspired implicit confidence in, and unfaltering reliance on, God. At God's command he went forth, not knowing whether he went; it was enough for him to know that God had commanded; and in the same confidence Enoch also walked with God. And all the saints shall know that in all their walks with God, they walk by faith, and not by sight, having no confidence in the flesh. The nature, power and vitality of the faith of the Son of God is always the same; but we only enjoy it experimentally as the fruit of the Spirit, and as the gift of God; we only enjoy its saving manifestations when our spirit, which is born of the Spirit, triumphs over the flesh; and we are made fruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. All who have this faith in them will assuredly know of the Christian warfare; for the flesh, and all our fleshly powers, are as full of infidelity as they ever were. All the doubts, fears and unbelief that rises in opposition to our implicit confidence in God comes from our flesh, and inclines us to endeavor to walk by sight and objects strenuously against taking a step in the dark. This conflict of flesh and spirit, nature and grace, faith and unbelief, is more or less illustrated in every child of God. Faith points the new-born child of God to the yoke of Jesus, to his example and precepts, and bids him move on in obedience to the Savior's great commands, saying, "Why tarriest thou? Arise and be baptized," etc. But unbelief says, Better not be too fast; wait till this dark cloud shall pass; till you are satisfied that you are a fit subject for the ordinances and worthy to take a place in the church of God. Chided for his disobedience or tardiness in following his Lord by the spirit of faith, which relies alone on Jesus, the convert sees a beauty in the lovely ordinance; while unbelief insists that he shall wait until he has sufficient light to walk by sight. Carnal reason too, believes that it is safer to walk by sight than to walk by faith; but the faith of the Son of God in the believer looks through the thickest cloud, and sees with delight the things which are within the veil, whether the forerunner is for us entered; and fixing its steadfast eye on him who has entered within the veil, desires to fly away from all human reason and carnal understanding, and be governed in all things by him.

"Through floods or flames, where Jesus leads,
To follow where he directs."

Looking steadfastly not on the things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal (or things of time); but the things which are not seen are eternal; and therefore only looked upon by faith.

But we presume our brother Varnes desires our views on the apostle's declaration, "Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." We have already intimated our firm conviction that the faith of the Son of God, which all who are born of the Spirit receive in that birth, is a vital and undying principle, which is never dead; nevertheless that vital principle in us may be dead practically, in the sense in which the apostle James has illustrated. "If a brother or sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed, and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful for the body, what doth it profit?" If one of you who are recognized as brethren who possess the faith of the Son of God should thus treat a needy brother or sister, as to practical profit to the needy brother or sister, your faith would be dead to them in that particular sense. The life of genuine faith would fail to appear. Or, to express in other words, what we understand to be the meaning of the apostle, a professed disciple of the Lord Jesus, to treat a brother or sister in that heartless way would deny the faith, and act in opposition to all its teachings. Whatever we may believe, or whatever faith we may have, if it produces no action, is practically dead or dormant. To illustrate the apostle's meaning, he speaks of Abraham, and of Rahab the harlot. Abraham believed God and his faith was perfected, or demonstrated by his obedience to God. Rahab the harlot believed that the city of Jericho, in which she lived, was to be given to the Hebrews; but her faith, however strong and sincere, would neither have profited her nor the Hebrews, if it had not been practically demonstrated by her receiving the spies, and concealing them, and sending them out another way. It is only in this sense that we understand our apostle to be speaking of faith being dead; that is, destitute of practicable results. What if we have faith to believe there is one God, if we do not love and serve him, devils are equally orthodox, for they also believe and tremble.

Again, we may understand James as speaking of the doctrine of the gospel; what though we vainly believe it to be the truth of God that shall stand forever, what practicable benefit have we from our correct, or orthodox, profession of faith, if we do not walk in it, and contend earnestly for it, as it was once delivered to the saints? All kinds of faith must be made manifest by works. The husbandman has faith in the order of nature, seed time and harvest, and his faith inclines him to plow his fields and sow his grain, because he has faith that the harvest will come when he shall reap, if he faints not.

In the application of the admonitions of the apostle to the children of God, we are not to understand that to profess faith in God, in Christ, while in works we deny him, such profession can be accepted by the saints as an evidence that those who so profess are entitled to their fellowship or confidence. The disciple who says he has faith in Jesus must show his faith, that is the evidence of it, by following him. In the commission to the apostles, as a mark by which they should know the called and quickened people of God, Jesus said to them, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Not merely he that believeth. Living faith will lead its possessor to obey, as well as to believe. How many there are in the vicinity of all our churches who give us every other evidence that they believe and love the truth, and love the people of God. The sincerity of their convictions and their love, we cannot discredit; but their faith is dead to us, that is, it is unavailing, because it is alone, not manifested by obedience to the gospel of the Son of God. Their faith is not so strong as to subdue their doubts, fears and unbelief; nor is their love so ardent as to draw them with willing feet to walk in the footsteps of our glorious Leader. "If ye love me, (says Jesus) keep my commandments." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another." But where these evidences of love and obedience are not found, whatever of faith or love a person may have, it is dormant, or we may say, dead, as to the production of the true and legitimate fruits of vitality. In short, the church of God must judge of the vitality of one's faith, by his conduct. If one says he loves the cause, but on every occasion will betray it, that he believes our doctrine, but will not walk in it; that he regards us as the church of God, but walks with, builds up, and strengthens the hands of our adversaries; we may safely say to such, as the apostle has said, "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." But we will pass to consider the text in Philippians 1:18.

In this text the apostle expresses his joy that Christ was preached, and in a variety of ways, and from different and conflicting motives; some even of envy and strife, and some of good will, or with pure motives. The one preaches Christ of contention, not sincerely, but maliciously, designing thereby to add affliction to Paul's bonds. Others of love, knowing that Paul was set for the defense of the gospel. Of all this, Paul says, "What then?" What if the enemies of the gospel are filled with envy and feel maliciously inclined towards Paul, and towards all the ministers of Christ who like Paul preach of love and good will? Shall their enmity, envy and malice retard the dissemination of the gospel? By no means. They can do nothing against the truth, but for it. Their wrath shall praise God, and the remainder of their wrath God will restrain. What then? If some preach Christ even of envy and strife, and others of good will, and some of contention, to afflict Paul, "Notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretense, or in truth, Christ is preached;" the tidings are spread far and wide, and the great purpose of God in publishing the gospel in every land is subserved; and in that Paul rejoiced; yea, and would rejoice.

The words of the apostle seem to imply that there were some preachers who really preached the gospel, and to the edification and profit of their hearers, who did it from the basest of motives, even from envy and strife, and with a design to add affliction to Paul's bonds; and we have no right to doubt that such was the case then, and that there are even now some who with no better motives, have really preached Christ, and that to the profit of the saints, whose hearts have never been warmed by the love of God, who in their preaching have designed to gain the confidence of the saints, and finally to make division and trouble in the church, and to bring the true ministers of Christ into trouble and disrepute. If not greatly mistaken, we could now name a score of preachers of that description, some of whom we have once regarded as able ministers of the New Testament, and under whose ministry we have sat with delight and profit, until their real character has been developed, their mask has fallen off, and their hypocrisy has been exposed. These have added far more affliction to our bonds than all the open avowed enemies of the cause combined could do. Like the unclean ravens which carried food to Elijah, they have dealt food to the saints of which they themselves have never tasted; or like Balaam's ass, when speaking with a man's voice, they have uttered words which, while unintelligible to themselves, have been God's message of comfort and consolation to some of the saints.

But it is not, however, our understanding that those malicious enemies who desired to add affliction to Paul's bonds always preached Christ as Paul and other ministers of Christ did, by standing up in the public assemblies to expound the Scriptures, or to proclaim salvation in his name. But the manner in which their opposition to them, and to the gospel, was overruled by the Lord to the furtherance of the gospel, as explained in the context in which he adverts, first to the things which had happened to him, probably when he was in Macadonia, or at Philippi, and the bitter persecution which he had encountered, and by which his life seemed to be imperiled, had fallen out rather for the furtherance of the gospel. So that their wicked efforts to prevent the preaching of the gospel by raising a tumult against him, having him arrested and bound and imprisoned, and sent away to Rome, had given currency to the gospel, and they were themselves instruments in proclaiming it, instead of being able to conceal it. Their malicious persecution had stirred up the brethren, so that the brethren of Paul, or as he calls them, "Brethren in the Lord," waxing confident by Paul's bonds, in which he was held by their malice and envy, were much more bold to speak the word without fear. It is in this way that some preach Christ of envy and strife. Some of whom? Of the brethren in the Lord; but how of envy and strife? Of the envy and strife of their enemies; for certainly not of envy in their own hearts; but they were impelled, emboldened, and waxed confident, by the envy and strife of their enemies. While others of the dear disciples, less timid, did not need the enmity and persecution of their adversaries to stimulate them, but preached Christ of love and good will. It is certain that the envy and strife of the enemies stimulated the disciples with the greater boldness to preach Christ, and even the imprisonment and bonds of Paul had exemplified this truth. And the joy and exultation of Paul was in that the gospel of Christ was preached, by his brethren in the Lord, who were stimulated to preach, by the envy and strife of their cruel and malicious enemies, who were maliciously bent on surpressing the preaching of Christ, and adding affliction to Paul's bonds. Yet notwithstanding every way, through some of his brethren from love and good will, regardless of the opposition they encountered, and others, being timid, were stimulated by persecution; although persecution was used to embolden them, still, in the result, Christ was preached and Paul rejoiced.

It has been, and still is the wisdom of God to employ the envy and strife, and persecution of the world for the promulgation of the gospel from the beginning of the gospel dispensation. Instead of offering large bounties of worldly comfort, fame or treasure, to induce men to engage in the work of the gospel ministry, it has been the divine pleasure and wisdom of God to employ the rage, malice and persecution of his enemies to hasten his ministers to the field of their labor. A large number of God's chosen ministers were very pleasantly situated in a large upper room at Jerusalem, and being all of one accord, it was delightful to be all of them in one place. But, "As an eagle stirreth up her nest," so the Lord caused them to be scattered as soon as they were endued with power from above; and this was done by letting the powers of darkness loose upon them. Persecution arose against them in Jerusalem, and being severely persecuted, they were scattered by the persecution, and they that were scattered went every where, preaching the word. That is just where the Lord had told them to go and preach; and we have no right to doubt that persecution was by him ordained to enforce their obedience to his command. At all events the persecutions they endured were used, under the mighty hand which controls them, for the furtherance of the gospel. The experience of Paul himself is in point, from place to place, he was tossed about by the cruel persecutions which followed him everywhere, so that he knew whereof he affirmed, when he said that some indeed preach Christ of envy and strife; but all that envy and strife had resulted in the more abundant dissemination of the gospel of Christ. In our context, he says, "But I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things (persecutions, etc.) which happened unto me, have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel; so that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places." Heartily and cheerfully as the apostle labored, and more abundantly than all the other apostles, who can doubt that much of his labor was induced by persecution? Instead of Mission Boards, and Mission Societies, large salaries, and flattering titles, the apostles and primitive ministers were hurried from place to place by the lash of persecution; and thus of the envy and strife which rankled in the hearts of their bitterest enemies, Christ was preached, and more abundantly preached by the persecuted servants of God, and Paul rejoiced, and would rejoice. The things which had happened to him had finally resulted in taking him to the capitol of the Roman Empire, and before kings and rulers where he had opportunity to preach Christ, which otherwise he could not have had. And from the apostle's days to the present, the envy and strife, opposition and persecution, endured by the faithful servants of Christ, under the overruling hand of God, who controls them all, has done more for the promulgation of the gospel of Christ than all the humanly devised institutions that have ever been invented for that ostensible purpose. And in the great result, with Paul, we do rejoice; yea, and we will rejoice.

Of course, Paul did not approve nor rejoice in the deceptive course of those who preached Christ insincerely, deceptively, or hypocritically, of envy and strife; nor did he sanction the spirit of persecution in the avowed enemies of Christ, though God had overruled all to the furtherance of the gospel. It was rather on the principle that we now rejoice in the crucified and risen Savior, though his crucifixion was by wicked hands. "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken and with wicked hands have crucified and slain (Acts 2:23)." We rejoice not in the wickedness of his murderers, but in the accomplishment thereby of the gracious counsel and purpose of God. So Paul, and so we rejoice, that Christ is preached, notwithstanding every way.

REPLY TO BROTHER ED. WILLIAMS.

EDITORS SIGNS: – If I know my own heart, I have no desire, and less ability, to criticize your able articles, neither have I any inclination or wish to garble, misquote, or in any way misrepresent or misconstrue any extracts that I may make from your writings; nor do I feel any disposition to direct public scrutiny to your published views. My whole aim and desire is, if possible, to arrive at the "naked truth" as it is in Jesus. To this end I propose to make a few extracts from your article in No. 22 of the SIGNS on "Flesh and Spirits," and one from the Circular Letter of the association called Kansas. Seemingly, to my poor understanding, there are some discrepancies. Possibly, when I have made the extracts in their regular order, I may ask some questions and make a few remarks. I will state, if possible, how far I agree with you, and where we disagree, trusting when we fully understand each other, we will not disagree at all. Doubtless you think you have made yourself perfectly understood, and no doubt you have to all who are not so dull of comprehension as your unworthy interrogator. The extracts are as follows:

1st. In speaking of Adam you say, "Although he possessed the spirit of a man, yet it was a natural spirit, or a spirit adapted to his being as a natural man." 2d. "As a birth of the flesh brought us forth in our flesh as natural men, so we must be born again, of the Spirit, to make us manifest as the children of God." 3d. "It is then the spirit of God in us which is born of God, and in which we are manifested as the children of God, who is the Father of our spirits," &c. 4th. "Neither do we understand that the spirit has need of redemption, for it cannot sin." – Circular Letter.

In discussing the first extract I will call your attention to Genesis ii. 7: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." If this soul that is referred to here, which is sometimes called mind, spirit, &c., is what you mean when you say, "a natural spirit, or a spirit adapted to his being as a natural man," then I can agree with you; if you mean something else, we differ. 2d. If by the we, "which must be born again, of the Spirit, to make us manifest as the children of God," you mean this same soul, mind, or natural spirit spoken of in the first extract, we agree again; but if you mean this old body of flesh must be born again, of the Spirit, regenerated, as your language would indicate, for you say, "As a birth of the flesh, brought us forth in our flesh as natural men, so we [evidently our flesh] must be born again, of the Spirit, to make us manifest as the children of God," then I do not agree with you. 3d. If by the spirit you speak of in this extract, as "the spirit of God in us which is born of God," &c., you mean the same natural spirit mentioned in the first extract, and which is sometimes called soul, mind, &c., I can agree with you here; but if you mean by "the spirit of God," the eternal life principle which is found nowhere except in God the Father and Christ the Son, as your language certainly implies, then I beg leave to differ with you again. 4th. This extract seems directly in contradiction of the third extract, which is from your article; for you say, if I comprehend your meaning, that it is "the spirit of God in us which is born of God," &c., which I understand to mean "the natural spirit," soul or mind. But this extract says, "It is not the spirit [meaning, I presume, the natural spirit, soul or mind] that has need of redemption, for the spirit cannot sin," but our fallen nature (the Adam man), meaning, evidently, this body of flesh. If I understand aright, both soul or natural spirit, and body, need redemption, for both form an important part of the purchased possession; the soul to be regenerated, born again, in time, and the body at the resurrection. – See Romans viii. 23.

By reconciling our explaining the (to me) foregoing discrepancies, you will greatly oblige a humble search after truth.

Yours to serve,
Ed. Williams.

REPLY: – The extracts copied from our article on "Flesh And Spirits" may be more obscure and ambiguous than we had supposed, but they are stated in about as strong and clear terms as we, in our limited knowledge of language, are able to command; much, therefore, as we desire to be correctly understood by all our dear brethren, we fear that we shall partially fail. We have measurably realized the truth of the words of inspiration, "Ye have need of patience," and we greatly desire to possess that excellent gift.

Brother Williams seems in doubt as to our meaning where we say that "As a birth of the flesh brought us forth in our flesh as natural men, so we must be born again, of the Spirit, to make us manifest as the children of God." We had regarded the Savior's words to Nicodemus amply sufficient to establish this proposition: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Every christian and every man is in possession of a nature which is born of the flesh, which develops the corruptible nature of his parentage, and is the production of not only a corruptible, but a corrupt seed, which, being corrupt, sinful and mortal, is not born of God; but is a child of the flesh, being earthy, depraved, and beating the image of the earthy Adam. As this earthy nature is brought forth into manifestation by a fleshly birth, so that which is born of the Spirit, and is spirit, is made manifest by being born of God, of the Spirit, of incorruptible seed, by the word of God, that liveth and abideth forever. As the old man, which is born of the flesh, and is flesh, was made manifest as a creature of God and a descendant of the earthly Adam by a birth of the flesh, so the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness, is brought forth and made manifest as a child of God, an heir of glory, and a joint heir with Jesus Christ, by a birth, which is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. Now that which is born of the flesh, brother Williams has kindly proved, by reference to Genesis ii. 7, is a living soul, which is sometimes called mind, spirit, &c. That flesh which is born of the flesh would not be a perfectly natural man if it were born without a soul, mind or spirit. To be like the earthy Adam it must have all the elements of its earthly progenitor; and yet the Savior says it is flesh, and we understand him to mean that all that is born of the flesh is flesh. And that which is born of the Spirit – is that also flesh, with a duplicated birth? We cannot so understand the words of our Lord, for he says it is spirit.

If the natural spirit of the natural man, which is adapted to his earthly nature, were born of God, then all men would possess a spirit born of the spirit of God. We do not know how to make our meaning, in what brother Williams has quoted from our article, more plain than by repeating the words which we used for that purpose; and he says if we mean what we said, then he agrees with us. We certainly did mean what we said, and said what we mean, that the spirit which Adam possessed as a natural man was adapted to his nature as a natural man, and is called the spirit of the flesh, because it is born of the flesh, and is not born of God.

Brother Williams says, “If by the we, which must be born again, of the spirit of God, you mean this same soul, mind, or natural spirit spoken of in the first extract, we agree again.”

Sorry as we are to disagree with our brother, we frankly acknowledge that is not what we mean: "For they that are after the flesh, do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit, the things of the Spirit. For to be carnally [fleshly] minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye [who are born again] are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness." – Rom. viii. 5-10. The apostle does not say that this carnal mind, or spirit of the flesh, was enmity before the saints at Rome were born again, and that by the new birth it has become subject to the law of God; but he says it is enmity against God, it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. We can conceive of a christian, in the ecstacy of his early love, while elevated in his joy above all his infirmities, being led to think that all his infirmities, being led to think that all the elements of his carnal nature are brought into subjection to the law of the spirit of life; but it does seem strange to us that an old disciple of Jesus, who has been battling with the corruptions of his old carnal nature for years, can believe that his natural mind has become spiritual by the new birth, and that all or any of the elements of his old nature are now born of God, led by the spirit of holiness, or free from pollution. We ask brother Williams, for we believe he is an experienced child of God, if he is not involved to-day in the same bitter warfare that made Paul groan? If he does not find a law in his members warring against the law of his mind? If indeed he can find any thing in his flesh to-day a whit better than that eminent apostle of the Lamb could find in his flesh eighteen hundred years ago? Dear brother, tell us what or who are the belligerent parties in warfare which make you groan, being burdened, and long for that promised deliverance which shall come with the creature shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God? We need not tell brother Williams that a creature is a being or thing created; and children are those who are born or to be born of a progenitor in whom they had a seminal existence before they were brought forth by birth. In our earthly nature we are the creatures of God; but when manifested as the children of God by a spiritual birth, a vital relation is brought forth or manifested, in which the favored recipients of that birth cry, Abba, Father. This spirit of adoption, which God has sent into their hearts, is of God, and by it the creatures into whose hearts it is sent are sealed unto the day of redemption; that is, the redemption of our body. "Ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." – Romans viii. 23. If we reject the testimony of our Lord, that "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit," and contend that the elements of our earthly nature are born of the Spirit, and are become spiritual, what are we still waiting for? And why cannot flesh and blood inherit the kingdom of God? especially since it is positively declared in the scriptures that "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." Now which man is it in the christian that cannot commit sin? Is it the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, which we are commanded to put off, deny and crucify? or is it not the new man, the inner man? Which of these two men is born of the flesh, and which of them is born of the Spirit? Nothing that is born of God can commit sin, and nothing that is born of the flesh has any inherent good in it; for "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." – Compare 1 John i. 8 and 1 John iii. 9. If Paul could find nothing good in his flesh, and sin still dwelt in his members
